> The modest reserve and quiet independence of our rural population have heretofore barred the great interests of agriculture from its proper prominence in the country, while other interests more active and clamorous, with the advantage of association, abundant means, and concentrated effort, have often secured special protection at the expense of the farmer. Unfortunately this disinclination to self-seeking and lack of ambition for public station result so generally in the selection from towns and cities of national legislators from other vocations, some of whom have little knowledge of the peculiar wants of the farming class, and many others may have connections with other interests that may be brought into antagonism with those of agriculture. Farmers are learning their power, and are beginning to exercise it in self-protection if not for their own advantage.

[Mr. ROBBINS addressed the House. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

[Mr. MELLISH addressed the House. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, it is a pity to spoil that pretty speech of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. ROBBINS.]

His district and mine adjoin, and the people are of the same character, only I do not think my people are so bad as his are, as he represents them here to-night. There was a time when we did not have any revenue laws of the sort that he speaks about; there was a time when we did not have these officers scattered through the country. There was a time when the people could make their brandy for the old women and the little drams and all that sort of thing, and love their country better. There was a time when it was not necessary to collect nearly $100,000,000, as will be collected this fiscal year upon whisky and tobacco, to pay the indebtedness of the country. The country was then free and easy, and the people were happy and prosperous and free; but for reasons satisfactory to our own people, they got up a little unpleasantness and created a debt that is still unpaid of $2,200,000,000, and our good people down South have now to pay the fiddler for that dance that they had for about four years.

Now, Mr. Speaker, because our people pay a little tax upon whisky and tobacco, it is no argument to me and no evidence to me that we are going to centralize our Government. Because these officers go into North Carolina and collect taxes from the people on their tobacco and whisky and brandy, that does not satisfy me, nor does it satisfy the intelligent people of the country, that the country is in danger of centralization any more than it ever was.

The gentleman tells you about the annoyances of the revenue laws and of the assessors and all that sort of thing. Well, to some extent there is something in that, but there are no assessors now; the law appointing assessors was repealed long since, and the collector assesses and collects too. It is a much cheaper system. The gentleman talks about store-keepers. Sir, there are no store-keepers in his district and not one in mine. I presume there is not a licensed distillery in his district that makes whisky.

Mr. ROBBINS. I hope the gentleman will allow me a moment?

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. Certainly; with pleasure.

Mr. ROBBINS. I saw a dozen or two appointed not long since.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. Store-keepers?

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes; store-keepers.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. I presume the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. ROBBINS. No; I am not.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. There are no store-keepers, unless there are licensed distilleries that make whisky. There are no store-keepers connected with brandy distilleries.

Mr. ROBBINS. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. Yes, sir.

Mr. ROBBINS. I hope the gentleman does not think that we in our district confine ourselves entirely to the manufacture of brandy. The best whisky in the world is made there.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. Yes, sir; the best whisky made is the corn whisky which is made in Carolina, and it is made without a license; that is the trouble. There are no store-keepers. The manufacturers do not take out a license; they try to violate the laws of the country instead of taking out a license.

So far as the tax upon tobacco is concerned, the gentleman's people do not pay it; neither do mine. It is paid by the people who use the tobacco. The people of your State, Mr. Speaker, the State of New York, who smoke fine cigars made of our fine tobacco, pay this tax. We charge the tax upon the tobacco, and the consumer pays it. So far as regards the liquor we drink ourselves we never tax that; we make that clear. As regards the distilled liquor we ship to other States to be sold, it is a luxury, and it ought to be taxed.

Mr. ROBBINS. Will the gentleman allow me one question?

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. ROBBINS. Does not the gentleman suppose that the man who buys from the producer, knowing that he has to pay another price in the shape of an internal-revenue tax, pays less to the producer than if he were not required to pay another price?

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. When the producer sells it he puts on the tax. As for tobacco, we sell it now for three times as much as we did before the war. One of the best businesses we have is raising tobacco. We get a great deal more for it than we did formerly. We ought not to complain of the tax. One hundred million dollars of tax has to be raised from something. If it is not raised from tobacco and whisky it must be raised by taxation on the lands of the southern country. Suppose that the mode of taxation originally contemplated by the Constitution were resorted to; suppose that taxation were apportioned among the States and paid per capita, what would become of the gentleman's State and mine, with our population and our amount of property? Is it not best that taxation should be imposed upon the luxuries of the country? Is it not best that the people of wealth living in other States who indulge in those luxuries should pay this taxation? It is a form of taxation which we certainly ought not to complain of.

The gentleman speaks about "giving in" the quantity of spirits manufactured. Why, sir, when one of the distillers of his district makes ten or twenty gallons of brandy there is nobody there to watch. The distiller puts it in the barrel and notifies the gauger to come around. Then he tells the gauger, "This is what I have made." He merely gives in the quantity, for there is no store-keeper there; nobody to watch him; and when that whisky is sold it brings a better price than it ever brought in the history of this country before the war, for in the gentleman's State whisky used to sell at twenty-five cents a gallon, plenty of it.

Mr. ROBBINS. I do not like to interrupt the gentleman, but——

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. It is a pleasure for me to be interrupted by my friend.

Mr. ROBBINS. I tell the gentleman that so far from its being the fact that the distiller merely gives in the quantity to a gauger whom he sends for, there must be, in my district in every single instance a store-keeper to take charge of the spirits as it comes from the still; to see how much there is, and that it is all turned over to the gauger.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. On that point we differ. I venture to repeat (and I will ascertain to-morrow whether I am correct) that there is not a store-keeper in the gentleman's district. There is but one distillery, so far as I now recollect, in my district, and that is a licensed whisky distillery. Those who make brandy do not have any store-keeper; none is required.

Mr. Speaker, the spirit of opposition to the laws and the disposition to violate them is engendered to a large extent by just such speeches as that of my friend from North Carolina, telling the people that the law is wrong and oppressive, and ought to be repealed. When I go through my district I do not talk to the people in that way. I say to them that our people brought the war upon the country; they were not satisfied with the Government and tried to break it up. Thus a vast debt was incurred by the loyal people of the country in putting down the rebellion. The Army had to be fed and clothed; the pensioners must be provided for. The loyal people created this debt; and to pay it taxation is imposed, not on articles of prime necessity, but on such articles as tobacco and whisky, luxuries which (so far as my private opinion is concerned) I have always believed ought to be taxed out of existence.

It is the war that has created this necessity for taxation. Before the war we lived in a "free and easy" way. We drank our liquor, chewed our tobacco, and smoked our cigars, with no revenue officers to spy around and inform upon us. That continued so long as there was no attempt to break up the Government. But when we made an effort to destroy the Government the loyal people of the country had to raise and maintain an army to put down the rebellion, thus creating a debt which has to be paid. I do not complain, nor do the people I represent, about the imposition of a tax on those luxuries, whisky and tobacco.

Mr. ROBBINS. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him again?

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. With pleasure.

Mr. ROBBINS. I wish to say this: I recognize the fact that we have a debt. I recognize the fact that debt rose out of the war. I admit it ought to be paid. I am in favor of redeeming the honor of the country by paying every cent of it. The only question is as to what means we shall take to pay it. I say let us levy import duties or something of that kind instead of this vexatious, this centralizing, this oppressive internal system of espionage and taxation that ramifies through all the private affairs of everybody all over the country. Let us raise the necessary amount to carry on the Government, to pay the interest on the public debt, and to pay a small amount of the principal, but let us postpone to the next generation the payment of the main portion of the principal of the public debt, when this country will have one hundred millions of people and be the richest country on the earth, and when we can pay the whole remaining portion of the public debt without the least trouble. All we need to do now is to pay the interest and enough of the principal every year to make the world know we mean to pay it. Let the next generation pay it. Let us not by levying taxes by the internal-revenue system still further oppress the already impoverished people of the South who have been ruined by the war, and oppress, too, the people of the North, well-nigh ruined by the victory they have won and by the sacrifices they had to make in money and property. Let us curtail our expenses, and let us raise revenue by a tariff and not by the present vexatious internal-revenue system.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. The difference between the gentleman and myself is this: He proposes to tax the people of his country on articles of prime necessity. He proposes to put a higher tariff on the goods they must wear and upon what they must eat and drink, and let whisky and brandy and tobacco go free from taxation; to tax them upon all articles of prime necessity, and to allow articles of luxury to go free. When the proposition is made in this House to raise the tariff, the gentleman's party in this House is in favor of free trade. When it is proposed here to keep the tax on the bonds of the bloated bondholders, so much talked about, the clamor comes from the gentleman's party that it is all a system of espionage and spying and all that sort of thing.

There is the difference between the gentleman and myself. I am for taking all sorts of tariff and internal-revenue taxation off articles of prime necessity which the impoverished people must have and which nature requires they must have. If we must have a tax, put it on whisky and tobacco and articles of luxury, so that all those who can afford to use such luxuries will be compelled to pay for them. This is the difference between us.

So far as paying the debt is concerned, I agree with my friend that perhaps there has been too much of it attempted to be paid at once. Let us just pay the interest and wait until the country grows greater and grander.

So far as the tax on brandy is concerned, notwithstanding it produces considerable revenue, as any gentleman will find who will look at the figures, I agree with the gentleman that to a certain extent I should like to see the tax taken off brandy. The gentleman from North Carolina has well portrayed the manner in which it comes.

But still, Mr. Speaker, this great Government of ours, in its leniency to the people I represent, instead of confiscating the whole property of that people, instead of declaring the whole State outlaws and not entitled to anything like pardon or amnesty, deserves at our hands every consideration. This great Government has accorded to us everything and not even taxed us, as they set out during the war, by putting a tax on each State and compelling each State to raise a certain amount which would go upon the property and upon the heads of the people we represent. Sir, the Government has been good to us; and I say that those here who represent the people of the South upon this floor, instead of making war upon the Government, finding fault with the mode and manner of taxation, ought to rejoice that articles of prime necessity are not taxed in our borders, but that the luxuries we raise and sell to those abroad who are able to pay for them are taxed, and taxed alone.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say three or four words while I have the opportunity—and I did not expect to say a word to-night—in reference to the tax on leaf-tobacco. I take the ground raw materials ought not to be taxed, because they are the bases of the industrial interests of the country. My friend from Tennessee, [Mr. BUTLER,] for whom I have great love and respect, has intimated that the small farmers of the country do not pay the tax; that the manufacturers and consumers pay the tax.

Well, sir, in one sense that is correct. But I wish to say that the small farmer does pay a heavy tax in this way. Without the tax on leaf tobacco the price of tobacco in the country is from twenty to twenty-five cents a pound. The effect of the tax on leaf-tobacco has been to absolutely cut off that trade. The small farmer cannot sell to the consumer on account of the tax, and the trade therefore has been cut off. In consequence of the tax the producer, in selling to the manufacturer or to the wholesale dealer, gets five cents a pound; otherwise he would get twenty cents a pound. Therefore I say, and I hope my friend from Tennessee will take notice of the argument, that the small farmers pay a tax of fifteen cents a pound on the raw material. I say that we might just as well tax cotton; we might just as well tax corn that is made into whisky, or the apple that is made into brandy, as tax the raw material, tobacco, before it is manufactured. The argument is just the same in reference to all those articles, and I think it is a wrong policy.

I desire, also, to call the attention of my friend from Tennessee to this feature of the revenue laws, that they make no provision whereby the court has discretion. The law is rigid, it is stiff, it is unbending, in regard to the penalties and the fines. There is a man now in jail at Asheville, North Carolina, put there for six months by order of the court, for staying one night at a distillery and selling a quart of spirits to a man who came to the distillery. The court has decided there is no discretion.

Now, sir, I will join with my friend from Tennessee in saying that the public debt ought to be paid. It is sacred. But, sir, if we can find a way to pay the public debt without oppressing the people, I call upon him, and I call upon every gentleman in this House, to say if it is not proper that we should do it. And the people, sir, are oppressed. What would you think of a man having to walk a hundred miles for selling a pound and a half of tobacco in the leaf? That is what is done in my country.

Now, sir, while I agree with my friend from Tennessee in regard to paying the public debt, I think it is unwise to tax the raw materials of the country. I do not object so much to the tax on tobacco or to the tax on spirits; but I think if we could devise a plan whereby the people could come and give in their taxes as my friend has suggested it would be a good idea. The people would be better satisfied, and we would have peace and harmony throughout the land.

My friend from Tennessee is mistaken about there being no store-keepers. There are several in my country. I think there is one in Asheville. I have had several applications during the last month or two to have store-keepers appointed in different parts of the country.

I had not intended to say a word this evening, but I have felt it my duty to raise my voice in behalf of changes in these laws. I do hope that Congress will take hold of the subject and provide some remedy, so that a man shall not be put in jail and languish and be kept away from his home for such trifling offenses. Why, sir, the people are oppressed by these laws. That is known to everybody in the country. And I presume that my friend from Tennessee is not in favor of the system, although he wants to see our great debt paid. I hope there will be some other plan devised for accomplishing this object than that of taxing the industrial interests of the country.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. I desire to say just one word. So far as the law is concerned in regard to the court having no discretion, I agree with my friend from North Carolina that that law appears to be harsh and oppressive. The law formerly was different. The judges trying these cases had discretion. But Congress, for wise reasons perhaps, thought it was best not to grant it. I think that was wrong, and I am willing to go as far as my friend from North Carolina in obtaining a change of the law in that respect. I think all courts ought to have discretion.

So far as the tax on leaf tobacco is concerned, the Committee on Ways and Means have agreed to report a bill to authorize the sale of one hundred dollars' worth. We passed the same law in the last Congress, but the Senate would not concur. I introduced a bill this session to exempt one hundred dollars' worth, and I trust it will become a law. But while I am anxious for that to become the law, and while my friend from North Carolina is anxious to have various changes of the law, I think it is better for the people we represent that they should bear these ills than that they should fly to those they know not of. For if these taxes were taken off whisky and tobacco they must be imposed somewhere else; and if you were to say to my people that they must pay on other things in proportion to what is now paid on those articles, I do not know what would become of us.

Now, so far as violating the law is concerned, I hate to see any man punished for selling a quart of liquor or a pound and a half of tobacco. But I have always told my people not to have anything to do with distilling of any kind, and that if they raised tobacco, to comply with the law. I tell them the law says you can sell your tobacco to manufacturers, and there are manufacturers in the country. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue said to the Committee on Ways and Means that if you exclude leaf-tobacco from taxation you will destroy the whole internal-revenue system, and cause a deficit of $40,000,000 in the revenue from tobacco. I would like to see the recommendation of the Committee on Ways and Means become a law, and I trust it will become the law, and relieve the little producers of the country that the gentleman from North Carolina and myself represent. But if to take the tax off leaf-tobacco is to destroy the whole internal-revenue system and cause a deficit of $40,000,000, we had better tell our people to bear it. It was our people who brought it upon us, and we must "grin and bear it," to use a North Carolina phrase.

Mr. VANCE. I desire to call attention to one very important fact in connection with this matter. The manufacture of tobacco in Canada has greatly increased, because there is no tax there on the raw material or the leaf-tobacco. I will mention another fact, that the tax on leaf-tobacco does away with the growth of tobacco in a great many portions of the country. Men cannot make it for five cents a pound. I agree with my friend from Tennessee in hoping that this will be remedied.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. The reason why the manufacture of tobacco is increasing in Canada is, that they run the tobacco across the border without paying taxes, while our people are pretty honest and pay their taxes.

Mr. ROBBINS. I desire to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question. The gentleman says that he always tells the people that these laws are good, and that he is conscientiously bound to tell them that all laws are good.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. O, no; I did not say that.

Mr. ROBBINS. I thought I understood the gentleman to intimate that it was rather disloyal to talk about bad laws.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. No, sir.

Mr. ROBBINS. I want to ask the gentleman whether he thinks this a good law. The law says that a man shall not sell tobacco, unless he sells it to a licensed dealer or manufacturer, or a man who buys it for export. That necessarily limits the purchase to a small number, and they—perhaps one hundred persons in North Carolina and Virginia—have power to control the price because they are the only men allowed by law to buy the article. I would ask the gentleman whether he tells the people of Tennessee that that is a good law, whether he feels bound in order to support the honor and dignity of the Government and to maintain loyal principles always to maintain that that is a good law?

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. I have just said that I introduced a bill in the last Congress and in this to exempt $100 worth of tobacco in the hands of the producer from taxation. That proposition passed the House during the last Congress but failed in the Senate. The Committee on Ways and Means will recommend it this session. They agreed upon it at their last session or their last session but one. I think the law is defective. I think that the man who produces tobacco ought at least to have the right to sell $100 worth, or to trade or swap it for labor or for the productions of other farmers. I have always held that the law is oppressive in this regard; but the change has been opposed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and the Senate has always defeated it. They have taken the ground that it would destroy the tax that is derived from tobacco if you should make leaf-tobacco free.

I did not say that the laws were good. I told my people to obey them, that they were the laws of the country, and that it was the duty of every good citizen to obey the laws until they were declared unconstitutional by the courts that had jurisdiction, or were repealed by the law-making power. I try to educate the people I represent to obey the laws.

Mr. ROBBINS. I tell the people also to obey the laws. When I talk to the people I say obey the laws while they are laws; but I am talking here now to the Representatives of the people, the law-makers, and I say here the law is not good; and because I say that, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BUTLER] gets up and says that such a speech as mine is calculated to have a demoralizing influence. I hope I have sufficiently demoralized the law-makers to make them correct the evils which he cannot deny exist in the law.

Mr. WHITELEY asked and obtained permission to print remarks on the improvement of the Apalachicola, Flint, and Chattahoochee Rivers. (See Appendix.)

And then, on motion of Mr. RANDALL, (at ten o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BECK: The petition of the commissioners of the sinking fund of the city of Louisville, Kentucky, that certain taxes claimed to have been illegally collected from the city of Louisville by the United States Government be refunded, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. BURCHARD: The remonstrance of C. R. Barber and others, of Polo, Illinois, against conferring upon the Commissioner of Patents authority to extend patents a second time, and against the expediency of renewing patents for agricultural machinery, to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. CHIPMAN: The petition of citizens of the District of Columbia, for a new bridge at the navy-yard, to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. DARRALL: The petition of John M. Smith, of New Iberia, Louisiana, to be paid for thirty-five bales of cotton taken by the United States forces in 1865, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. FIELD: Resolutions adopted at a public meeting in Wyandotte, Michigan, in favor of an increase of currency, to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. HAGANS: Papers relating to the claim of Samuel V. B. Strider, for compensation for the destruction of property by fire occasioned by a shell thrown by a United States battery, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. HOUGHTON: The remonstrance of journeymen book-binders of Washington, District of Columbia, against the passage of the bill (S. No. 689) to further regulate the Government Printing Office, and to reduce the wages of book-binders, to the Committee on Printing.

By Mr. LUTTRELL: Papers relating to the claim of Frank L. Jackson and others, of Solano County, California, for relief, to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. MYERS: The memorial of the Wholesale Grocers' Association of Philadelphia, for such revision of the bankrupt law as will insure to creditors a larger and more equitable proportion of the gross amount realized in the settlement of the estates of bankrupts, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, the petition of importers of reel or hand-made lace goods in Philadelphia, for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 1071) reducing the duty on such goods to 20 per cent. ad valorem, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. SHELDON: Papers relating to the claim of J. Madison Wells, of Louisiana, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. SLOAN: The memorial of the Medical Association of Georgia, in relation to the Medical Department of the United States Army, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a memorial adopted at a military convention, composed of delegates from various parts of the State of Georgia, in relation to organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia of the States, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, resolutions of the republican committee of the first congressional district of Georgia, in favor of the passage of the supplementary civil-rights bill, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. VANCE: The petition of James O. Robertson, William Carpenter, and others, for a post-route from Valleytown, North Carolina, via Robbinsville, to Chilhowee, Tennessee, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr.———: The petition of William H. Carman, late private Company E, Thirty-second Illinois Volunteers, for relief, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, May 9, 1874.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

GENEVA AWARD.

Mr. STARKWEATHER asked and obtained unanimous consent to have reprinted for the use of the House the bill (H. R. No. 2987) to provide for the just and equitable distribution of the award made to the United States by the commissioners at Geneva under the treaty of Washington.

FOREIGN CONVICTS.

Mr. COX, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be respectfully requested to communicate to this House any correspondence between the State Department and other governments as to the landing of foreign convicts on our shores; and what legislation, if any, in his judgment is necessary to prevent such outrages.

RAILROADS.

Mr. HOUGHTON, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3279) amendatory of an act supplemental to an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed and recommitted, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

He also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3280) to incorporate the Salt Lake and Brigham Cañon Railroad Company; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

Mr. BRADLEY, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3281) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 2, 1864; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3282) providing for the collection of moneys due the United States from the Pacific railroad companies; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

COMPENSATION OF RAILROADS FOR CARRYING MAILS.

Mr. PLATT, of New York, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads the following resolution; which was read, and under the law referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That one thousand copies of House Miscellaneous Document No. 263, being a communication from the Postmaster-General in relation to the question of compensation to railroads for the transportation of the mails, be printed for the use of the Post-Office Department, and one thousand for the use of the House.

TRANSFER OF GOLD MINT BARS.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table for reference the bill (S. No. 784) authorizing the transfer of gold mint bars from the bullion fund of the assay office, New York, to the assistant treasurer at New York.

No objection being made, the bill was ordered to be taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

STEAMSHIP SUFFOLK.

Mr. WHEELER. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table for reference the bill (S. No. 766) to grant an American register to the steamship Suffolk, and to change the name of said steamship to that of Professor Morse.

No objection being made, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I desire to call the attention of the House to a matter which seems to me to be worthy of its consideration. In some remarks that I made on yesterday, during the debate which took place in Committee of the Whole, in reply to some remarks which had been made by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD]—I regret that he is not now in his seat—I alluded particularly to certain language which he had used. I find upon referring to the RECORD this morning that the language which he did use, and to which I replied, does not appear therein. I did not revise the report of my own remarks at all, and of course they appear in the RECORD as they were made. Now, it occurs to me that when any gentleman revises the report of the remarks which he makes in debate, especially when his remarks have called out a reply, the portion calling out the reply should not be omitted. It is not an agreeable thing for a gentleman, who in a discussion upon this floor replies to language that has been used in the course of debate, to find the next morning that the language to which he has replied has been left out of the RECORD, while his own remarks appear therein.

The SPEAKER. It should be done only by consent of the other party.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I merely desired to call attention to the subject.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. By order of the House the session of to-day is for the consideration in Committee of the Whole of the Indian appropriation bill.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. POLAND in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2343) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending amendment is one offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE] on behalf of the Committee on Appropriations, in line 189, page 9 of the printed bill, to increase the appropriation from $200,000 to $250,000, for subsistence of the Arapahoes, Cheyennes, &c. Tellers have been ordered upon the amendment; and the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. LOUGHRIDGE, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. RANDALL, will act as such.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I do not suppose anybody will insist upon a further count.

Mr. RANDALL. My colleague, [Mr. SPEER,] who opposed this amendment, is not now in his seat. I suspect he is detained by sickness.

Mr. BECK. Would any amendment to the amendment now be in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It would not be, as the committee are dividing upon this amendment. Is any further count insisted upon?

Mr. RANDALL. In the absence of my colleague, [Mr. SPEER,] I think I must insist upon a further count.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported ayes 82, noes not counted.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BECK. I move to strike out this paragraph.

Mr. HANCOCK. I wish to move an amendment to the paragraph, which I believe takes precedence of the motion to strike out.

Mr. BECK. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HANCOCK. I move to amend the paragraph by adding the following:

And further provided, That no troops shall be kept stationed on the reservation on which said Indians are located; but the northern line of Texas shall be guarded so far as possible so as to prevent the Indians from roaming into that State, or the whites from intruding on the Indian reservations.

This amendment has been agreed upon by the Committee on Appropriations; and as an apology for offering it now, instead of incorporating it in the bill, I will say that the facts have been brought to the knowledge of the committee since the bill was made up. These facts, obtained from agents representing the Society of Friends who now have charge of these Indians, satisfied us that it is proper this regulation should be established with reference to these reservations. The amendment has the entire concurrence of the Committee on Appropriations, and substantially the concurrence of the Committee on Indian Affairs. I hope there will be no opposition to it.

Mr. SHANKS. I move to amend the amendment by inserting after the word "reservation" the words "except such numbers as may be necessary to keep order." I am in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. HANCOCK;] but I think, if my amendment be adopted, it may secure that very settlement against being made a refuge for bad men.

Several MEMBERS. That is right.

Mr. HANCOCK. I have no objection to that amendment; I accept it as a modification of my amendment.

The amendment of Mr. HANCOCK, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. BECK. I now move to strike out the whole paragraph; and I will state my reason for the motion. This paragraph proposes to provide "for subsistence of the Arapaho, Cheyenne, Apache, Kiowa, Comanche, and Wichita Indians, and transportation of the same." We have on page 7 made provision for the Apaches, Kiowas, and Comanches, under a treaty, and have limited the appropriation so that it "shall be expended only in behalf of those Indians who go and remain upon reservations and refrain from hostilities." Are not those the same Indians we are providing for in the pending paragraph?

Mr. HANCOCK. Only in part.

Mr. BECK. Very well. Then, again, under another of those treaties we made appropriation for the Cheyennes and Arapahoes. Are not these the remainder of the Indians embraced in this paragraph?

Mr. HANCOCK. Not all of them. In addition to the Indians the gentleman has named, there are the Wichitas and Caddoes. There are a number of associated bands on these reservations, and under the control of the same agency. They aggregate, as reported to us, about twelve thousand. This additional appropriation is recommended by all the parties who have charge of the matter as necessary to feed these Indians and keep them within the limits of the reservation, so that they may not have an excuse for going outside and committing depredations upon the property of the white settlers. We propose to compel them to remain on the reservation; and I am satisfied the amount here appropriated will not be more than sufficient (if sufficient) for their subsistence.

Mr. BECK. I want to call attention again, as I have done before, to the absurdity of these Indian treaties. Though I have moved to strike out this paragraph, I believe this is the proper system of providing for the Indians—to appropriate a sum (and I do not know that this sum is too large) to collect, feed, clothe, and attend to the Indians. But it will be observed that on page 7 we make provision under treaties for three of the same bands of Indians provided for here; and on page 10 we make provision under treaties for two others of the same bands. These treaty stipulations cannot be executed; it is not pretended that they can be. All the money that is spent for the benefit of the Indians will be spent under this general provision to feed, clothe, and collect them together. All the money spent under treaty stipulations as provided for on pages 7 and 10, being $67,000 on page 7 and $45,000 on page 10, is to be divided among Indian agents, so-called engineers, carpenters, school-teachers, doctors, and other retainers of the Government. The money appropriated in the pending paragraph will go into the hands of the President and be distributed by his order in such a way as will do the Indians some good; but the amounts appropriated on pages 7 and 10 under the form of carrying out treaty stipulations is the amount of stealing necessary to get the sum here appropriated distributed among the Indians.

Those Indian treaties are absurdities; and the best illustration of it is that while you are apparently carrying out both treaties you make a separate provision—the only one that will be available—to feed, clothe, and gather those people under the control of the President of the United States. Every dollar appropriated for the Indians ought to be expended in this way. The amount appropriated to carry out treaty stipulations ought to be striken out and added to this other sum, to be applied by the President for the benefit of the Indians, doing away with all the supernumeraries provided for in the treaties, not one of whom will ever do those Indians any service or the country any good.

That is what I wish to have done. I withdraw my motion to strike out this, because I think it is right.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I renew the amendment, and I do so, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of making a few remarks. I am quite tired and sick of this eternal harangue against our treaty system with the Indians. Whenever an appropriation comes up it is the occasion for everybody—and I say it without any disrespect to my friend from Kentucky [Mr. BECK]—it is the occasion, I say, for everybody to come in and denounce the treaty system with the Indians. Now, if that system be wrong, it ought long ago to have been abrogated and in the proper way, by adopting an entirely new system with the Indians. When an appropriation bill comes up to carry out treaty stipulations, to assail it then accomplishes no good purpose. On the contrary, it is calculated, so far as it ever reaches the Indians, in my judgment, or those who negotiate their treaties, to demoralize them in all their conduct and dealings with the United States.

If there be any class of people an earth with whom the United States should be scrupulously honest and faithful it is in carrying out its stipulations with the Indians, and for the very reason that they are entirely helpless to enforce compliance with treaty stipulations. We deal with the Indians as we would not dare to deal with any power able to enforce upon us the execution of the obligations which we have voluntarily assumed. The infidelity, the dishonesty, the unwillingness of the Indians to comply with their stipulations, and the injury they are constantly inflicting on our people, grow out of the fact, in my judgment, as much as any thing else, that we are ourselves unfaithful to our treaty stipulations with the Indians. It is better for us to carry out our treaties, instead of constantly denying our obligations under them. Treaties with these Indians, who are unable to enforce the obligations under them, ought to be most sacred upon any Christian and civilized people.

Mr. SHANKS took the floor.

Mr. BECK. I hope the gentleman will yield to me to say a word in reply to what has been said by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. SHANKS, The gentleman can come in after I have finished, as I wish to say something in reply to what the gentleman from Kentucky himself has said.

I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that the treaties with those Indians are things of the past. By an act of Congress passed some time ago, which the gentleman from Kentucky will recollect, we agreed to make no more treaties with the Indians; but in the same act we positively declared that the treaties theretofore made should not be in any respect violated or infringed upon. We have declared by law that we do not believe there should be any more treaties made, and we affirmed by the act by which we forbade the making of any more treaties the treaties which had been already made with Indian tribes. These treaties in fact simply amount to contracts sacredly entered into on the part of the United States with those Indians. They ought to be specially sacred against the Government of the United States, because the Government in making those treaties acted with its eyes open, intelligently, ably, keeping its own records, having all the books, having given all the directions by which the treaties were made, having had the treaties made upon its own terms, having got all the consideration it asked for, having obtained every thing which those treaties proposed to give to the United States in the way of lands and other concessions; and when our people are in possession of those lands, and when the Indians have yielded up all title to them I say, sir, after the United States has obtained every consideration under those treaties, it is bad faith, it is cruel, it is not only unjust but inhuman, now for our Government to turn round and strike down those people, who are utterly helpless to stand up against us. We ought not to go back on our contracts, and go back on the law by which we affirmed those contracts. We ought not now to repudiate our contracts after we have received all the considerations, and when the Indians themselves have not received what we promised them. We ought not to repudiate our contracts with the Indians because we are a powerful nation; and especially when we recollect the fact that our people are settled upon the very soil we acquired from these Indians by these very treaties and for which we have so poorly paid.

If we have made arrangements by which we agreed to hire this man or that man, we ought to carry out those arrangements; we have no right to repudiate them. It is our own fault that the agreement was made, for we had the entire control of making the treaties. It gives us no right to break faith with them. We all know, too, that the money which these Indians were to receive for the lands which they gave us has been taken away by fictitious claims for damages. Those Indian funds have been drawn upon to such extent that to-day these Indians are paupers. The money which we promise to pay them for their land by solemn treaty obligation has been paid away for fictitious claims made by bad men who have crowded upon them and wronged them, until the Indians are paupers. We have received every consideration agreed to in these treaties on the part of the Indians, and now I say, instead of being in harmony with what ought to be the action of a Christian nation, it is heathenish for us to refuse to carry out the treaty stipulations on our part.

Mr. BECK. If the gentleman from Wisconsin will withdraw the motion I will renew it.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. BECK. I renew the motion to strike out the paragraph. I wish to say that no matter how sick or how tired the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDREDGE] may be of hearing this question raised, I claim the right as a Representative, believing that those so-called treaties are not treaties, to make my objections to them to the House, no matter who disagrees with me.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I ask the gentleman whether these treaties were not ratified by the Senate, and whether under the law passed by Congress, having been ratified by the Senate, they should not be binding?

Mr. BECK. I will answer that. Those treaties of which I complain were not made under the treaty-making power, and never were claimed to be. If you turn to volume 15 of the Statutes at Large, page 17, you will see that all those treaties of 1867 and 1868, of which I complain, were made under an act of Congress. The President and the Senate did not claim the right to make treaties with those wild bands of Indians. But an act of Congress was passed authorizing commissioners to go and make certain treaties and allot certain reservations, and directing them to report their action to Congress. That report was never made to Congres; but treaties were made, whereby $60,000,000 will be taken from the Treasury to consummate them. The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] who has gone over this subject more carefully than I did, says the amount will be ninety millions. The House refused in the Fortieth Congress to ratify them because they were not treaties, because they were made with so-called bands which had no organizations except when on the war-path. In the Forty-first Congress the President was given $2,000,000 in an aggregate sum by Congress rather than that we should seem to agree to the expenditure of that money in that way. In the last Congress a law was passed whereby the Senate agreed with the House that no more treaties should be made, and at the same time that such treaties as were recognized by both Houses should be carried out.

I have never objected to an old treaty or to any treaty made prior to 1867. But I have objected to those that were not made under the treaty-making power, but under an act of Congress which the Senate never complied with. And both our Commissioner of Indian Affairs, General Walker, last year, and the present Commissioner this year, publicly announced in written reports to Congress that so-called treaties are the merest pretenses and ought not to be carried out. The present Commissioner, on page 4 of his report of this year, says:

> If the objection should be made that this is a violation of a treaty stipulation, the answer is that the Government is bound to consider the best interests of its wards. And if, in previous years, wrong methods have been adopted, or if the present condition and exigencies require a different method of dealing with the Indians in order to secure their improvement and greatest good, then both justice and humanity require that the change be made.

I agree with the Commissioner. I propose to give the Indians every dollar that it has been proposed to give them by these treaties, but I would put it in a form where they would get the most benefit from it, in accordance with the suggestion of the Commissioner; but I do not wish to have it wasted on a set of supernumeraries, who in the treaties are called engineers, farmers, blacksmiths, doctors, schoolmasters, and are sent among the Apaches, Kiowas, and Comanches, who, both your Commissioners state, are ranging over Texas every week in the year, and whose only boast is the number of scalps they can bring back or the number of cattle they can steal.

And then we are to be told that this is bad faith toward the Indians. I say, sir, it is the utmost good faith toward them. Put the money where the peaceable Indians may use it to the best advantage, and do not have thousands of it squandered under the pretense of carrying out treaties that are no treaties, paying it out to men to go among the Indians to rob and plunder them.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Congress by a subsequent act declared it would not ratify those treaties.

Mr. BECK. Yes; we kept up that struggle for three years. We gave to the President the power to divert the money from the purposes named in the treaties and apply it to other purposes which might be considered best.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I believe that regularly at every session of Congress, whenever the Indian bill comes up, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] makes an assault on these treaties of 1868.

Mr. BECK. And I intend to continue to do it.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I agree with the gentleman from Kentucky, that strictly and legally the Senate never had power to make treaties with these Indians. But they have made them and Congress has time and again ratified them. When the treaties of 1868 came up, the House refused to ratify them at the first session thereafter. Instead of appropriating in accordance with the treaties, the House passed a bill appropriating $2,000,000, and made no appropriation in compliance with the treaties. But, sir, at the next session of Congress this House made an appropriation in compliance with those treaties. Now, I ask the gentleman from Kentucky, after the treaties were made in compliance with an act of Congress, and when those treaties come before the House, having been thus made, and the House deliberately makes appropriations carrying out those treaties, is it not bound by that act? I ask him further this question: If at the second term and the third term and the fourth term they still make appropriations to carry out those treaties, are they not bound and estopped thereby? Now, I find in the second Congress, after these treaties were made, in the appropriation bill an appropriation for the "sixth of thirty installments" under this treaty, thus fully recognizing the treaties. Now, will you tell me that after thus fully recognizing a treaty by an act of Congress we are to stultify ourselves by saying that we have never agreed to it? If the gentleman will turn to volume 80 of the Globe he will find a discussion upon these very same treaties at the next session after Congress had refused to appropriate money to carry out these treaties, and had passed the two million dollar bill. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] was then opposing the appropriations under these treaties. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] asked him this question:

> I wish to ask the gentleman from Kentucky one question. If we make this appropriation now, will it not operate as a precedent and oblige us to make similar appropriations annually for thirty years?

Now, here is the answer of the gentleman from Kentucky:

> Mr. BECK. It will.

I think, therefore, the gentleman is estopped from saying that these are not treaties.

Mr. BECK. I contended at that time that the treaties ought not to be carried out, and that if we made the appropriations it would be regarded as a precedent, and would be construed to have that effect, and at that very session of Congress, to prevent it having that effect; I introduced a resolution, which the House passed with only five dissenting votes, declaring that on all questions of treaties which required appropriations this House should not be bound to carry out those treaties, but should judge whether the appropriations were right and proper, and if under all the circumstances they regarded them as wrong and useless, then that Congress should not make the appropriation.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I wish to ask the gentleman whether when he said that we would be estopped if we made the appropriations he was right or wrong?

Mr. BECK. I do not think I said that we would be estopped. I said that it would be taken as a precedent, and in order to show that we did not regard ourselves as bound by the treaties, I then introduced the resolution to which I have referred, and which will be found in McPherson's Manual and in the Globe.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I agree with the gentleman that we were estopped by making those appropriations under the treaties for five years past, and we cannot turn round and say that we never agreed to them.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I hold in my hand a copy of the resolution to which the gentleman from Kentucky has referred, offered by himself and adopted in this House on the 20th day of April, 1871.

That resolution is as follows:

> Resolved, That it being declared by the second section of the second article of the Constitution, "that the President shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided that two-thirds of the Senators present concur," the House of Representatives do not claim any agency in making treaties; but that when a treaty stipulates regulations on any of the subjects submitted by the Constitution to the power of Congress, it must depend for its execution as to such stipulations on the law or laws to be passed by Congress, and it is the constitutional right and duty of the House of Representatives in all such cases to deliberate on the expediency or inexpediency of carrying such treaties into effect, and to determine and act thereon as in their judgment may be most conducive to the public good.

Now, there is no question but that that is a sound principle; but I hold, like my colleague on the committee from Iowa, [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE,] that Congress has already deliberated upon those treaties. It has already considered those treaties and by its appropriations under them has done nothing more than comply with the very sound doctrine laid down in the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is mistaken in regard to the act of July 20, 1867, the act of Congress appointing the commissioners, who made a great portion of those treaties which were made in 1867 and 1868. He asserts that the law required that those commissioners should report their action to Congress. It does not require that; but the seventh section does require that "said commissioners report their doings under this act to the President of the United States, including any such treaties and all correspondence as well as evidence by them taken." These commissioners, consisting of four military officers and four citizens, after making the seven or eight great treaties, did report their action to the President of the United States, and both branches of Congress have deliberately considered those treaties and ratified them by making appropriations under the treaties. I believe that this nation cannot honorably and justly go back upon those treaties. Congress provided for the appointment of commissioners to make them; the commissioners did make them, and one branch of Congress, the Senate, has directly ratified them, and the other branch, the House of Representatives, has indirectly ratified them by deliberately considering them and appropriating large sums of money under them. I ask for a vote.

Mr. BECK. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I move to amend by inserting after the paragraph last read the following:

That the jurisdiction, management, and control of Fort Sill reservation, including the Comanches, Kiowas, Apaches, Sioux, Cheyennes, and other wild tribes of Indians inhabiting territory north and west of the State of Texas and in New Mexico, be, and the same are hereby, transferred from the jurisdiction of the Department of the Interior to the War Department. And it shall be the duty of the War Department to adopt such means as may be necessary to protect the lives and property of citizens of the United States.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I raise the point of order that the amendment changes existing law in that it transfers from the Interior Department to the War Department the Indians named in it. I will reserve my point until the gentleman has made his remarks.

Mr. GARFIELD. I insist upon the point of order now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GIDDINGS] on the point of order, if he desires to be heard.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I do not desire to say anything on that point, because I am satisfied it is good. But I was in hopes that it would be waived until this matter could be discussed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read the following:

ASSINABOINES.

For this amount, to be expended in such goods, provisions, and other articles as the President may, from time to time, determine, including transportation thereof, in instructing in agricultural and mechanical pursuits, in providing employés, educating children, procuring medicine and medical attendance, care for and support of the aged, sick, and infirm, for the helpless orphans of said Indians, and in any other respect to promote their comfort, civilization, and improvement, (including pay of one detective, $900; one cook, $480; and two laborers, at $600 each,) $30,000.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I move to amend by striking out the words "one detective, $900." If there is one class of persons more repugnant to our people than another it is the detective class. In the Internal Revenue Department and in the Post-Office Department they may be necessary; but to pay $900 for a detective in the Indian Department I think is entirely unnecessary.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. The Committee on Appropriations required the Department to enumerate the classes of employés, and the purposes for which the money was to be expended, as far as they could. It struck me, perhaps as it strikes the gentleman at first glance, that it was a little unusual to employ a detective in the Indian Department. But I have looked into the matter, and I find that for some years a detective has been employed, and he is necessary. There is a tendency on the part of bad white men to steal the cattle from the herds of these people. They violate the non-intercourse act by going on the reservations and selling whisky to the Indians. For over four years past they have been endeavoring to prostitute the Indians by every means possible. The Government, after using every other effort, employed men for the purpose of ferreting out the whisky-sellers and the men carrying on clandestine trade with the Indians. That is the purpose of this appropriation, and I think it is necessary.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I think I can explain in a word the necessity for this appropriation. These Assinaboines are stationed just south of the British-American line, and north of the Missouri River. It is the habit of these traders to land whisky on the Missouri River, run it across the reservation, and establish trading-posts on the north side of the line beyond our jurisdiction. In several cases we have almost had conflicts with the British authorities, and I believe complaints are now lodged in Washington against these men being allowed to take whisky across these reservations. I think it is necessary to have this detective to stop the transfer of this whisky.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I think the remarks of my friend from Missouri [Mr. PARKER] and of my friend on my right [Mr. MAGINNIS] show conclusively that this appropriation should be stricken out. It is not the province of the Government to assume police duties in regard to these Indians. If the Indians and others carry on trade against the local laws of the sections where they are, it is not the duty of the United States to appoint a police officer or a detective to prevent that trade. The argument shows clearly that this is no part of the duty of the Government. If it was in connection with the expenditure of the money which we are now appropriating, or for the protection of the Indians for whom we appropriate this money, it might be proper enough; but for simple police regulations, over which the Government has no jurisdiction, I think it is entirely out of place.

The amendment of Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

CHEYENNES AND ARAPAHOES.

For seventh of thirty installments provided to be expended under tenth article treaty of October 28, 1867, $20,000.

Mr. BECK. I move to amend by striking out the paragraph just read, together with the succeeding paragraphs under the same head, and to insert in lieu thereof that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The remaining clauses under the head were as follows:

For purchase of clothing, as per same article, $14,500.

For pay of physician and teacher, as per thirteenth article same treaty, $2,500.

For pay of carpenter, farmer, blacksmith, miller, and engineer, as per same article, $5,200.

For transportation of goods for the Cheyennes and Arapahoes, $5,000.

The clause proposed to be inserted in lieu was read, as follows:

For additional sum for subsistence of Cheyennes and Arapahoes who have been collected upon the reservations set apart for their use and occupation, $47,200.

Mr. BECK. I do not know that I will trouble the committee much more in regard to these treaties, except to say this: on page 6 of this bill we have appropriated $257,000 for the subsistence of the Arapahoes, Cheyennes, Apaches, Kiowas, and Comanches. Here the Cheyennes and Arapahoes appear again, and we are asked to give them for carpenters, blacksmiths, millers, and lots of other things equally useless, $47,200 more. I propose now to add $47,200 to the appropriation we have already passed, giving $250,000 for the subsistence of those Indians who have been collected on the reservation set apart for their use and occupation, instead of requiring this $47,200 to be wasted in the way in which it will be wasted if all these provisions are carried out.

I want to test the sense of the committee on this question. We have, as I said before, authorized the President by the act of last year to divert those sums as he might see fit. We have now appropriated $250,000 to gather the Indians on reservations. We have provided everywhere that unless they go on the reservations thay shall not have anything. If we did make treaties with them, all those treaties have been abrogated; for war abrogates all treaties. Both your commissioners say that with the exception of the little fragments that have come upon reservations, those tribes have been at war; and they call upon us to put them under the control of the military, because they cannot be otherwise suppressed. Those treaties, if they ever had the obligation of treaties, have been annulled by the act of the Indians themselves.

Now, we are willing to feed all Indians who will come upon reservations and behave themselves. Notwithstanding the wars they have been carrying on and the depredations they have been committing, we are willing to appropriate all the money that we proposed to give them even when they were at peace with us, provided they will come upon reservations and live peaceably. Instead of providing for these vast numbers of employés, I propose that we expend this $47,200, as we do the other, for the benefit of these people on the reservations, and the support of their stock. But when we have put these Kiowas, Comanches, Arapahoes, and all the different bands on reservations, we still, according to these treaty arrangements, supply them with "farmers," "engineers," "millers," "physicians," "teachers," &c. Six or seven of these fellows are provided for each band. In other words, we propose to waste the money of the people, which should be expended for the benefit of the Indians, by giving it to these men who never perform any service. I propose to test the sense of the committee upon the question of expending this $47,200 for the benefit of the Indians themselves, and not for the benefit of the hangers-on who go there to demoralize the Indians.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. BECK, there were on a division—ayes 30, noes 75; no quorum voting.

Mr. BECK. I propose to make this a test question. If the gentleman [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE] who has charge of this bill will allow a separate vote on this proposition in the House, I will not ask that a quorum shall be required now, nor will I test the question again in any other form. If the House votes down this proposition on a call of the yeas and nays, I shall not say another word.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I prefer to have the question settled here.

The CHAIRMAN. A further count being demanded, the Chair orders tellers; and appoints the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. BECK, and the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. LOUGHRIDGE.

Mr. BECK. I do not like to consume the time of the committee. I believe the amendment is lost. I withdraw the call for a further count.

The CHAIRMAN. No further count being called for, the amendment is rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For last of twenty installments, for six smiths and assistants, per second and fifth articles treaty of September 30, 1854, $5,040.

For last of twenty installments, for the support of six smith-shops, per second and fifth articles treaty of September 30, 1854, $1,320.

Mr. BECK. I move to amend by striking out these two paragraphs. I make this motion for the purpose of putting an inquiry to the gentleman who has the management of this bill. Here is a provision for "six blacksmiths and assistants," and a provision for the support of six blacksmith-shops—"smith-shops" as the bill calls them—I suppose they are blacksmith-shops. Then the next paragraph provides for a "seventh smith and assistant." Then in the next paragraph there is provision for a "smith and shop during the pleasure of the President." All these provisions are for the Chippewas of Lake Superior.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman will observe that these provisions are the "last of twenty installments." This is the end of the matter. As we have kept faith for nineteen years, let us not break it when but one more payment is to be made.

Mr. BECK. I visited about a year ago the country where this band is located; and there is but one blacksmith on the reservation. If there is any gentleman here representing Northern Wisconsin, and who has visited that reservation, he knows that on the Apostles' Islands there is but one blacksmith-shop; yet here we have provision for seven smiths and seven shops.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman will notice that the eighth section of this bill provides that the Secretary of the Interior may make such diversion of the funds appropriated in this bill as the justice of the case may seem to require. The gentleman will find that provision on the seventy-ninth page. There are cases where the provisions of these treaties cannot be departed from without breaking the public faith; but this eighth section gives to the Secretary of the Interior a general authority to set apart for other purposes the annuities under existing treaties and laws wherever in his judgment such diversion will advance the interests of the Indians.

Mr. BECK. I am very glad to observe that provision; I had not seen it before.

Mr. GARFIELD. Of course where the Indians are willing that such diversion shall be made, and it can be done without breaking faith, the Secretary of the Interior will do so if thereby the welfare of the Indians is to be advanced. Of course he is not authorized to break treaties, but he is empowered to apply these moneys according to the wishes of the Indians, wherever it may be done without breaking faith. If it can be done in this case it will be done.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. For the information of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] I would remark that there may be here a surplus number of blacksmiths and blacksmith-shops.

It will be remembered by gentlemen that this Government has made a series of treaties with these Chippewas of Lake Superior. I think forty or fifty different treaties have been made with the Chippewas, and under these treaties they are entitled to these smiths or smith-shops, and the funds necessary for that purpose. I spent the whole recess looking up all of these Indian treaties, for I thought, with the gentleman from Kentucky, we had a little too much blacksmithing, and I found under these treaties they are entitled to all of these things, and we cannot get out of making the appropriation if we intend to comply with our treaty obligations.

Mr. BECK. I wish to give the Indians the amount they are entitled to, but I do not wish to provide for blacksmith-shops not necessary.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I will tell the gentleman from Kentucky that they have been using the surplus fund for educational and other purposes.

Mr. BECK. I am glad to hear it. I withdraw my amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support of smith and shop, during the pleasure of the President, as per seventh and twelfth articles treaty of April 7, 1866, $600.

Mr. BECK. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that can be stricken out at least.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. We have no right to do it, but it can be done by consent of the President of the United States.

Mr. BECK. I hope he will do it then.

The Clerk read as follows:

For interest on $675,168, at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, under provisions of third article treaty of June 14, 1866, $33,758.40: Provided, That all annuities appropriated for in this act for the use of Creeks may be used for and paid to them in such manner as the Secretary of the Interior may deem most conducive to their good.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move to strike out the proviso.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For interest on $95,945.95, at 5 per cent. per annum, for educational and other beneficial purposes, per treaty of May 18, 1854, $4,797.29.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move to add after what has been read the following:

For settlement, support, and civilization of the Kickapoo Indians in the Indian Territory lately removed from Mexico, and such as may be removed hereafter, $15,000.

We brought these Indians from Mexico and placed them upon this Indian reservation, and of course must take care of them, and in order to take care of them this appropriation is necessary. It is recommended by the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For this amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary to complete the removal of the remaining Kickapoo and other American Indian tribes roving on the borders of Texas and Mexico, to reservations within the Indian Territory, not to exceed $65,000; and this sum to be made available for said purpose from and after the passage of this act: Provided, That no liability shall be incurred for said removal for any sum in excess of the amount herein appropriated.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move to insert at the end of the paragraph just read the following proviso:

Provided further, That the expense of removing said Indians shall not exceed sixty dollars for each Indian removed to the reservation, and no liabilities shall be incurred or payments made for a greater amount; but this proviso shall not be so construed as to prevent the payment of the salary of the commissioner appointed to remove them, and his legitimate and proper traveling and personal expenses.

Mr. HANCOCK. That should be in the plural and should provide for the legitimate and proper traveling and personal expenses of the commissioners.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I agree to that modification of the amendment.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows, under the head of Klamath and Modoc Indians:

For ninth of twenty installments, to pay salary and subsistence of one physician one miller, and two school teachers, as per fifth article treaty of October 14, 1864, $3,600.

Mr. BECK. I should like to know whether all the Modocs have not been removed to the Indian reservation in the Indian Territory during last year, and whether there is any necessity for making this appropriation for Modocs in Oregon?

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. Some of the Modocs have been removed to the reservation in the Indian Territory during last summer. There are, however, some fifty of them left upon the reservation in Oregon.

Mr. BECK. Can these provisions be complied with so far as the Modocs are concerned? Ought not the aggregate sum to be given for their removal and subsistence?

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. The treaty provisions relate to the Klamath reservation. There are there now about fifty Modoc Indians and the others are Klamaths. These appropriations apply to that reservation. The Modocs who have been removed to the Indian Territory have nothing appropriated for them in this bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mixed Shoshones, Bannacks, and Sheepeaters:

For this amount, to be expended in such goods, provisions, and other articles as the President may from time to time determine, including transportation thereof, instructing in agricultural and mechanical pursuits, in providing employés, educating children, procuring medicine and medical attendance, care for and support of the aged, sick, and infirm, for the helpless orphans of said Indians, and in any other respect to promote their civilization, comfort, and improvement, $20,000.

Mr. SHANKS. I move to strike out all after the heading in the paragraph, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

For this amount, to be expended under direction of the President in assisting these Indians to remove to and locate on the Fort Hall reservation in Idaho Territory, and to aid them in educational and agricultural pursuits on said reservation, $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

OMAHAS.

For seventh of fifteen installments of this amount, being third series, in money or otherwise, per fourth article treaty of March 16, 1854, $20,000.

For ninth of ten installments, for keeping in repair a grist and saw mill, and support of blacksmith-shop, per eighth article treaty of March 16, 1854, and third article treaty of March 6, 1865, $300.

For ninth of ten installments, for pay of one engineer, $1,200.

For ninth of ten installments, for pay of one miller, per same treaties, $900.

For ninth of ten installments, for pay of one farmer, per same treaties, $900.

For ninth of ten installments, for pay of blacksmith, per same treaties, $900.

For seventh of ten installments, for support of blacksmith-shop and supplying tools for the same, $300.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I offer the following amendment:

Add to the end of the paragraph the following: "For one matron, $600."

The Clerk read the following, under appropriation for "Pawnees:"

For pay of two farmers, two blacksmiths and two apprentices, one miller and apprentice, and two teachers, (and for one shoemaker and one carpenter, $1,680,) $5,780.

Mr. LOUHRIDGE. I move to amend the paragraph so that it will read:

For pay of two farmers, two blacksmiths and two apprentices, one miller and apprentice, two teachers, one shoemaker, and one carpenter, $7,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the paragraph making an appropriation for the Pottawatomies.

Mr. HANCOCK. I offer the following amendment:

Add to the paragraph the following proviso:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, instructed and required, in paying out the several foregoing annuities, to pay to the Prairie band of the said Pottawatomies that proportion of money which they are and were entitled to under the terms and stipulations of said several treaties and the settlement and agreement had and entered into by and between said Prairie band and the Citizen band of said Pottawatomies, entered into on the 18th day of July, 1873, and the accounts of said bands shall be so adjusted as to give effect to said agreement.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HANCOCK] whether he has had any communication with the Department of the Interior in relation to this matter?

Mr. HANCOCK. I will state, Mr. Chairman, the reason why I offer this amendment. It is a matter that I was not conversant with, nor am I now conversant with it. But the representatives of the bands, the Prairie band especially, allege that injustice has been done, and is likely to be done, to the Prairie band by the distribution of the annuities they are entitled to.

As I get the facts they are about these: The Pottawatomies some years ago divided into what we term the Prairie band and the Citizen band, and under the terms of the treaty stipulation they had an agreement among themselves that there should be a census taken of the entire tribe. It was found that of the Citizen band there were fourteen hundred, and of the Prairie band seven hundred and eighty. It was agreed they should receive annuities pro rata per capita. In the payment the Citizen's band have received an amount corresponding to some fifteen hundred—nearly sixteen hundred—while the Prairie band has only received such amount as would correspond to some six hundred or six hundred and fifty. By an agreement entered into, referred to in the proviso I have offered, they agree among themselves to adjust this matter. I ask that for the information of the committee this agreement may be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS, CENTRAL SUPERINTENDENCY,
Lawrence, Kansas, July 18, 1873.

Pending an investigation into the rights respectively of certain children of Citizen or Sectionizing Pottawatomies to allotments of lands and moneys under the treaty of 1861, between the United States and said nation of Indians, whereby it is claimed that the rights of the Prairie band would be affected, and in lieu of said investigation, it is agreed by and between the respective parties in interest, to wit: the Citizen or Sectionizing Indians on the one part, and the Prairie Indians on the other part, to settle all matters of difference between us, arising under said treaty and subsequent or supplemental treaties, upon the following basis or ratio, to wit:

First. We accept and admit the original enrollment of the Pottawatomie Nation under said treaty of 1861, containing twenty-one hundred and eighty names, as correct.

Second. We admit that of the twenty-one hundred and eighty persons belonging to said nation the Sectionizers or Citizen Indians number fourteen hundred, and are entitled to fourteen hundred and twenty-one hundred and eightieths parts of all the assets of the nation, and no more.

Third. We admit and agree that of the twenty-one hundred and eighty persons so enrolled, the Prairie band number, and have numbered, seven hundred and eighty, and are entitled to seven hundred and eighty twenty-one hundred and eightieths parts of the entire assets of the nation, and no more.

Fourth. We agree that the entire assets of the nation, as they existed at the time of the original enrollment, under said treaty, are to be divided upon the foregoing basis.

Fifth. We agree that whatever amount of the common funds of the tribe has been drawn by the Sectionizers or Citizen Indians, since and at the time of the original enrollment under said treaty of 1861, in excess of the amount due them under said basis or ratio, (fourteen hundred and twenty-one hundred and eightieths,) shall be refunded to the Prairie band out of the Sectionizers' share of the funds now due, or to become due, to the tribe; applying their share of the school fund first, and the remainder to be paid out of any funds due said tribe, being that portion of the same accruing to the Sectionizers or Citizen Indians of the said tribe.

It is understood by this agreement that the balance claimed to be due to eighty-six children and others enrolled by late Agent Morris, and provided for by the appropriation bill of the last Congress, shall be paid as provided, and the Prairie band shall be reimbursed therefor out of the Sectionizing or Citizen Indians' share of the funds due the tribe from the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railroad Company, or to become due hereafter.

Mr. HANCOCK. The amendment in the nature of a proviso is simply to give effect to that agreement, which the Indians seem to have come to in a spirit of justice and fair dealing as between themselves. It is a matter in which the Government have no other interest than to see that justice is done. The Prairie band insist that they have not received such amount as by reason of their numbers under the treaty stipulations and agreements they were entitled to receive. This is conceded on the part of the Citizens' band. And it is simply to carry out that understanding and agreement, and to give to each what they are justly entitled to, that I propose this amendment.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I would again ask the gentleman from Texas whether he has consulted the Interior Department in relation to this matter?

Mr. HANCOCK. I knew nothing about this matter until this morning. I have not consulted the Secretary of the Interior or the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, because I have had no opportunity to do so. It matters not, however, what may be the view of either one of those officers. If the facts are not as represented in that agreement, of course there is nothing obligatory on the Secretary. The proviso is based on the agreement being what it purports to be.

If there had been time I would have asked that this should be passed over until we of the sub-committee could have looked into it; but as the proviso can do no harm, and as it is hoped we can get through the bill to-day, I think it better to offer this amendment now.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. This matter has not been before the Committee on Appropriations or any committee of the House. We are in the habit of making these appropriations to carry out treaties, and then leaving it to the Secretary of the Interior to apportion the money among the tribe as justice and right may dictate. It seems to me that this is a very poor place to go into an examination as to the proper mode of dividing such appropriations among the Indians. I for one should dislike to undertake it. We have heard read an agreement between some of these Indians, but we do not know that it was not an agreement between a portion of the Indians only. I should dislike very much to act in a matter of this kind, which is brought before us without notice and without being submitted to the Department or to any committee of the House. I have great confidence in the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. HANCOCK,] but I think he ought not to insist on the amendment offered in this way without notice.

Mr. HANCOCK. The gentleman has had as much notice as I have. I have stated to the committee all the information I have on the subject. The purpose of the amendment is simply to carry out the agreement which has been read, and it does not propose to interfere in any way with the duty of the Commissioner. If it be the fact that the Indians have made this settlement, it is but sheer justice that it should be carried out and effect given to it. I do not know that there is any feeling adverse to it on the part of any one; but when they insist that their rights shall be respected in the appropriation of the money, I think they insist upon nothing but what they are entitled to.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. Will not the Secretary of the Interior carry out any agreement that may have been made between the Indians?

Mr. HANCOCK. I cannot answer that question; but this amendment is nothing more than declaratory of his duty. If he has not been carrying out the agreement among the Indians, he ought to do it.

Mr. AVERILL. Will the gentleman from Texas yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HANCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. AVERILL. I have but just come into the House from the committee-room, and I can only anticipate the subject which the gentleman is talking about from conversations I have heard upon the matter heretofore. I have but just finished reading a communication from the department on this very question. I will say, Mr. Chairman, that delegates from these Pottawatomies, the Prairie band, have on several occasions pressed their claim to individual members of the committee, and the committee have intended to take up the question and give it a full and fair consideration; but on account of not getting proper information from the Department, they have been totally unable to so consider it. This morning we received a communication from the department on the subject. The claim is that, by an arrangement made on different occasions, there was a division between what is termed the "Citizen band" and the Pottawatomies or "Prairie band." That, however, might have been explained by the gentleman from Texas before I came into the Hall.

Mr. HANCOCK. Yes; and I had the agreement read.

Mr. AVERILL. The "Citizen band" numbers sixteen hundred and ten.

Mr. HANCOCK. No; fourteen hundred and ten.

Mr. AVERILL. Fourteen hundred and ten according to the claim of the "Prairie band," and the "Prairie band" numbers seven hundred and eighty. As, however, the matter was adjudicated and decided by the commissioners and under the census last taken, there were but five hundred and seventy of the "Prairie band" and, if my memory serves me, sixteen hundred and ten of the "Citizen band." Now the Prairie Indians come in and allege that there was an error or fraudulent count, and they base their claim on that fact. As I said before, the committee have been unable to decide the question in any way, and have sought information from the Department. We this morning received a communication which I was just reading when I was informed that this question was being considered; and for the information of the committee, if the amendment is pressed by the gentleman from Texas, I will ask to have read a portion of that communication. But if the gentleman will withdraw the amendment and let the matter pass until it can be further considered, he will perhaps save time.

Mr. HANCOCK. I must decline to withdraw it.

Mr. AVERILL. Then I ask that it be passed by until it can be more judiciously considered by the committee.

Mr. HANCOCK. I would like, if there is time, that the whole paragraph shall be passed over for the present.

Mr. AVERILL. I am as desirous as the gentleman from Texas, or as any man can be, that justice should be done to all the Indians. That is the aim and effort of every member of the Committee on Indian Affairs; and I request that this matter be passed over for the present, that it may be more fully and fairly considered.

Mr. HANCOCK. I am willing that the paragraph shall be passed over for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas withdraw the amendment and ask leave to offer it again hereafter?

Mr. HANCOCK. No; but I ask that by unanimous consent the paragraph be passed over.

There was no objection, and the paragraph was passed over informally.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I desire to make a correction in the early part of the bill which will reduce the amount appropriated by the bill $1,000. It is in the clause in lines 49 and 50, on page 3, which provides for an Indian agent for the Sac and Fox Indians in Iowa, at a salary of $1,500. It will be recollected that that clause was amended when it was first under consideration before the committee so as to make the salary $1,500. I move to strike out $1,500, and to insert $500 in lieu thereof.

The Clerk read the following:

QUAPAWS.

For education, during the pleasure of the President, per third article treaty of May 13, 1833, $1,600.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move to reduce the appropriation in the paragraph just read to $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

RIVER CROWS.

For this amount, to be expended for such goods, provisions, and other articles as the President from time to time may determine, including transportation thereof, in instructing in agricultural and mechanical pursuits, in providing employés, educating children, procuring medicine and medical attendance, care for and support of the aged, sick, and infirm, for the helpless orphans of said Indians, and in any other respect to promote their civilization, comfort, and improvement, (including pay of five laborers, at $600 each per annum,) $30,000.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move to strike out the words in parentheses, "including pay of five laborers, at $600 each."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following, under the head of "Sacs and Foxes of the Mississippi:"

For interest on $800,000, at 5 per cent. per second article treaty of October 11, 1842, $40,000.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move to add to the paragraph last read the following:

Of which sum $1,200 shall be paid for a physician for the agency.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

SHOSHONES, BANNACKS, AND OTHER BANDS OF INDIANS IN IDAHO AND SOUTHEASTERN OREGON.

For this amount, to be expended in such goods, provisions, or other articles as the President may from time to time determine, including transportation, in instructing in agricultural pursuits, in providing employés, educating children, procuring medicine and medical attendance, care for and support of the aged, sick, and infirm, for the helpless orphans of said Indians, and in any other respect to promote their civilization, comfort, and improvement, (including pay of physician, $1,500; miller, engineer, carpenter, and blacksmith, at $900 each per annum; and one mill-hand, at $600 per annum,) $20,000.

Mr. SHANKS. That portion of these Indians who are in Idaho are under three chiefs, Eagle Eye, Bannack John, and Winnamucca John, who roam over the country. I move as a substitute for the paragraph just read that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

For this amount, to be expended by directions of the President in assisting the roving bands of Indians in Southern Idaho to move to and locate on the Fort Hall reservation in Idaho, and to assist them in educational and agricultural pursuits on said reservation, $10,000.

For this amount, to be expended by directions of the President in assisting the roving bands of Indians in Southeastern Oregon to move to and locate on some proper reservation in Oregon, and to assist them in agricultural pursuits thereon, $10,000.

Mr. SHANKS. This amendment adds nothing to the appropriation. It simply divides this fund into two portions, and requires these Indians to be located on reservations.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I have a great deal of confidence in the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. SHANKS,] and therefore I agree to his amendment.

The Clerk read the following:

For this amount, to be expended in the purchase of beef, flour, bacon, and sugar, in proportionate quantities, for thirty thousand persons; and for subsistence of the Yankton Sioux, and for purposes of civilization, $1,200,000.

Mr. STEELE. I move to amend the paragraph just read by adding thereto the following:

Provided, That no portion of the appropriation hereby made for feeding or furnishing provisions to the tribes of the Sioux Indians, parties to the treaty of April 29, 1868, shall be used for that purpose until the said tribes shall agree to remain upon the reservation established by said treaty, and to relinquish all right to have any country outside the limits of said reservation regarded as unceded Indian territory, and the right to hunt outside the boundaries of said reservation.

The amendment I have proposed is to keep the Indians on the reservation established by the treaty of April 29, 1868. It is an amendment of vital importance to the people of Nebraska, Wyoming, and Montana. Under that treaty the Indians were given a reservation that extended from the Missouri River, on the east, to the eastern boundary of Wyoming, on the west, and from the northern boundary of Nebraska to the forty-sixth parallel of latitude, the extent of the reservation being about twenty-five million acres. It embraces an area equal to that of the entire State of Ohio, larger than either of the great States of Maine, South Carolina, Kentucky, or Indiana, and larger than the combined area of the States of New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, and Delaware. This domain, magnificent in its proportions, was the ground chosen by these Indians at that time for their own reservation—the chosen ground of the Sioux.

Not only was this great reservation set apart by that treaty, but the northwestern portion of the sovereign State of Nebraska was declared to be unceded Indian territory, upon which no white man should legally go, (and this without the consent of the State,) and the northeastern portion of the Territory of Wyoming was in like manner declared to be unceded Indian territory. And over this unceded territory the Indians were to be allowed to hunt, so that the reservation proper was but about one-half of the area of the almost boundless territorial empire which by the provisions of the treaty of 1868 was set aside for the Sioux, who number from twenty to twenty-five thousand.

All that we ask now is that these Indians shall be confined to this reservation; that they shall be kept out of the State of Nebraska and out of the Territory of Wyoming, and confined to this reservation.

We seek to do no injustice to these tribes of Indians; all that we seek is a measure of self-protection and self-preservation. It is no injustice to confine these Indians to this reservation, because by the treaty they entered into at that time they expressly stipulated and agreed that they would relinquish all right ever to permanently occupy any land outside of their reservation; but they reserved to themselves the right to hunt outside of the reservation. All the difficulty and all the trouble that arises between the white settlers and the Indians in that section of the country arises from this very privilege of allowing these Indians to go from their reservation under the pretense of hunting; because it is all the same to them whether it is a white man or a buffalo that they hunt when they are off their reservation.

I wish to call the attention of the committee to the recommendations of the Secretary of the Interior in reference to this very subject, in order to show that this amendment is in the right direction and carries out the views of every man who knows anything about this Indian problem, who knows that no progress will ever be made toward a settlement of this Indian question until these Indians are confined to their reservations and have an opportunity of being civilized, which they never will have as long as they hunt and roam over the country.

I call the attention of the committee to the report of the Secretary of the Interior made at this session. On page 6 he says:

The first steps toward the permanent settlement of Indians in fixed homes is the establishment and rigid enforcement of regulations to keep them all upon reservations. This can only be done, at present, upon some of the reservations by a display of a sufficient military force near the reservation to punish all violations of such requirements. It is believed that many Indians who are subsisted by the Government persist in making forays upon white settlements and upon neighboring tribes, and then retreat to the refuge of their reservations where they can secure their spoils, and be fed and recuperated for fresh outrages. It will be found to be a measure of mercy to all if such Indians can be punished as they deserve.

Again, on page 7 of the report, he says:

Attention is invited to the eleventh article of the treaty of 1868 with the Sioux Nation, granting them certain hunting privileges within the State of Nebraska, and without the bounds of their reservation. On account of the violation of the other provisions of that treaty by the Sioux, and the scarcity of game in the country referred to, the Government will, I think, be justified in abrogating that article, and I respectfully suggest such action.

This view of the case is also reiterated by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs on pages 6 and 8 of his report. In language which I will not detain the committee by reciting he calls attention to this same provision and advises that it shall be abolished.

But it may be said that this provision should not be put upon an appropriation bill for the reason that it is a violation of a treaty of the United States and breaks the plighted faith of the Government. But there is no such obstacle in the way of doing justice in this case.

By the bill under consideration the sum of $1,200,000 is appropriated for feeding the Sioux—almost one-fourth the entire amount appropriated by the bill—and yet not one dollar of this vast amount is appropriated by virtue of any treaty stipulation; it is entirely a gratuity on the part of the Government to the Indians. The obligations upon the United States to feed the Sioux, by the treaty of 1868, will have been fully performed on the 1st day of July, 1874, supplies of food having been furnished for four years as required by the treaty.

Should not the Indians concede something for so munificent an appropriation, and is it not the duty of the Government to demand such pledges for the future as will protect its citizens, remove a standing menace to the people of Wyoming and Nebraska, and an impediment in the way of their progress and prosperity?

By the terms of the treaty of 1868, clothing, &c., was to be supplied to the Sioux for thirty years, and food and provisions for four years. Already the Indians are claiming that supplies of food are to be furnished for thirty years, and I warn this House that if this appropriation is made, and the supplies furnished for the ensuing fiscal year, a grave and fatal, I might say a criminal, mistake will be made unless an understanding of the terms upon which the issues are made be first had. The consideration of $1,200,000 would be an equivalent for the surrender of the hunting privileges and the rights of unceded Indian territory; especially should it be so considered in view of the fact that a large appropriation will have to be made annually for a term of years for the same purpose.

By the eleventh article of the treaty of 1868 the Indians relinquished all right to occupy permanently the territory outside the reservation.

The Indians at the time of making that treaty would not relinquish their hunting rights, but there will be little difficulty in obtaining such concessions now, as I am informed by reliable authority that not to exceed two hundred to three hundred now annually leave their reservation to hunt; in addition is the reflection that the Sioux should be considerably christianized and civilized since 1868, as the Government will have expended by July 1, 1874, for that purpose, since making the Fort Laramie treaty of 1868, the modest sum of $7,967,500.

In addition to the great advantages of this measure to the State of Nebraska and the Territory of Wyoming, it would add new life and hope to the Territory of Montana, which is now virtually isolated from an eastern market. If Northeastern Wyoming were opened up to settlement and travel, it would give Montana an outlet to the eastern market, which would save its people six hundred miles of railroad travel, for Cheyenne, in Wyoming, is as near to Helena, Montana, as is Corinne, six hundred miles further west, to which point freight and passengers are now compelled to go, and it would bring the trade of Montana six hundred miles nearer to Omaha, Saint Louis, Chicago, New York, and other eastern points. Truly here is a practical question of cheap transportation worthy of consideration. Cheyenne, being the junction of the Union Pacific and Kansas Pacific Railroads, would give the people of Montana railroad competition, while the wagon-route from Cheyenne to Helena is the same distance as from Corinne to Helena, but of such natural advantages as that freighting can be done for 20 per cent. less.

Who can measure the advantages to Montana if the fifty million pounds of freight shipped to that Territory from Saint Louis and over the Union Pacific Railroad for the years 1871, 1872, 1873 could have been shipped at such reduced cost as would be brought about by saving six hundred miles of railroad travel and 20 per cent. of wagon transportation?

Mr. Chairman, this subject is worthy of grave and careful consideration. It would be a measure of relief and security to Nebraska, Montana, and Wyoming, and would put them on the high road to development, progress, and prosperity. It would do no injustice to the Indians, for it would be a step toward their final civilization, and a step in that direction recommended by the Interior Department.

The people whom I have the honor to represent make no objection to the Government dealing kindly and generously with the Indian; but they do think that, while aid is given the Indian with such a liberal and lavish hand, some little thought should be given to the peace, welfare, and safety of the white settlers; and they pray this House to give the white citizens some assurance of peace and safety by the adoption of the proposed amendment.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. If we want to have war with the Sioux, which will cost us $10,000,000 at least, the coming summer, this is a good way to have it; I have no doubt of that. I wish simply to state that when this treaty with the Sioux was made they had the right to this hunting ground in Nebraska and north of the North Platte. That right still exists under the treaty, but the provision by which we stipulated to feed them, for which object we appropriate $1,250,000, has expired. We are not bound, I admit, to make the appropriation provided for in the bill.

The committee have thought on this question a great deal. I went to the Department and consulted with the Secretary of the Interior. The fact is that these Sioux Indians believe that the treaty entitles them to these supplies for thirty years. They are wild Indians; a great portion of them are as wild as deers. They have in their minds the impression that the treaty entitles them to the supplies for thirty years, and that if we insist otherwise we are guilty of fraud. We can if we choose say to the President that these supplies shall not be given them unless they agree to give up this hunting territory in Nebraska. Bishop Hare, of the Episcopal Church, who has been with those Indians during the last two years—as honorable a gentleman as any living, and who knows more about the Sioux Indians than any gentleman in this House, for he devotes his entire time and efforts to their benefit—came before our committee the other day, and said it was perfectly impossible to enforce a provision of this kind; that if we refuse to feed those Indians we must fight them. There is no doubt in my mind, there is no doubt in the mind of the Department, there is no doubt in the mind of the agent, there is no doubt in the mind of Bishop Hare, that if we refuse to feed these Indians we must fight them. General Ord says that if we undertake to fight them, at least $10,000,000 will be required. The question is simply whether we shall fight the Sioux or feed them.

I admit that we have the right to say to the Sioux, "Unless you leave Nebraska we will not feed you." We may if we choose say that, and then we can have a fight with them. I do not want any war with the Sioux, and I should not think the people of the borders would want any war with them.

Mr. STEELE. No, sir; I say to the gentleman from Iowa that if we did not know that this provision would be accepted by those Indians, we would not ask to have it adopted.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I should not think that the people of Minnesota would want any war with the Sioux Indians. I should not think that Congress, looking at our exchequer only, would want any war.

We are not obliged by treaty to appropriate $1,250,000 provided in this bill for feeding the Sioux Indians. But all through this bill there are provisions not required by any treaty. We have been paying money to the Apaches and other tribes without any treaty. We propose now to appropriate this money for the Sioux (although there is no treaty obligation) in order to avoid war with them. We have placed them upon a reservation on which no white man could live; they can make nothing there; there is nothing for them to eat. We must feed them. We tell them that if they leave the reservation we will shoot them. We might as well put men in jail and tell them we will not feed them. The gentleman from Montana [Mr. STEELE] proposes to say to these Indians that unless they give up the hunting-ground that they now have under a treaty we will not feed them. Now, the Committee on Appropriations have agreed upon the following provisions:

That the President may withhold the said supplies from the said Indians, or any band of them, until they shall consent to remain north of the Niobrara River, and outside of Wyoming Territory, if he deems it expedient so to do.

This places the matter within the control of the President. If he sends his commissioners there and they can make a treaty to this effect with the Indians, all right. If the Indians can be convinced that they will not get any food unless they consent to this, they will do so.

Mr. STEELE. If the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE] will allow me, I will say that we have no objection to this provision being made for these Sioux. We want it made, of course; but we want these Indians confined upon their reservation.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. Suppose they say they will not go there.

Mr. STEELE. I am willing to modify my amendment so that it will put the matter entirely within the control of the President, by adding this proviso:

And provided further, That after an actual effort shall have been made——

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I resume the floor. I offer an amendment as a substitute which I send up to the Clerk's desk to be read. I move it with the recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations. It was drawn up by the Secretary of the Interior and will accomplish the purpose.

Mr. STEELE. I would like to know how I lost the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. By your time expiring.

Mr. STEELE. I did not understand the committee was under the five-minute rule to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I rise to oppose the amendment.

Mr. STEELE. I have not yet concluded my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa who is in charge of the bill from the Committee on Appropriations offers an amendment in the nature of a substitute, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, The President may withhold the said supplies from said Indians or any band there until they shall consent to remain north of the Niobrara and outside of Wyoming, if he deem it expedient so to do.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Mr. Chairman, I am a little surprised at the position taken by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. STEELE] and the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE.] I am inclined to think that amendment is opposed to some of the amendments recently made to the Constitution of the United States. I believe the thirteenth amendment—and the gentleman from Iowa knows something of that, as he was here at the time it was adopted—did away with slavery, and yet we find the gentleman here offering a provision that will make slaves of the Indians of this country as the negroes were slaves before the adoption of the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Now, you carry out your treaty stipulations with the Indians on what condition? Upon the condition that they shall go into banishment or go upon some reservation in some locality and remain there; that they shall not have freedom of locomotion; that they shall not walk and move when they please and wherever they please, but shall confine themselves to some spot or particular place on the earth where they are just as much enslaved as though they were put into your jails and penitentiaries. This is the proposition which is now offered to the committee for adoption; and these gentlemen who have been such sticklers for the rights of the negro, who have been so anxious to strike the shackles from everybody, now propose again to make the experiment which our forefathers engaged in and failed.

When this country was first discovered and settled our fathers attempted to place shackles upon the Indians, but they did not succeed. You will not succeed any more in doing it to-day. The effort has been made and never was successful, and never will be successful, and I say never ought to be successful.

Deal fairly and justly with the Indians, fulfill your obligations with them, teach them by your example, by civilization, and justice, which is the great principle of civilization if there is anything in it worth having, and you will then be able to control them. Quit attempting to make Christian associations out of the Indians. The last thing you ought to attempt with them is to join them in Christian associations and confine them to some particular place on this continent and to keep them there. We have had enough of Christian associations, so far as attempting to christianize these savages into the same order and arrangement that you have in your own civilized society is concerned.

The farther you can keep the Indians from Christians, so far as my experience extends, the better they are. In their natural state they have been pretty tolerable good men. They set an example to Christian and civilized men. Since they have come into contact with Christian associations and been subject to the control of your ministers and your gospel-dispensers, they have grown worse and worse, and continue to grow worse and worse every day. It is conceded on all hands there has been nothing so injurious to them and driven them into such hostility to the white man as the attempt to control them by what you call Christian associations. Deal justly with them and then you will make honest men of the Indians. Set them an example, keep your treaty stipulations with them, keep them sacredly, keep them honestly, not because of their strength or power to enforce them, but because of their very weakness. There is no justice and no honor in a man keeping a stipulation with another in the presence of superior physical power; but the honest man, the just man, the honest nation and the just nation, will keep treaty stipulations more sacredly on account of the very weakness of those with whom they have been entered into.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I should like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin before he sits down to point out the portion of my amendment to which he objects.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Why, that portion which undertakes to make slaves of the Indians.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. What portion is that?

Mr. ELDREDGE. If you confine a man to any particular spot on this earth, and say he shall not go beyond that, you make a slave of him. What makes a man a freeman in contradistinction to a slave? It is the right to exercise the powers with which God has endowed him, be they great or small.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. Will the gentleman answer me a question? What portion of the substitute makes slaves of the Indians?

Mr. ELDREDGE. I have answered the gentleman's question. It is that portion which would confine them to any particular spot.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. What portion is that?

Mr. ELDREDGE. It is the whole spirit and effect of the amendment. You do not agree to carry out the treaty stipulations unless the Indian consents to be your slave, unless he consents to be confined to some spot, just as if he were to consent to go into your jail or penitentiary. On that condition you perform your treaty stipulations with him; if he will submit to your control, then you will carry out your agreement.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. That is not the effect of the substitute at all.

Mr. STEELE. The very reason which the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDREDGE] gives why these men should be kept away from Christian associations, and away from contact with Christians, would lead him to vote for the amendment offered by me. And if the gentleman is in good faith when he does not believe that contact with Christians is good for these people, he ought to vote to keep them as far away from Christians as possible.

There is no question here of abrogating any treaty stipulation with the Indians by this provision. There is no treaty stipulation for the expenditure of this $1,200,000 that the gentleman from Wisconsin is so anxious that we should vote out of the Treasury, in order to keep a treaty stipulation that does not exist.

Mr. Chairman, I notice that the love and respect for the Indian, and the desire to have him roam about among citizens and among their homes and families, are on the part of gentlemen who have driven the Indian from the pale of their civilization and beyond their limits, and who care nothing for the safety of the people among whom they are now located. Every man who knows anything about this Indian question at all knows that it is not safe to allow these semi-civilized Indians to roam about, hunting and wandering and robbing. Now on this reservation, I am told by one of the best agents in the service of the Government, for the last two years not more than two or three hundred Indians have availed themselves of this stipulation and this treaty right to hunt outside of their limits. If that be the case, it cannot be very difficult to obtain the consent of the Indians to what would be an act of mercy to them and an act of justice and protection to the white citizens.

Mr. CROUNSE. I desire to offer an amendment to the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE.] I wish to move to make the northern boundary line of Nebraska one of the limits instead of the Niobrara River.

I am not very tenacious about the limits. I apprehend that the Indians would recognize and understand the boundary limit as fixed by a river which is well known and runs near the boundary line of Nebraska. But I rise for the purpose of asserting a principle which I apprehend should be recognized by this committee and established by Congress. I find by volume 15 of the Statutes at Large that a treaty was entered into, by the Sioux Indians on the one side, and the United States represented by General Sherman and others on the other part, which denies to the people of Nebraska subsequent to the time they were admitted into this Union as one of the sovereign States—denies to the people of Nebraska or any other white men the right to roam over or trespass on one-quarter of the entire area of that State. Now, I apprehend that that power does not exist, and the gentlemen who represented the United States in that matter disclaim any right on the part of the United States to enter into any one of the States and set apart a portion solely for the Indians and deny to the white man the right to exercise any control or put his foot upon it.

Can any gentleman conceive that state of affairs as existing with reference to his own State? Members of this House would be shocked by the proposition or suggestion if it were applied to the great Empire State of New York, or if it were applied to Massachusetts. If for any purpose whatever, whether for the purpose of Indians roaming over it or any other, it were proposed to set apart one-half of the State of Massachusetts and deny to the people of Massachusetts the right to set foot upon it, I say such a proposition would be rejected at once.

Sir, although Nebraska is the youngest State and the last that has come into this Union and is represented by but one person here, I say that her rights as a sovereign State, as one of the members of this Union, are just as sacred and just as much to be protected and asserted as those of any other State, and this Congress cannot afford to ignore that principle upon the ground that Nebraska is yet in great part unsettled. I say Nebraska is taking rapid strides toward complete settlement. The settlements are running rapidly up in the direction of this forbidden ground. The settlers are going forward every day and white men are now trespassing there from very necessity, from the advance of civilization. The men from all parts of the world who are seeking homes in Nebraska are compelled to run up into this Territory, which white men are now forbidden to enter or occupy.

Sir, I deny in the strongest language I can command, and as emphatically as I may, the power of the United States by any treaty to assert the right here undertaken to be asserted. A bill upon this subject will be brought forward in proper time, I apprehend; but when we meet the matter here in this particular phase, it becomes Congress to adopt the proposition made to restrict the Indians to their reservations, or at least deny them the right to come into Nebraska. Such a right given to them is to the prejudice of the rights of the people of my State and of those who are settling in that State.

Now, sir, I do not desire to antagonize this bill or to oppose the policy which seems to be inaugurated. I apprehend that it becomes every man after a policy has been settled upon to unite heartily in carrying it out, to interpose no petty obstacles, and to assert nothing which is in contravention of the grand principle which seems to pervade this peace policy. I am satisfied with that policy, but underlying it is the great question of what shall be the status of the Indian, whether he is a citizen or not. When that question comes up it will be proper for me and others to express the opinions we entertain in regard to it, but at present while we are making treaties with the Indians, recognizing the Indians as a separate nationality, regarding them as wards and providing for them, let that provision be made with full reference to the principle I have indicated and let the responsibility be thrown upon those who have instituted the peace policy, and let us see whether it will culminate in the grand end that is sought to be accomplished.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I do not think that my friend from Nebraska has demonstrated the freedom of the United States under the amendment to the Constitution to which I referred. He has called the attention of the House to the fact that white men are prohibited in some instances from going upon the Indian territory, as I understand his remarks. I do not think that that shows that the object of the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa is not virtually to enslave the Indians. I do not believe myself, if it is admitted that this territory belongs to us as a people, that it is within the spirit and genius of our Constitution to prohibit white men from going upon any portion of the territory of the United States, even though it may be set apart for Indians. I do not believe that it improves the condition of the Indian. If you will let men go there in the spirit of humanity and civilization, without attempting to proselyte or to make a particular class of religionists of these Indians, if you will meet them like men, with honesty and integrity, the association of the white man with the Indian must of necessity elevate the latter.

But it is the frauds practiced on the Indian that have kept him down. It has been the dishonesty of the white man which he has attempted to imitate. It has been the cruelty and barbarity of the white man which the Indian has been endeavoring to revenge himself for upon the white man. It is no better statement of the case, that it is in violation of the spirit of the Constitution and of the thirteenth amendment to it that a white man is not permitted locomotion upon an Indian reservation than it is that an Indian is not a slave when he is confined to a particular locality. It may be wise enough to confine them there; I am not contending about that; but we either owe the Indians this money or we do not owe it. If we do not owe it under treaty stipulations, why make the appropriation and pay them this money? It will be said, I suppose, that you must do it because you have confined the Indian to a spot of God's earth where he cannot get a living. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations says that a white man cannot live there. Why, then, practice this cruelty and inhumanity upon the Indian by confining him to a spot of the earth where a white man cannot get a living and then find fault with him and punish him because he goes forth from his reservation in search of something to eat? White men, and the very best of men, break through all restraints when driven by hunger. The wild savage cannot be expected to be kept on a reservation where there is no game, where there are no fish, and where there is no food. It is an absurdity to undertake to keep him there even by the promise of a paltry sum of money. Such things as these are what makes the savage what he is to-day. These are the things which compel the gentleman from Nebraska, [Mr. CROUNSE,] and others, to come here and to contend that the Indian shall be confined on these reservations where he cannot get a living.

It is said that my opposition to this amendment comes from the fact that the Indians have gone from my locality to that of the gentleman. Indians are with us yet; close by my own county are two towns occupied almost exclusively by Indians, who have in a great measure become civilized. They are not the worst people in this country, such is the advance they have made. They have mingled with the whites, and in many instances they have become very good citizens. We have one or two Indian reservations in Wisconsin. Far be it from me to urge a policy upon the Territories or upon any sister State which I would not be willing to submit to myself. I am influenced by no such motives. Treat the Indian as you would be treated yourself. If you put him where he cannot get a living you must not expect that you will be able to confine him there; for even if you and I were there, impelled by hunger, we would break over all restraints and get away where we could satisfy the wants of nature.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE] to withdraw his amendment and I will renew it.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I will do so if the gentleman will renew it.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I renew the amendment. Sir, it is one of the recollections of my boyhood seeing the Winnebagoes removed from the gentleman's [Mr. ELDREDGE] State to the reservations farther west. His people were then anxious enough to have them stopped from roaming about the country and as ardently in favor of confining them to reservations as the people of the Territories now are. It is strange that they should not know how to sympathize with us when we suffer under difficultles which so lately oppressed the people of Wisconsin, and from which they were then as anxious to be delivered as we now are. As to the peaceful and happy condition of these Indians before the whites came among them, I think the gentleman is mistaken, and no case to support my assertion could be stronger than the one under discussion, or could more plainly show that these Indians were no more peaceable and happy before the advent of the whites than they now are. In some respects their condition is better; nor do they owe all their woes to the intrusion of the whites. Turn to the delightful pages in which Irving recounts the adventures of Captain Bonneville, and you will find that the country which this amendment proposes to rescue from the roaming Sioux was at that time the scene of as fierce and bloody conflicts as any that have occurred ever since; that it was the dark and bloody ground—the battle-field of the interior of the continent. Among those who then contended for it were the Shoshones, Crows, and Blackfoot Indians. The Sioux—who now claim the right to roam over it and keep off both whites and friendly Indians—had never appeared there then. Though they now dominate over this country, and the United States has recognized their right to hunt over it, they are not legitimately entitled to claim a foot of it.

It was a great mistake on the part of the Government to allow them to lord it over these lands outside their reservation, to shut up the road from Cheyenne to Bozeman, in Montana, and virtually drive our people six hundred miles farther west to find an outlet to the markets of Saint Louis, Chicago, and New York.

That road should be reopened. The best interests of my Territory demand it. It will save us many hundred miles of unnecessary railroad travel; it will open the front door to Montana, and will open to settlement many of the finest valleys and a great deal of the most valuable land in the West.

The treaty by which that country was abandoned and the forts withdrawn expires in July; that is, so far as it relates to feeding these Indians. If you renew it, let it be specifically provided that this road shall be reopened; that the right of the Indians to hunt on this part of Wyoming outside of their reservation shall cease; and that a line of settlements may connect the Yellowstone Valley with the Union Pacific Railroad. Let us never consent to a renewal of the treaty by which our troops were withdrawn and this country abandoned to a tribe of Indians that never had any right to it, from which they had driven tribes to whom it rightfully belonged; a treaty by which we dismantled the forts that were not only a protection to white emigrants but to the friendly Indians to whom this Powder River country, these fertile valleys at the foot of the Big Horn Mountains, actually belonged. Why, sir, I think that the abandonment of that country, especially after the massacre of our soldiers, was a most shameful thing, and that in buying the peace of these savages we compromised the honor of our Government.

When I heard the eloquent gentleman from New York, [Mr. HALE,] the other day, describe the highest duty of government to be the protection of its citizens, and hold up to us the example of England in punishing all outrages upon her people, whether on the distant plateaus of Abyssinia or the jungles of the Ashantee coast, I could not help thinking of the contrast presented when our Government abandoned this country to the demands of Indians who had no right to it; abandoned the white prospecter and emigrant to his fate, and abandoned to the coyote and the Indian the graves of its massacred soldiers without even making a determined attempt to punish their murderers—soldiers who had achieved distinction in the rebellion, one a friend and comrade of my own. At the demand of these insolent Sioux our forts were abandoned, our flag hauled down, our officers and soldiers retreated amid the taunts of the Indians who followed to insult them. Sir, there is a striking contrast between the picture presented to this House of the British lion caring for her dependents and the manner in which Setting Bull was allowed to decorate his war bonnet with the tail-feathers of our retreating eagle.

If we are to spend $1,200,000 a year to feed these Indians—twenty-five millions in all—let us stipulate in the renewal of this contract that in consideration thereof they shall confine themselves to their reservation, and allow all land outside to be explored, occupied, and settled, and this important road to Montana reopened.

This reservation is amply large—large as the State of Ohio. It is traversed by the Black Hills, with hundreds of streams, and abounds in game and fish; thousands of buffalo roam over its grassy plains; and it is one of the very best Indian reservations on this continent. What Indians go off this reservation? Not the old men or the well-disposed. I know there are but three or four hundred who leave the reservation. These are the young braves; and while they do so on the excuse of hunting, it is always in war parties. Last summer you were shocked at hearing how the Pawnees were murdered by a war party from this reservation. Not only should this amendment be adopted in justice to the white men, but also in justice to the Indians. Gentlemen familiar with the country will tell you that these Indians have driven off the Shoshones, who have been compelled to go to the recesses of the Wind River Mountains; they have driven the Crows up to the settlements in Montana. It was but last year that a party of Crows went down to visit their old hunting-grounds, and the Sioux came upon them unexpectedly. The women and children fled to the protection of the settlements in Montana, and the warriors who tarried to cover their retreat were nearly all killed.

The Crow tribe lost the flower of its young men in this their old home, a country which some peace commissioner gave to these Sioux, though they never had any title to a foot of it. There is no peace in these valleys. No friendly Indians can venture there; and but yesterday the wires brought us the intelligence that an expedition of citizens of Montana, going on the public lands in pursuance of a law of this Government, which invites the exploration and settlement of such lands—trespassing on no Indian reservation, and assisted by friendly Indians—have been attacked by these hostile Sioux, their stock killed, and several of their number also, and now are obliged to return to the settlements of Montana. These Indians which attacked them never have treated with the Government. They have been always on the war-path and defy your power. They incite by example and emulation other Indians to hostility. The report of Mr. Brunot's treaty with the Crows shows that they endeavored to induce the Crows to join them against the whites, and offered a large number of horses, spoils taken from the whites and the Government, to the Crows as an incentive. It is time the Government should assert its power and confine these Indians to their reservation, and allow these fertile valleys to be opened to settlement, and these roads—these most important outlets of Montana—opened to the emigrant and the traveler. If force is necessary, it is the duty of the Government to use force, and enough of it to subdue these defiant savages, and give protection to the prospecter and the settler.

Mr. McCORMICK. What is the area of this reservation?

Mr. MAGINNIS. It is nearly as large as New England, and in the mountain portion quite as fertile; while the plains furnish good grazing.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. Does the gentleman say that this reservation is fertile?

Mr. MAGINNIS. I believe it is.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. Have you been upon it?

Mr. MAGINNIS. I have.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. How much have you been over it?

Mr. MAGINNIS. I have been over a portion of it, and I have read the reports of those who have been on it—Raynolds, Sully, Father De Smet, and others.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I do not want to spoil the effect of your argument, but I would like to read what Bishop Hare says about the country.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I do not believe Bishop Hare was ever at the Black Hills, or within a hundred miles of them.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. He was all over the reservation.

Mr. MAGINNIS. That is a big country there.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I ask the Clerk to read an extract from Bishop Hare's report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A great portion of the Sioux reservation is an utterly barren district. The arable land embraced within it will not be sufficient for the wants of half the population when they have given themselves to agriculture. Even where the soil is good a crop cannot be raised more than one year out of three on account of ravages of grasshoppers, hail-storms, and the extreme dryness of the climate. Their reservation is thus a discouraging place for beginners in agriculture. Some of those of the Sioux who are making efforts in farming (for example, some of the Santees) are anxious to move to the Indian Territory. If good land is at the disposal of the Government in that Territory the commission recommend that measures be taken for the gradual removal thither of all Sioux Indians who may be willing to emigrate. The Great Sioux reservation should be used as a place for taming the Sioux and training them for the occupation of the Indian Territory as their home.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I have heard just the same things said about Montana and the whole mountain country. Yet at our fairs to take the premium it requires one hundred bushels of wheat to the acre; and at Vienna our agricultural products took a premium not only over those of the great States of the Mississippi Valley but over those of the world.

The question being taken on the substitute of Mr. LOUGHRIDGE for the amendment of Mr. STEELE, it was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. DUNNELL. I move to amend by striking out in line 1347 "$200,000," so as to make the appropriation for subsistence of the Yankton Sioux $1,000,000. I offer this amendment mainly for the purpose of calling attention to the difference between the Indian appropriation bill now before the committee and the corresponding bill of last year. Two years ago we appropriated $500,000 for the Teton Sioux; last year we appropriated $200,000 for the same band. This year those Sioux do not appear anywhere in the bill. They have dropped out. They were very prominent two years ago. At that time half a million dollars was appropriated for them. When the appropriation bill was up last year, some questions were asked which troubled the gentleman from California, Mr. SARGENT, who had the bill in charge, and quite a little excitement occurred in the Indian Department. After various letters and communications, it was announced to the House that there were certain Teton Sioux. This year they have dropped out.

Now I wish to know whether these Teton Sioux were all christianized and made good fellows by that appropriation of $700,000 made last year and the year before, so that we have nothing to do for them this year? Or have they been slipped in under some other name? I would like to know what has become of the Teton Sioux.

Mr. AVERILL. If my colleague should go upon that reservation, especially the northern part of it, he would find what he calls the Teton Sioux. I have only to say that, so far as I know, the Teton Sioux, as they were called years ago, have merged into other tribes. They are now incorporated with the Santee Sioux, the Ogallallas, the Brulés, &c. Indeed, a part of the Sioux that were once in Minnesota have gone into that country. I cannot speak from positive knowledge, for I have never been among them; but I have been near enough to know that a part of them joined what was then called the Teton Sioux. These Teton Sioux have merged into other bands or nations, and now exist under other names.

Mr. DUNNELL. I accept my colleague's explanation, although it is not quite so lucid as his statements generally are. I do not understand exactly the boundaries of these Teton Sioux; and it is a little singular that these $700,000 so rapidly facilitated this merging process.

Mr. AVERILL. If the gentleman will look at the caption of these paragraphs he will see that they provide for Sioux of different tribes. It was not necessary to express the nomenclature of these tribes.

Mr. DUNNELL. The caption is what arrested my attention and caused me to ask some explanation of the matter.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I would direct the gentleman's attention to the book of estimates. Under the clause "for the support and civilization of the Sioux" he will find the following:

NOTE.—The appropriations made for the year ending June 30, 1874, for the "Sioux on the Milk River reservation," $100,000, and for the Teton Sioux, $200,000, have been consolidated under the head "Sioux at Fort Peck agency," for the reason that both the Sioux of Milk River and the Teton Sioux have been located at that point.

Mr. DUNNELL. I am very glad to get this information.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] has expired.

Mr. DUNNELL. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I move to amend by inserting after "Yankton Sioux" in line 1346 the words "and Poncas."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move to amend by adding to the paragraph the following:

For industrial school at Santee Sioux agency, $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For transportation, and the necessary expenses of delivering goods, to be purchased for the different bands of the Sioux Indians, under treaty of April 29, 1868, $75,000.

Mr. DUNNELL. I move to amend by reducing the appropriation made in this paragraph from $75,000 to $65,000.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. Let me call the gentleman's attention to one fact. The Committee on Appropriations had a controversy with the department on this item. The department claimed that it was possible to transport these goods to those Indians for less than $150,000. We thought it could be done for $75,000. We cut down the estimate one-half.

Mr. DUNNELL. I withdraw my amendment.

The Clerk read the paragraph making provision for the Sioux at the Fort Peck agency.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move to amend by striking out the following proviso at the end of this paragraph:

Provided, That the President may withhold the said supplies from said Indians, or any band of them, until they shall consent to remain north of the Niobrara River, if he shall deem it expedient to do so.

Mr. DUNNELL. I wish to call attention to a single point. In the appropriation act of last year I find that the appropriation of $1,314,000 for the Yankton Sioux was for twenty thousand Indians. In this bill the number is increased—thirty thousand. Now, I wish to know what has happened to account for the fact that this year the Yankton Sioux number ten thousand more than they did last year. Is that to be deemed inflation? I should like to have the chairman explain that.

I wish to make one general remark. It is believed, not by me alone, that these Sioux who two years ago for the first time in the history of this country and for the first time in the legislation of the country were known either in legislation or in the country—these Teton Sioux have now at the end of two years dropped out entirely. I desire some member of this committee shall tell us about the Sioux Nation. I am told by gentlemen, who are very intelligent, there are to-day of the entire nation not over twenty-five thousand persons; yet of this one class, the Yankton Sioux, we are appropriating for thirty thousand of them $1,200,000.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. We appropriate $40,000 for twenty thousand persons. Now, how much is that to each person?

Mr. DUNNELL. That is not the question. I wish to know how it happens in the appropriation last year in a particular class that class numbered twenty thousand and this year thirty thousand? I wish to help the committee out, and therefore ask whether some portion of the Teton Sioux may not have been crowded in the Yankton tribe? I wish to get some information on the subject.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. The gentleman from Minnesota asks a question but will not yield for an answer. Let me ask him, where does it appear there are twenty thousand Yankton Sioux?

Mr. DUNNELL. Here in the bill of last year, twenty thousand Sioux.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. But those are not Yankton Sioux.

Mr. DUNNELL. Yes; they are under the denomination of Yankton Sioux.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. All the Yankton Sioux got last year was $40,000. The gentleman has not read the bill.

Mr. DUNNELL. Yes; I have.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. Read it again.

Mr. DUNNELL. It is under the same heading under which we appropriate $1,200,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman from Minnesota will allow me to say that the heading is "Sioux of different tribes, including Santee Sioux in the State of Nebraska, and the Poncas on the great Sioux reservation, and families of Santee Dakota Sioux, who have taken homesteads at or near Flandreau, in Dakota Territory." Under that heading comes the appropriation the gentleman refers to, and the Yankton Sioux are among them.

Mr. AVERILL. I wish also to say to my friend and colleague that the Yankton Sioux are on the east side of the Missouri River, while the other Sioux, under the heading of Sisseton and Wahpeton, and Santee Sioux, are on the other side of the river.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman from Minnesota seems to be all wrong in his ethnology and geography.

The amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For annual amount, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, in supplying said Indians with beef, mutton, wheat, flour, beans, and potatoes, as per twelfth article of same treaty, $20,000.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I move to strike that out, as the amount has been appropriated under the bill which came from the Indian Committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

FOR COLONIZING AND SUPPORTING THE WICHITAS AND OTHER AFFILIATED BANDS.

For this amount, to be expended in such goods, provisions, and other articles as the President may from time to time determine, including transportation thereof, in instructing in agricultural and mechanical pursuits, in providing employés, educating children, procuring medicine and medical attendance, care for and support of the aged, sick, and infirm, for the helpless orphans of said Indians, and in any other respect to promote their civilization, comfort, and improvement, (including pay of blacksmith, plasterer, carpenter, sawyer, and head farmer, at $900 each per annum; and one matron, one mason, two teachers, at $600 each per annum; one engineer, $660; and cook, $600 per annum,) $50,000.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move in line 1509, before "blacksmith," to insert the words "physician, $1,200."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move in line 1511, after the word "and," to insert the words "and two assistant farmers."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move before the word "cook," in line 13, to insert "one seamstress."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move in line 1514, after the word "dollars," to insert "each."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

GENERAL INCIDENTAL EXPENSES OF THE INDIAN SERVICE.

Arizona:

For the general incidental expenses of the Indian service in the Territory of Arizona, presents of goods, agricultural implements, and other useful articles, and to assist them to locate in permanent abodes and sustain themselves by the pursuits of civilized life, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, $50,000.

Mr. McCORMICK. I move an amendment by adding the following:

Provided, That $3,000 of said sum is hereby set apart for the support of the school of the Pimas and Maricopas, and the same amount for the support of a school for the Papagoes.

Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman in charge of this bill that heretofore the sum of $75,000 has been appropriated where in this bill only $50,000 is appropriated. The appropriation for this year is so much reduced that I am apprehensive these schools may have to be abolished if a sum be not set apart for them. My first idea was to set apart $5,000 for each, but I have put it at the lowest sum that will keep them going.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. McCORMICK. I will just say further in connection with this matter that those Indians are among the best Indians of the country. These schools are in a prosperous condition, and it would be a great mistake to do anything to injure them.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows.

IDAHO TERRITORY.

For the general incidental expenses of the Indian service in Idaho Territory, presents of goods, agricultural implements, and other useful articles, and to assist them to locate in permanent abodes, and sustain themselves by the pursuits of civilized life, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, $10,000.

Mr. SHANKS. I offer the following amendment:

Strike out the paragraph which has just been read, and insert the following in lieu thereof:

For the general incidental expenses of the Indian service in Idaho Territory, to be expended subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, for the best interest of the Indians in said Territory, to assist them to locate on reservations and sustain themselves by the pursuits of civilized life, and to promote friendly relations between the United States Government and the said Indians, $10,000.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I have no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I desire to offer an amendment to the paragraph appropriating for the general incidental expenses of the Indian service in California. I move to amend that paragraph by striking out "$40,000" and inserting "$50,000."

The paragraph was as follows:

CALIFORNIA.

For the general incidental expenses of the Indian service in California, pay of employés, presents of goods, agricultural implements, and other useful articles, and to assist them to locate in permanent abodes, and sustain themselves by the pursuits of civilized life, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, $40,000.

Mr. RUSK. We have passed that paragraph.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I was watching very closely, as I supposed, the reading by the Clerk, and I did not observe that that paragraph was read.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. Does the gentleman by his amendment propose to increase the amount?

Mr. LUTTRELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. Then I must object.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I will withdraw that amendment and offer one prepared by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, which I send to the desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "dollars" in line 1612 insert:

Provided, That $10,000 of said sum, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be available immediately, shall be used in the purchase of seeds, agricultural implements, &c., for the Maweemah, Scott Valley, Hamburgh, Ottittiewas, Shasta, Pitt River, Big Valley, and Upper Sacramento bands of Indians, residing in Siskiyou, Shasta, and Modoc Counties: And provided further, That a commission of three citizens of said counties shall be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior to select lands upon which to locate said Indians; and there shall also be appointed for said bands a superintendent of farming at a salary of not exceeding $1,500, and a teacher at a salary of not exceeding $1,000 per annum.

Mr. LUTTRELL. That amendment is prepared by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs; it does not propose any increase of the amount.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think that it changes the law, and I raise that question.

Mr. FORT. It creates two offices.

Mr. LUTTRELL. In the very last amendment that was adopted, there was a provision for two additional farmers.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the point of order made by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

Mr. GARFIELD. It is that the amendment changes the law in regard to the mode of distributing and applying the appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The opinion of the Chair is that there is no fixed law on this subject. These regulations have always been made in the appropriation bill. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. LUTTRELL. If the committee will indulge me I will explain my reasons for offering this amendment.

In 1852 a treaty was made by Colonel MCKEE, now present on this floor, on behalf of the United States, with these Indians, they ceding to the United States Government a large tract of land. They have never received a dollar for that land; not one dollar. The Government had it surveyed, and sold it to the citizens of the country. For the past twenty years those Indians have waited for their pay, and not a dollar have they received. They have acted in good faith. During seventeen years that I have resided in that immediate vicinity not one member of these tribes has ever been charged with a crime.

About 50 per cent. of those Indians—between seven and eight hundred of them—are half-breed or three-quarters white. All they desire in the world is that they be permitted to locate a tract of land upon the public domain, and that they be allowed to cultivate it, and that the Government shall provide a superintendent of farming and a teacher. That is all they ask.

The Legislature of California at its late session passed a resolution instructing the California delegation to urge this matter. Every citizen in that section of the country is in favor of this proposition. There is an abundance of public land for this purpose. All we have to do is simply to appoint a commissioner to locate this land for these Indians. Many of them are good farmers and good teamsters. But the trouble is that as soon as they settle upon a piece of land and improve it, the whites come on it and the Indians are crowded out. This has been the case for the last twenty years. Year after year they have been crowded back, until they have no place where to lay their heads.

Now, I ask in justice and humanity that the Government shall keep this treaty with these people. That is all we ask. We simply ask to divert $10,000 of the fund proposed to be appropriated for the purpose of locating these Indians on homes. They ask no further appropriation. They say that if we will give them homes on land which we have vacant, and to which there are no claims, and allow our commissioners, who will serve without pay, to locate those lands for them, they will make homes for themselves and their little ones. That is all they ask. I find in the Statutes at Large of 1869, on page 200, that fifteen annual appropriations have been made for the Shastas, and not one dollar has ever reached those Indians. I have resided it that country, in their immediate vicinity, for seventeen years, and not one dollar ever reached those people.

Mr. FORT. Who got the money?

Mr. LUTTRELL. Why, the agents who go out there to rob the Government and the Indians got it, and not a dollar of it ever reached the Indians. I know that to be the fact of my own knowledge, and can prove it by more than a hundred citizens. These Indians have acted in good faith toward the Government, and all they ask is that they may have homes in their native land, on which they can live and sustain themselves by agricultural pursuits.

I have here a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C., April 30, 1874.

SIR: Referring to our conversation this morning relative to furnishing seeds and agricultural implements to certain bands of Siskiyou, Shasta, and Modoc Counties, California, and locating them upon lands in said counties, I have the honor to inclose herewith an amendment to the Indian appropriation bill as reported to the House, which, if inserted in the bill and passed, it is believed will meet the case. The amount embraced in said bill for the service in California should, of course, be increased; and the proposed amendment should be inserted after the word "dollars" in line 1612, page 67.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

EDW. P. SMITH,
Commissioner.

Hon. J. K. LUTTRELL,
House of Representatives, Washington.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Now, Mr. Chairman, this appropriation is recommended by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. The Legislature of my State, as I have stated before, demands either an appropriation for this purpose, or a reservation. They ask that something shall be done for these Indians. It is but justice that they should have what we ask. They do not ask you to support them; they only ask for an appropriation to furnish them with agricultural implements and seeds, and to provide them with a farmer and a teacher. I hope no gentleman will oppose this proposition, because it is a fair one. All that we want for the Indians in my district is a farmer and teacher. We have public land; give us permission to locate it for these Indians, and we will trouble you no more with Indian wars, nor will we ask you for future appropriations.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I shall have to oppose this proposition of the gentleman from California. In the first place, we have very largely cut down the estimate for incidental expenses of the Indian service in California, and it seems to me that if this grievance exists with the Indians of which the gentleman complains, and I have no doubt of it, he can reach what he desires through the Secretary of the Interior without this legislation.

The condition of the Indians that the gentleman has named is no worse than the condition of many other tribes in California. For instance, the department appointed a special commissioner last summer to go out there and look into the condition of the Mission Indians. He came back and reported to the department that the condition of that people was deplorable, and the department came before us and asked an appropriation of $100,000 to be expended for the benefit of the Mission Indians in California. I have no doubt that if we felt that our Treasury was in a condition to justify it it would be an act of justice on our part to make that appropriation. The condition of the Mission Indians is no worse than that of any other Indians in the State of California; but the Committee on Appropriations, after investigating the whole subject and taking into consideration the condition of all those Indians in California, has deemed it best and most proper to make this appropriation in lump, as it has been made for years.

Now, I think I could make a much stronger claim upon this floor, that all of this $40,000 should be set apart for the Mission Indians, than the one that the gentleman has made for his Indians; but we deemed it best not to parcel out the fund, but to appropriate a gross sum and leave it to the Secretary of the Interior to relieve the condition of the tribes as far as he could do it with $40,000. The department asked $75,000, but we thought they would have to get along this year with $40,000; and if the gentleman's proposition is adopted, of course it will involve an increase of this expenditure. If you take this much out of the $40,000 there will not be enough left to relieve the immediate necessities of the other Indians in California, whose necessities are just as pressing and urgent as those of the Indians the gentleman refers to. I therefore oppose this amendment.

The question was taken on Mr. LUTTRELL's amendment; and it was not agreed to.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I now move to amend the paragraph by striking out "$40,000," and inserting in lieu thereof "$60,000." I do so for the purpose of replying to the gentleman from Missouri. I believe that we should appropriate $60,000 for this purpose. The Mission Indians that the gentleman speaks of live in a warm and good climate. They have employment at the missions, and have had employment there for years; while the Indians in the northern part of the State that I refer to have ceded their lands to the United States and have waited twenty-two years for payment therefor and have not yet received a dollar.

I ask you in the name of humanity, is the Government going to treat the Indians in this way? If so, I tell you they have stood it about as long as they possibly can. I ask the Clerk to read a letter from a gentleman who stands among the foremost in my State. The people are determined to go to war unless they can have justice. The gentleman himself would not stand half as much as they have stood.

YREKA, April 16, 1874.

DEAR SIR: Permit me to call your attention to the Indian question.

The spring is now opening, seed-time is nearly past, and no provision made to enable these bands of Indians to provide for another winter. The pittance of $500 sent by the Commissioner, or rather ordered, has been expended to work as much good as possible, and I think has carried them nearly all through the winter without starving to death. To feed the number required, I have had to buy middlings when I could get it, as it is much cheaper and equally nourishing. The Indians are now anxious to put in a crop on their own account so that they will be independent another winter. To do this they require but little help outside of a place where they can be assured they will not be driven out by white men as soon as they get it fenced; a small amount of seed and plows and hoes, &c., without an army of white employés to consume all they make, is what they want, what in common humanity they ought to have.

They have just been over for a talk. Vicious white men that want another war in order to speculate out of the Government are talking to them about their wrongs, telling them if they had been hostile they would have been provided for long ago, and that the big chief expects me to talk them into peace, and cost him nothing, and after a little they will all starve out. This seems to have much weight with them. They say, "The Modocs, Klamaths, Rogue Rivers, &c., all have reservations because they fought white men; and we have always been friendly, made a treaty with McKee in 1852, sold most of our land and got no pay for it, but reserved the lower end of Scott's Valley, and the whites have taken that from us."

I reply to them the fate of Captain Jack. They say, "Yes; if we fight a few may get killed; a few may get hung, and the rest of them will have a home and food. If we don't fight we will all starve to death, as the cattle and hogs have eaten up all the Indian food out of the ground. The dams for mining on the rivers have driven off all of the fish, and white men shoot all the deer and keep them so wild we cannot get to them with bows and arrows, and they will not let us have powder and guns unless we prostitute our squaws to bad white men, and they will bring us guns, powder, and lead. This makes many of our women sick, and we have many half-breeds to care for, and it goes hard."

Well, there is so much truth in all this it is hard to talk around.

The reservation, all things considered, best adapted to their wants is Quartz Valley. Jones is making an opposition; but that does not amount to anything, as the land is unsurveyed, was reserved, and his improvements will not exceed six or eight thousand dollars at a fair valuation, and would be useful; besides, that arm of the valley might be left out of the reservation by the commissioners without damage. All the other improvements could be had at a reasonable rate, and all would be needed.

Now, if you establish a reservation do not provide for an army of employés. One superintendent, to keep off intruders and protect the Indians, and one school-teacher, with a requirement that school should be kept and reported to county superintendent, the same as our free schools are, is all that is wanted. Let the Indians do their own work, have their own produce, and not carry it into account with the Government at all. This is the only system that a reservation can honestly be conducted upon, as the Indians would then have a chance to look to their own rights.

A few days ago I was on the way to San Francisco, and found two young Indians claiming to be from Battle Mountain, back of Chico, among the Sacramento Indians. Learning that I was on the stage, they fled to the mountains. I made inquiry of their business and found they were trying to incite a war and get all the Indians to join, claiming they had made a mistake in not joining the Modocs, but if all joined now they could drive all the whites out of the country. They told the Indians they had been to New York and Washington, and all the whites east of the mountains were afraid of Indians, &c. They promised to be back next month, and wanted all the Indians to meet for a grand talk.

I think if the proposition to provide for these Indians is too long delayed they will all break out from sheer desperation and necessity, not because they are ill-disposed, although many white men are encouraging them in hopes of plunder and employment in case of a war.

Mr. LUTTRELL. These Indians simply ask that they may be permitted to go upon the public domain and take land that is claimed by no other human being, upon which to make their homes; and they ask a small appropriation for agricultural purposes. If you will not give us $10,000 for this purpose, then give us $5,000. All we want is to start these Indians on their own account. We want no more. I hope the gentleman will not object to that.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. A great deal the gentleman has said is true. I think these Indians have been very badly treated; not only the Mission Indians in the south, but the Indians of the north of which the gentleman spoke. They are roaming; have no right to a home; the Government has decided that they cannot pre-empt land. If they settle down on land and build their little shanties, some white man can come along and drive them off. They have no right to even have a home. It is all wrong, and an outrage upon civilization that the natives of the country should have no right to make a home on the public lands. It is a crying shame. A great deal the gentleman says is true. I think the Department ought to see to it that lands are set aside for these Indians from which they cannot be driven by the border men. I move to amend by adding the following to the pending paragraph:

That the Secretary of the Interior be authorized to set aside a reservation for the Indians roaming in Northern California, upon which they may establish their homes and retain the same.

Mr. SHANKS. The Land Office now permits Indians to enter land. If that is a safe way for them to get homes they can do so now.

Mr, LOUGHRIDGE. Can they homestead lands?

Mr. SHANKS. They can; the Nez Percé Indians have been doing so for some time past.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I was informed by the Secretary of the Interior not a week ago that they could not.

Mr. SHANKS. They have been doing so, and now occupy homes on the public lands. I do not object to the amendment of the gentleman.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I will accept the amendment of the gentleman in lieu of my own, and ask that he modify it so as to provide $5,000 for these Indians for agricultural purposes.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I have no objection to that.

The amendment, as modified, was then agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

For the general incidental expenses of the Indian service in Washington, Territory, including transportation of annuity goods and presents, (where no special provision is made therefor by treaties,) and for defraying the expenses of removal and subsistence of Indians and for pay of necessary employés, $25,000.

Mr. SHANKS. I move to add to the paragraph just read the following:

Three thousand dollars of which shall be for the support of schools on the Colville and Chehalis agencies.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

For this amount, or much so thereof as may be necessary, to defray the expenses of Indian delegations who may visit Washington on business connected with their respective tribes, $10,000.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move to amend by decreasing the appropriation to $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move to further amend by adding to the paragraph the following:

Provided, That no money shall be paid from any other fund for expenses of Indian delegations visiting Washington except from the contingent fund of the Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

For this amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to provide, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, clothing, food, agricultural implements, and seeds, for the Modoc Indians that have been removed to and are now residing within the Indian Territory, $10,000.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move to amend by inserting before the word "clothing" the word "settlements."

The Clerk read the following:

For the first of ten installments, to be paid, under direction of the President, to the Flathead Indians removed from the Bitter Root Valley to the Jocko reservation, in the Territory of Montana, &c.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move to strike out the word "first" and insert the word "second," before the words "of ten installments."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

Pay and expenses of three commissioners to make appraisements: For this amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the purpose of defraying the expenses of a commisson provided for by section 2 of the act approved March 3, 1873, to make an examination of the country proposed for the location of the Round Valley reservation, and to make an appraisement of all improvements of white persons north of said boundary of the reservation, $5,000.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move to reduce the appropriation from $5,000 to $4,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

Pay and expenses of five Indian inspectors: For pay of five Indian inspectors, at $3,000 each, $15,000.

Mr. McCORMICK. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE] whether it has been found that five inspectors are sufficient to visit these agencies twice a year as the law requires, and to attend to all the duties devolving upon inspectors by the law of last year.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. My own opinion is that five are enough.

Mr. McCORMICK. There was a debate on this subject last year, and some gentlemen were willing to admit that the number should be increased to seven or ten.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. My opinion is that this number is sufficient.

Mr. McCORMICK. To perform all the duties?

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. That is my opinion.

The Clerk read the following:

For this amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to defray the necessary traveling expenses of five Indian inspectors provided for by section 6 of the act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department for the fiscal year 1874, $10,000.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move to amend by striking out "$10,000" and inserting "$7,500."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LOWE. With the consent of the Committee on Appropriations, and under the direction of the Committee on Indian Affairs, I move to amend by inserting after line 1798 what I send to the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

For this amount, to enable the Secretary of the Interior to pay to the children of the Delaware Indians, who became citizens of the United States under the provisions of the ninth article of the Delaware treaty of July 4, 1866, and the children of Betsy Zeigler, who died before completing her citizenship, under the provisions of said article, their proportionate share of the money and stocks held in trust by the United States for the Delaware tribe of Indians $54,514.23, of which $21,448.07 shall be deducted from the money credits of said tribe, and $33,066.16, to be taken equitably from their several kinds of stock, shall be transferred to the Secretary of the Treasury and become the property of the United States: Provided, That, if the Secretary of the Interior shall so determine, the whole amount hereby appropriated shall be taken from the money credits of the tribe; the Secretary of the Interior to designate the funds from which said amount shall be taken: Provided, That in the case of deceased persons the Secretary of the Interior shall make payment to their legal representatives. And said Delaware children are hereby declared to be citizens of the United States, with all the rights, privileges, and immunities of such. And the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to cause patents to issue in fee-simple to said persons for the lands allotted to them; and in case of the decease of any of said persons, the said patents shall issue in the names of such deceased persons, including the said Betsy Zeigler; and the title to the lands designated in such patents shall inure to and become vested in the heirs, devisees, or assignees of said deceased patentees, as if the patent had issued to the deceased person during life; and the Secretary of the Interior shall cause patents to be issued in fee-simple in the names of Barbara Zeigler, Martha Zeigler, Samuel Ketchum, Chatham S. Tiblow, and Francis H. Grinter, who belonged to the families of the citizen class, and who died prior to the census of said Indians, made by the agent under the provisions of the treaty of July 4, 1866, for the lands allotted to them. And the lands designated in such patents shall inure to and become vested in the heirs, devisees, and assignees of said deceased patentees as if the patent had issued to the deceased person during life.

Mr. LOWE. This amendment was regularly introduced into the House as a bill, and was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, who reported it to the House with the request that it be considered by the Committee on Indian Affairs. The latter committee have considered it fully, and are unanimous in recommending its adoption. It will simply carry out the provisions of the Delaware treaty of 1866. It does not affect the Treasury of the United States, but provides for the distribution of the lands of that tribe to its own members in pursuance of the treaty of 1866.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the sum of $15,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary to pay the expenses of the commission of citizens serving without compensation, appointed by the President under the provisions of the fourth section of the act of April 10, 1869, is hereby appropriated; and said board of Indian commissioners is hereby continued, with all the powers and duties conferred and imposed by existing laws. These powers and duties shall not be construed as compelling said board, or any member thereof, to examine and pass upon the accounts and vouchers of the Indian Bureau, if said board shall not deem such examination necessary. And all such examinations and duties shall hereafter be performed in the city of Washington, except that when said board shall deem it necessary, for the more prompt examination of said vouchers, they may direct their executive committee to hold its sessions for such purpose in the cities of Philadelphia or New York. But nothing herein provided shall be construed to supersede or interfere with the duty heretofore imposed upon said board of commissioners to visit Indian agencies and inspect the vouchers, books, and papers thereof.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move to amend the section just read by striking out this clause:

These powers and duties shall not be construed as compelling said board, or any member thereof, to examine and pass upon the accounts and vouchers of the Indian Bureau, if said board shall not deem such examination necessary.

Mr. BECK. As an amendment to the amendment, I move to strike out the same words proposed to be stricken out by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE,] and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

Provided, That hereafter no payments shall be made by any officer of the United States to contractors for goods or supplies of any sort furnished to the Indians, or for the transportation thereof, or for any buildings or machinery erected or placed on their reservations under or by virtue of any contract entered into with the Interior Department, or any branch thereof, on the receipts or certificates of the Indian agents or superintendents of such supplies, goods, transportation, buildings, or machinery, beyond 50 per cent. of the amount due, until the accounts and vouchers shall have been submitted to the executive committee of the board of commissioners appointed by the President of the United States, and organized under the provisions of the fourth section of the act of April 10, 1869, and the third section of the act approved April 15, 1870, for examination, revisal, and approval; and it shall be the duty of said board of commissioners, without unnecessary delay, to forward said accounts and vouchers so submitted to them to the Secretary of the Interior, with the reasons for their approval or disapproval of the same, in whole or in part, attached thereto; and said Secretary shall have power to sustain, set aside, or modify the action of said board, and cause payment to be made or withheld as he may determine.

Mr. GARFIELD. I make a point of order against this amendment. It is plainly a change of the existing law in reference to the mode of keeping accounts and administering business in the Interior Department.

Mr. BECK. I do not think the point is well taken. My amendment simply embodies the law as passed in 1871. It was attempted to be evaded in May, 1872, by a proviso in these words:

But the examination of vouchers and accounts by the executive committee of said board shall not be a prerequisite of payment.

That is the only modification.

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly; but that is the whole point. The proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] amounts to this: Under the existing law the Secretary of the Interior has the power to go on and settle the accounts; the proviso of the gentleman would put the power of settling these accounts into the hands of an outside board without regard to the Secretary of the Interior. It provides that no payment shall be made until this outside board shall have audited and passed upon the account. It is a complete unhinging of our present method, under the law, of settling Indian accounts. There could be no more radical change of the law as affecting the administration of any Department.

Mr. BECK. Let me say but one word on this subject. While the Interior Department construed it to be its right to pay without submitting the accounts——

Mr. GARFIELD. One word more. The gentleman tried to get the rules suspended last Monday to make this proposition in order, and he failed.

Mr. BECK. I did; but this proposition was then accompanied with another provision, which put all payments in charge of the officers of the Army. But when I came to examine section 2, which the committee have incorporated in this bill, I found that it conferred new powers, not known to existing law, and that what I now offer was a proper amendment to it. It provides, for instance, that "all such examinations and duties shall hereafter be performed in the city of Washington." It provides also that "these powers and duties shall not be construed as compelling said board, or any member thereof, to examine and pass upon the accounts and vouchers of the Indian Bureau, if said board shall not deem such examination necessary;" undertaking in the very clause which it is now proposed to strike out to change an existing law. To this proposition my amendment is appropriate. Hence, believing this amendment to be admissible, I did not care to separate the two propositions, as was suggested on Monday when I made my motion.

Mr. GARFIELD. The section in the bill does not change the law at all; the gentleman's amendment does.

Mr. BECK. There is no existing law similar to that contained in the clause now proposed to be struck out; there is no existing law requiring these examinations to be made in Washington; there is no existing law providing for the inspection of books. All these provisions of the section are new, and to them my amendment is germane.

The CHAIRMAN. In the judgment of the Chair the amendment is clearly open to the objection made to it.

Mr. BECK. The Chair, then, I understand, rules it out of order?

The CHAIRMAN. That is the decision of the Chair.

Mr. BECK. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa; I have the right at least to do that. I want to call the attention of the House and the country to what I expected would follow and what two years ago I insisted would follow, indeed what I showed then was the intention of striking out this provision requiring the Indian commissioners to revise these accounts of Indian agents. It was done then, and the effect has been to enable the retainers, agents, pet contractors, and other hangers-on of the Indian Bureau to rob the Treasury of the United States. Let me read what the commissioners themselves say on the subject:

SIR: The executive committee of the board respectfully present the following report:

From July 1, 1872, until March 1, 1873, no accounts were sent to us by the Indian Office for examination, it having been thought by that office that the act of May 29, 1872, relieved them of the necessity of submitting accounts to the board and relieved the board of the duty of acting on them. After the meeting of Congress the discussion upon the Indian appropriation bill showed that it was not the opinion of Congress that the board had been relieved from auditing these accounts.

Observe, they state positively that for nine months the Secretary did not send a single account to them for examination, although he reports that he did.

The Secretary of the Interior, in Executive Document No. 123, to this Congress, says:

It will be observed that by the act of May 29, 1872, the examination of accounts and vouchers by the board of commissioners was not to be longer deemed a prerequisite of payment. In view of the legislation in that behalf which had been previously enacted, and was still unrepealed, and the peculiarity of the language of the act of 1872, I deemed it best, for prudential reasons for the time being, to continue the practice of sending all accounts to the board for examination prior to the final action of the Department thereon.

It will be observed that the statements of the peace commissioners and the Secretary cannot both be true. The House may judge between them.

When Congress met in December, 1873, it became apparent that we intended to restore the power of the commissioners. They applied to the Secretary to ascertain their rights. He submitted the question to his Assistant Attorney-General, who on the 31st of January, 1873, decided they had the right to examine vouchers in a modified form, as the following extract from his opinion shows:

The act of May 29, 1872, also continued said commission "with the powers and duties heretofore provided by law," and contained the following proviso: "That any member of the board of Indian commissioners is hereby empowered to investigate all contracts, expenditures, and accounts in connection with the Indian service, and shall have access to all books and papers relating thereto in any Government office; but the examination of vouchers and accounts by the executive committee of said board shall not be a prerequisite of payment."

This proviso does not purport to repeal or dispense with any of the duties heretofore imposed upon the board or the executive committee; it leaves them in full force. It enlarges the power of the individual members, and gives to each the power of investigating any contract, expenditure, or account, and the right of access to all books and papers relating thereto in any Government office—a power which before its enactment could probably be exercised only by the board or the executive committee. It authorizes the payment of accounts before they have been examined by the executive committee. It does not dispense with such examination. It was doubtless thought that there might be cases where it would be entirely proper and perhaps necessary to make payment without the delay that would ensue if the examination were made.

I am of opinion that the duty of examination is still imposed upon the executive committee, and that it is not taken away by the act of May 29, 1872.

Very respectfully,

W. H. SMITH,
Assistant Attorney-General.

Hon. C. DELANO,
Secretary of the Interior.

The Chair has ruled my amendment out, notwithstanding the opinion of the Assistant Attorney-General, which I think shows it is germane; and the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will not allow it to be considered, although the report of the peace commissioners shows frauds have been committed to the amount of nearly half a million dollars. Since they have commenced examining again, God only knows how much was lost by refusing to allow these men to examine the account for the time they were withheld altogether.

Here is a list of disallowed claims on pages 11 and 12 of this report, where they show that three men, one by the name of A. H. Wilder, another by the name of D. J. McCann, and still another by the name of G. M. Dodge, have had large and extravagant claims passed by the Indian Bureau which were in clear, known, palpable violation of law. The struggle is to perpetuate that power in the hands of the Indian Bureau, in the hands of thieving contractors and dishonest agents, to prevent the men the President has appointed for no other purpose than to look into those accounts, and from having the right to see them at all. The point of order is raised to keep out the only provision which puts any check upon fraud and dishonesty.

But I have not done yet. Here is more proof. The board of commissioners go on to say in their report that a large amount of the accounts they disapproved were for cattle delivered in advance of the contract time and in excess of the needs of the agency. Affidavits are here showing that some of the cattle lost probably got into the herds of the contractors from which they originally came. They received an amount in excess of what was called for by the contract or needed at the time. Receipt was given to the contractors for them, and a large number were turned, as they believed, into contractor's herds, no receipt being taken to protect the interest of the Government and no guarantee given that beeves of equal quality and number would be returned in their place. At one agency the agent reported the number of Indians at from fourteen to seventeen thousand, when it was known from good authority the number never exceeded eight thousand. Another agent reported nearly eleven thousand, when on the best information it never exceeded five thousand.

These are specimens of the frauds now being perpetrated by the repeal of the law passed unanimously by this House on the recommendation of the sub-committee: Mr. SARGENT, of California, Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, and myself. I introduced it and no man dared to oppose it in view of these frauds we have developed. Now, it has been deliberately repealed and deliberately kept out of our statute-books for no other purpose that I can imagine than to keep men who are known to be honest from looking into the accounts and vouchers of agents and contractors and preventing a repetition of these frauds. You will see in this proof that these Indian agents took receipts for ten or twelve hundred cattle when the contractor never delivered more than eight hundred, and that they took receipts for delivery all at one time when the contract required that the delivery should take place during the entire year.

The favored contractors have been awarded contracts at nearly double what they were made at when advertised to the lowest bidder. And the frauds of that Indian ring are all perpetrated in consequence of a determined effort to suppress and render impossible all investigation by this board of Indian commissioners. They have appealed to Congress. They have appealed to the President to have this power. They have appealed to the Secretary of the Interior, and now a point of order is raised and sustained, and the republican side of the House refused to suspend the rules last Monday, and refuse now to give these commissioners any power to save the money of the people. I say that the republican party in this House is responsible before the country, and the country next fall will hold them responsible for refusing the only safeguard we have for the expenditure of the millions that are now stolen in the management of Indian affairs, and certified by your own commissioners to be wrongfully and fraudulently squandered under this system of Indian management.

Mr. GARFIELD. The republican party is always responsible for a great deal in the estimation of the gentleman from Kentucky just before an election and sometimes after. I admit that it ought to be responsible for much; but I shall not be diverted, to discuss the republican party or any other party, from the merits of the question now before the committee.

The proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky which he thinks I have done very wrong in objecting to on a point of order is this: that the head, not of a Bureau alone, but of a great Executive Department of this Government, shall be deposed officially, and a body of outside people, without salary, without bonds, without any sort of pecuniary or legal obligation resting upon them to hold them responsible to the Government, shall have the vouchers and accounts of one of the Departments of the Government sent following after them, wherever they may happen to be—at their several homes, at the watering-places, traveling on the cars, or anywhere else; and that these gentlemen at their leisure may look over these vouchers and accounts and write "approved" or "disapproved;" but that no person shall be paid for any service rendered in connection with the Indian Department until these five outside gentlemen shall have approved of the accounts. Now, that is the proposition. That is a proposition that would be, if enacted into a law, an insult to any Executive Department of any government in the world. No man would so disgrace himself as to consent to be a Secretary of the Interior for an hour after such a law had been passed. No proposition like this, I believe, was ever before submitted to this Congress or, as far as I know, any other Congress. It is equivalent to saying that not being able to trust, for instance, the Secretary of War, we shall appoint a committee of outside citizens and they shall control and determine every warrant for payment of any account connected with the War Department before a dollar shall be paid. Having no faith in the man who is put at the head of the Department, some five citizens shall be picked up who are honest enough to do that work. That is the meaning of the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky, and he wants to arraign the republican party for not perpetrating a legislative insult upon the head of the Department in question. I do not hesitate to call that a monstrous proposition.

Now, we have created a board of Indian commissioners. We have empowered them to go through all our various Indian agencies and superintendencies with full power to inspect the books and accounts and contracts and all the transactions of these various Indian agencies. Why? Because we want to throw all the light possible of publicity and of a disinterested, unselfish supervision and inspection over all this Department. For that purpose this board of Indian commissioners was created. It was furthermore provided that the Secretary of the Interior might send his vouchers for them to inspect and examine, so that he might be doubly certain that everything was right. But he is still the head of the Department, and he is not compelled by law to send them his vouchers; he can pay when a case is presented to him without sending the vouchers. He is not pledged to wait for the action of this board before he pays. But he may invite them, if necessary, to throw that light upon the case which they would be qualified by reason of their knowledge and intellectual culture to do. For such purposes we want to keep them. But we do not propose that our public Departments shall go traveling to all the watering-places of the United States and to the private residences of citizens all over the country before a man shall be paid.

Mr. BECK. I move to strike out the last word.

When the gentleman from Ohio rises in his place and says that I want to put outside men in power to supervise the action of a great Department, men who are not authorized by law to do so, he misstates the facts. The Secretary of the Interior himself says in his communication to the President, in response to a resolution of the House of Representatives:

> The board of Indian commissioners were appointed by you under authority of an act of Congress approved April 10, 1869, (Statutes, volume 16, page 40.) The board was authorized by said act to "exercise joint control with the Secretary of the Interior over the disbursement of the appropriations made by this act, or any part thereof that the President may designate."

That is, Congress organized the board so as to have the same control as the Secretary himself in the disbursement of Indian appropriations.

Mr. GARFIELD. O, no; the act says "any part thereof that the President may designate."

Mr. BECK. But more than that. I quote further from the communication of the Secretary:

> By an act of Congress approved July 15, 1870, (Statutes, volume 16, page 360,) it was made "the duty of said commissioners to supervise all expenditures of money appropriated for the benefit of Indians in the United States, and to inspect all goods purchased for said Indians in connection with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, whose duty it shall be to consult said commissioners in making purchases of such goods."

Are those outside men on whom two acts of Congress conferred this authority?

The law I had the honor to present and have passed reads thus, (see Statutes, volume 16, page 568:)

> That hereafter no payments shall be made by any officer of the United States to contractors for goods or supplies of any sort furnished to the Indians, or for the transportation thereof, or for any buildings or machinery erected or placed on their reservations under or by virtue of any contract entered into with the Interior Department, or any branch thereof, on the receipts or certificates of the Indian agents or superintendents of such supplies, goods, transportation, buildings, or machinery, beyond 50 per cent. of the amount due, until the accounts and vouchers shall have been submitted to the executive committee of the board of commissioners appointed by the President of the United States, and organized under the provisions of the fourth section of the act of April 10, 1869, and the third section of the act approved April 15, 1870, for examination, revisal, and approval; and it shall be the duty of said board of commissioners, without unnecessary delay, to forward said accounts and vouchers so submitted to them to the Secretary of the Interior, with the reasons for their approval or disapproval of the same, in whole or in part, attached thereto; and said Secretary shall have power to sustain, set aside, or modify the action of said board, and cause payment to be made or withheld as he may determine.

That covered the whole ground.

In May, 1872, the obnoxious proviso under which so many frauds have been perpetrated was passed; which provided—

> That any member of the board of Indian commissioners is hereby empowered to investigate all contracts, expenditures, and accounts in connection with the Indian service, and shall have access to all books and papers relating thereto in any Government office; but the examination of vouchers and accounts by the executive committee of said board shall not be a prerequisite of payment.

It is the last clause of that proviso that I am trying to repeal, and to which the committee adhere with so much pertinacity.

The act that I now seek to restore was passed in May, 1871; it was passed to prevent a flagrant evil, which former laws had left untouched, because at that time there was no way of stopping payments upon vouchers of Indian agents that came to the Bureau. The holders of these vouchers were paid whatever they asked, so they appeared regular on their face. Proof was made before a committee, of which I was a member, that a large number of the greatest frauds were perpetrated under that system. At some of the agencies where cattle were to be delivered, say two hundred or three hundred would be delivered, and then they would stampede them, and collect them again and redeliver them. We were told of one case where eight or nine hundred head had to be delivered, and as soon as they delivered one lot they would be driven back to the rear of the line, and so counted over again, and vouchers given for them, although twice counted and known to be so. One agent in Montana, as the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MAGINNIS] knows, was dismissed because he refused to give a fraudulent voucher for about $47,000, when the true voucher was only $7,000. It was to guard against these frauds that we passed that law, which the gentleman from Ohio did not then dare to oppose.

Mr. GARFIELD. "Did not dare;" that is good.

Mr. BECK. Yes; I say did not dare, and I say it with emphasis. Now, he says that I am opposing the Department. Sir, I am opposing the thieves inside of that Department. We passed that law in order to make it impossible for the vouchers of Indian agents to be paid, if fraudulent, so long as we had honest peace commissioners. It was made the duty of the peace commissioners to look into the vouchers at the agencies and examine them there, and when they came for payment to look at them again, and give their opinion as to them upon their knowledge, and upon information not accessible to the Secretary of the Interior. They were to give their reasons in writing for the conclusion they had arrived at, and then if the Secretary overruled them he did it on his own responsibility to Congress and the country. That is all the law did, and that is all I propose to do now. In 1872, in an evil hour, this House consented to strike out that authority of the peace commissioners to revise these vouchers and accounts, and from that time to this fraud and corruption have permeated the Indian Department, in the payment of accounts and vouchers and in contracts; the commissioners have certified to that, and it is sought to be perpetuated by gentlemen on the other side of the House by refusing even to let an amendment in the interest of honesty and fair dealing to be considered.

That is what I have said; and the facts I have presented are not met and cannot be met, for they are true. If your agents are going to be honest in their disbursements, what harm can it do to allow men appointed under an act of Congress and chosen by the President to look at the vouchers of the agents and advise the Secretary whether they are just or unjust? If you allow them to make purchases, if you allow them to control contracts, why should not you allow them to examine the vouchers of the Indian agents? That is the point where the Secretary of the Interior can get no information except from these commissioners, who have their agents everywhere, whose duty it is to know what the Indians get, and who can tell whether the vouchers are just or not. You have stricken out this right so that no man can be able to detect frauds, and refuse even to allow us the right to try and restore it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, it is not right that a statement like that made by the gentleman from Kentucky should go to the country without the facts in connection with it. It is unjust to one of the Departments of this Government; it is unjust to the peace commissioners, and it is unjust to this House and to the country.

The law was changed, and rightfully changed. It was changed in the interest of the Indians, not in the interest of the Department or in the interest of contractors, as the gentleman would know if he would examine the reports that accompanied this change of the law.

Now, so far as the peace commissioners are concerned, the men who are to examine these contracts, where do they live? One lives in the city of Boston, one in the city of Philadelphia, and one in the city of Saint Louis. These men, living in those cities, are expected to be at every delivering agency, and to pass upon the vouchers for the delivery of Indian annuities and Indian supplies. The law was in the way of the Indians, and we had illustrations of it every day. For instance, a contract was made to feed five thousand Indians at Cheyenne. Cattle were to be delivered at that point to feed five thousand Indians within a year. Before seven months of the time had elapsed from three hundred to seven hundred wild Indians had come among the others and eaten up all the rations contracted for for twelve months, and it was necessary either to have the Indians scatter and have war with them, or else to call together these peace commissioners from Boston, Philadelphia, and Saint Louis, and advertise for ninety days for beef for the balance of the fiscal year, or else for the Secretary of the Interior to make a contract without advertisement or without its being passed upon by these commissioners, and feed the Indians and keep them on their reservations.

Now, sir, so far as the law is concerned it never required that the peace commissioners should pass upon all accounts before they should be paid. The law as modified required that they should pass upon the accounts; but that without their passing upon them the Secretary of the Interior should pay 50 per cent., and it was left optional with him whether he paid any attention to the recommendation of the peace commissioners or not. In that regard the peace commission was as useless as a fifth wheel to a wagon.

Now, so far from there being any disposition to conceal frauds, I tell the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] that the Committee on Indian Affairs are now investigating alleged frauds. If he has a single witness who will prove a single dollar of fraud, let him bring him before the committee and he shall be thoroughly examined. The peace commission speaks for itself. If the gentleman will wait he will see whether or not there have been any frauds in connection with Indian annuities, Indian goods, or transportation of supplies.

It is the same song that was sung here two years ago, that the country would hold the republican party responsible for frauds. They did hold them responsible, as they will again. Let us feed and protect these Indians, and prevent the wild Indians from going on the reservations. There is no fraud. It is in the interest of nobody that this is proposed. If the gentleman knows of any fraud let him bring it before the committee, for the committee is anxious to investigate this matter and asks for witnesses.

Mr. BECK. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I renew the amendment. I am not one of those who stand here as a republican and say that the Indian Department is all pure and lovely. I do not desire to do that, nor do I do it. I know there are frauds in that department; that there have been and that there are now gross frauds. I shall do everything I can, and I have been doing everything I can in this bill, to endeavor to prevent frauds.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] talks about thieving agents; all through this discussion he has talked about the thieving of the Indian Department. Did he ever know an era in the history of this country when it was not the same way? I can give him a large volume which he would find very interesting reading for a week, and which is full of the frauds of the Indian Department in the days of Martin Van Buren, when the Indians were under the control of the Army. That gentleman is in favor of the jurisdiction of the Army for the Indians. At that time the Indian Department was under the control of the Army and under democratic administration. If the gentleman will take that volume and read it he will find as much fraud there as he can ever find in any period since that time. I recommend it to him for Sunday reading.

Mr. BECK. I know there are frauds there in the Indian Department; no doubt about that. But I propose to put them under the Army because the records of this country will show that in the Engineer Corps——

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I have but five minutes; I cannot yield. The gentleman has talked of thieving agents. I say after a careful examination of this question that I do not believe there has been a time in the last forty years when agents for the Indians were as honest men as they are to-day. I believe the military men of this country will agree with me in that statement. I ask the Clerk to read an extract from the testimony of General Pope before the Committee on Military Affairs at this session of Congress, which I will put against the declaration of the gentleman.

The Clerk read as follows:

I will state that seven or eight years ago I was very much in favor of the transfer of the Indian Bureau to the control of the War Department, and I have in various official communications, by personal letters and in conversation with those having authority over the matter, urged that transfer to be made. Since that time, however, the larger part if not all of the dishonest agents and their followers who infested the frontier and had so infested it for fifty years—who by virtue of making treaties with the Indians had the disbursements of large sums of money and of great quantities of goods, and had thus rendered themselves and their followers more or less rich by plundering both the Indians and the Government, and whose theory of the true condition of things in the Indian country was that we should have a war one day and a treaty of peace the next—have been got rid of. While such a condition of things obtained on the plains I was in favor of having the Indian Bureau transferred to the War Department; but since the present policy has been in operation I have noticed a very decided improvement in the condition of things on the frontier, both as to peacefulness with the Indian tribes and as to honesty in the administration of the Indian Bureau.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. There is the indorsement of a gallant soldier who says that a few years ago he was in favor of transferring the Indians to the War Department, but that now, after a long residence among the Indians, he finds the agents are honest men; and for that reason he has changed his mind and is now in favor of the Indians remaining under civil control.

Mr. NIBLACK. I am a little curious to know, and that is my object in seeking the floor now more than anything else, for what purpose this peace commission is to be perpetuated, if not to supervise these accounts. I think the object was to supervise the accounts of the agents everywhere, and to endeavor to see that the Indians were so treated that——

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. That proposition is not now before the committee; it has been ruled out of order.

Mr. NIBLACK. Then I will yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BECK. It has been stated that I was very much in favor of putting these Indians, and the payments and disbursements in connection with them, under the control of the War Department. I was, and am now; and I will tell you why. It is conceded, at least no man can deny it, that we are spending immense sums of money which never reach the Indians. The reports made some time ago show that to be the case. I am in favor of putting them under the War Department, because I have investigated the matter carefully; I went to the office of the Chief of Engineers and to the leading officers of the Army, and I had this assurance from them, which I believe to be true, and it is a highly creditable record, that from the foundation of the Government to the present time the Engineer Corps of the Army, though they have had large disbursements of hundreds of millions of dollars, have never swindled the Government out of one dollar. The accounts of the Engineer Corps to-day (and this is a fact worthy to be noted when our centennial comes) show that every dollar that has ever passed through their hands has been honestly accounted for under all administrations. I want this money designed for the Indians to be placed in the hands of men who make such a record as that; as a matter of course I do. Who does not?

In this connection I wish to refer to Executive Document No. 123, where charges of all kinds of frauds are made by the Indian commissioners; and even the Commissioner himself and the Assistant Attorney-General have to admit that contracts were made greatly in excess of fair market prices; that goods were delivered at times when the law did not require it, and in such a way as to throw all the burden and the expense upon the Government, instead of upon the contractor, where it should have been according to law and according to the contract. At this point I call attention to the letter of the Commissioner, showing the facts in regard to a large contract made with a man by the name of Wilder, involving the sum of about $80,000. Mr. Stuart protested against it. It was answered that an exigency had arisen; but Mr. Stuart replied that the treaty under which this purchase of stock was made was dated in 1867, and if the Indians and the public service had gotten along for so many years without this stock, he did not think the delay of the brief period necessary for advertising and receiving proposals would have been detrimental to the Indians or the Indian service. I do not think it would either.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I understand from the Indian Office that in the very case to which the gentleman refers this contract was sent to the clerk of the peace commission, and by him approved; it was then sent to a member of the peace commission in his own city, and by him also approved. What means this peace commissioner had of knowing whether it was correct or not I do not know; but he wrote "approved" upon the contract and sent it back.

Mr. BECK. I call attention to page 43 of this executive document, where the Commissioner, Mr. Edmund P. Smith, making no allusion to any fact of that sort, approves the account disallowed by Mr. Stuart with the eleven reasons of Mr. Stuart for disallowing it; every one of which reasons is, I think, valid. Many, many thousand dollars were expended in a contract with this man under the circumstances I have mentioned; and the only excuse that could be given was that an exigency had arisen. Mr. Stuart very well replied that the exigency arose, if at all, under the treaty of 1867, which had run for six years without either the Government or the Indians suffering.

The best way to get at the exact facts is to give the language of the peace commissioners as to the frauds, contracts, &c.

As to the frauds, they say on page 12 of their report:

> A large portion of the amount of accounts disapproved and recommended to be suspended in part was for cattle delivered in advance of contract time, and in excess of the current needs of the several agencies, which entailed upon the Government all the cost of herding and the risk of loss by stampeding, disease, &c.
> Affidavits in our possession go to show that some of the cattle lost probably got into the herds of the contractor from which they had originally come, and in one case, after receiving an amount in excess of the quantity called for by contract or needed at the time, and after the receipt had been given to the contractor for them, a large number were turned into the contractor's herds, no receipt being taken to protect the Government's interest, and no guarantee that a like number of beeves of equal weight would be delivered to the agent.
> This system of excessive receipts has also caused great extravagance in issue, and, as a result, at some agencies the stock of beef calculated to last all the year is represented as all having been used before the year was more than half gone. From investigation we are satisfied issues of beef, flour, &c., have been made in some cases to a number of Indians greatly in excess of that actually at the agencies. At one agency where the agent reported issue to Indians numbering from 14,000 to nearly 17,000, we learn from good authority that the number has never exceeded 8,000. At another, where the agent reported issue to nearly 11,000 Indians, the best information on the subject goes to show that the number never exceeded 5,000.

The amount and character of vouchers rejected and the reasons therefor are set forth on pages 10 and 11 of the report, and are as follows:

The value of Mr. Stuart's objections will be seen by the following extracts from the letter of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. I think they are conclusive against the contracts, and the Commissioner ought so to have regarded them instead of overruling them, but it shows what an exigency can be made to cover when desired:

Mr. Stuart's third objection is: "I do not think the intent of the law was to permit private contract or purchase in the open market of large sums, which in this case amounts to $77,900."

In reply, I respectfully suggest that the question of exigency is not to be decided by the amount of expenditure. If there was not an exigency to justify a purchase to this amount without advertising, then a smaller expenditure would have been alike unlawful.

The fourth objection is: "That an exigency of the public service that would permit of so large a purchase must be an unquestionable one."

To this I reply that I believe the exigency, as stated above, was unquestionable.

Mr. Stuart objects, fifthly: "The treaty under which I am informed this purchase of stock was made was that of 1867, and if the Indians and the public service have gotten along for so many years without this stock, I do not think the brief period necessary for advertising and receiving proposals would have been detrimental to the Indians or the Indian service." This objection has already been considered with the second. I will only add further, that to have consulted the board and advertised for proposals, and awarded the contract, according to office experience, would have taken at least two months, which would entirely have prevented the delivery of the cattle this season, as events have shown. The fact that the Indians have got along without the stock promised them by treaty, for six years, is no reason at all why they should not have them this year, according to the treaty, if it was practicable.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I renew the amendment. I have been anxious to make an inquiry of the Committee on Indian Affairs at some time, and I believe my inquiry is germane to the topic now under discussion. Of course we have all heard for years and years these charges of extravagance and fraud in the purchase and distribution of Indian supplies. I wish to inquire why such supplies cannot be purchased through the Army quartermasters and commissaries? I was glad to hear the compliment paid by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] to the Engineer Corps of the Army; it is deserved; but I think that as a rule (the exceptions are very rare) as much can be said in favor of the Army quartermasters and commissaries. Under their administration the food and clothing furnished by the Government to its soldiers have been the best obtainable.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. It was in proof before the committee that purchases of clothing which had been made for the Indians had been made at a bargain, so that the prices paid on the spot were 10 per cent. less than those at which the goods could have been purchased in New York. It was absolutely the best bargain that could possibly have been made.

Mr. AVERILL. And let me add that these very contracts were made by the very gentleman whom the gentleman from Kentucky has so highly applauded this afternoon.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I am not raising any question concerning any specific contracts; I am speaking of the general policy. It has not been the general policy to buy provisions for the Indians through the Army commissaries, and I think it would be best to make those purchases in that way. Under the existing system purchases may in some instances have been honestly made; but as a rule your supplies for Indians have not been purchased and delivered in as satisfactory a manner as has been the case with those for our soldiers. The Indian supplies have generally been inferior in quality, and at the same time much more expensive than if they had been purchased for the Army. The Army supplies have uniformly been purchased in the best markets under the best forms of advertising, under the inspection of honest and well-qualified men. If the same system were applied to the furnishing of supplies for the Indians, we might be assured that wholesome, honest food, of the quality and amount contracted for, would be bought and delivered to the last ounce to the Indians; and this as a general rule has never yet been done under the prevailing system.

Mr. SHANKS. We find frequently in the public press advertisements for the sale of worthless Army clothing; but we never see advertisements of sales of worthless clothing purchased for the Indians. The Army gets rid of its worthless purchases by selling them off at public sale; and in that way it relieves itself of any odium connected with the matter.

Mr. MERRIAM. Could we not in some way furnish these Indians with some of the surplus clothing of the War Department?

Mr. SHANKS. That would not do, for it is not best to clothe the Indians in the uniform of our soldiers, because it would make them feel they were soldiers and only add to the trouble.

Mr. NIBLACK. What is the pending amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is on the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE.]

Mr. NIBLACK. I move an amendment to the amendment by striking out the words "or any member thereof."

Mr. Chairman, I have not participated much in this debate, but I am quite sure there is no problem which ought to give us so much anxiety as connected with the administration of public affairs at the present time as this question of what we shall do with the Indians. It is one I have given serious attention to, although not as a specialty, for several years past. Four or five years ago, when I was a member of the Committee on Appropriations, the question was under consideration whether we ought not to transfer the Indians from the Interior to the War Department. Then I was opposed to it. I believe we could perfect the present Indian Bureau under the Interior Department someway or the other, and get rid of the scandal of frauds perpetrated upon the Government. I was strengthened in that hope by the declaration I heard from friends of the present President of the United States, who claimed as one of the results of his administration to be inaugurated in 1869 that he would introduce great reforms in the Department of Indian Affairs. We were told from his long residence upon the Pacific coast and upon our frontiers he possessed such knowledge as would enable him to bring about marked beneficent reforms in that branch of the public service. But, sir, the hopes that had been derived from that source have been disappointed. It seems he cannot give much attention to it. Whether he does or not, we have the same old story with constant accumulation to what we used to have in regard to frauds.

That is not all. The census shows and all our information shows that during the last decade the number of Indians has been constantly diminishing, and that the number of Indians actually in existence at this time is, as I am credibly informed, not two-thirds of the number which has been reported, and for which appropriation has been made. I am strengthened in that from information derived from official and other sources, and yet the amount we are expending on the Indians every year is increasing.

This peace commission from which we hoped so much also appears, by the statement of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] and from what appears to be the legislation recommended by the Committee on Appropriations, to have been a failure. Instead of extending it as an institution to be encouraged, we are seeking now, it would seem, to cripple it and circumscribe it preparatory, I suppose, to abolishing it altogether. As a last resort, then, in utter despair of our ability to deal with this Indian problem, I am prepared to-day to vote to transfer it to the War Department, believing perhaps that that would be the best solution of the whole difficulty.

Whatever you may say about the frauds in Indian matters under the organization of the War Department, it stands out, as the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] has well said, as a bold, incontrovertible fact, that no other department of the Government has so good a record in the expenditure of the public money as that of the officers of the Army of the United States. I am proud to say it.

Inasmuch, then, as everything else seems to be not only a failure, but an utter failure, I think we ought at once, before the adjournment, to make an effort to transfer Indian affairs to the War Department to see whether some improvement cannot take place. I am not only in favor of the proposition but earnestly in favor of it, and I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a word in reply. My friend from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] thinks it would be better to have these amounts disbursed under the direction of the Army officers. The report of the peace commissioners made during last year, if the gentleman will take the pains to examine it, will show him that the supplies of like character purchased for the use of the Army by Army officers were purchased and delivered at the Indian agency at 20 per cent. higher than the price paid for them by the Indian Bureau officers in the same neighborhood. Sacks of flour were delivered to the Milk River Indian agency at $4.70 a sack under the Indian Bureau, and I venture to say that no flour of a like character was purchased and delivered upon the frontier by Army officers for anything like that amount of money, but, on the contrary, that they paid much higher for it. I find that this is a rule running through all the purchases of all these supplies. Since this commission has been in existence I find in examining the reports made by these men and the reports of Army officers that these supplies have been purchased and distributed to the outposts at a cost 20 per cent. on an average less than supplies of a like character for distribution to the military posts. Of course, all the classes of goods included in the Indian supplies are not used by the Army—such as calicoes. I have only examined such things as flour, sugar, coffee, and such other necessary articles as are purchased both for the Indians and the Army.

What I have said applies with equal force to the remarks of my friend from Indiana, [Mr. NIBLACK,] when he urged the turning over of the management of Indian affairs to the War Department. I believe that Army officers are honest. But I do not believe that because a man wears shoulder-straps he is on that account to be looked upon as any more honest than a citizen. It is a favorite practice with some men here to get up and assert that everybody else is dishonest who is in the service of the Government except Army officers. I have as much respect for Army officers as any man on this floor; but I do not consider they are any more honest than citizens are:

I live on what was once an Indian frontier, and I can point to men who were Indian agents at $1,500 a year when the Army controlled the business, and who are now rolling in wealth and luxury, obtained on that salary of $1,500 a year. When General Harney himself, a man above reproach, whose integrity is unquestioned and whose sagacity is of the highest order, managed Indian affairs on our western frontier, it is a fact that these thieving agents who were under the control of the War Department stole his flour from him and sold it back to him three successive times. That is the way it was managed then.

If gentlemen undertake to make a little cheap political capital out of this matter, I say let them rest upon the facts. I am willing to go to the country, and I am willing that my party should go to the country upon the management of this Indian business.

Mr. BECK. So am I.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let us have a vote.

Mr. NIBLACK. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

The question being taken on Mr. LOUGHRIDGE'S amendment, it was agreed to.

Mr. BECK. I shall ask a separate vote in the House on that question.

The Clerk read section 4 of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 4. That none of the moneys appropriated in this act shall be used to pay salaries except where it is expressly appropriated for such purpose; excepting the contingent fund and the incidental fund, and except in cases herein otherwise provided, not more than $6,000 shall be paid for the salaries of employés at any one agency in addition to the salary of the agent and interpreter, and not more at any agency than is absolutely necessary; and Indian agents shall be required to state, under oath, upon rendering their annual or quarterly accounts, that the number of employés claimed for were actually and bona fide employed at the agency and at the salary claimed; and that such agent does not, directly or indirectly, receive any part of the compensation claimed for any other employé or any pecuniary benefit therefrom.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I offer the following amendment:

After the word "salaries," in line 2, insert these words: "or allowances of any kind to employés at agencies."

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read section 6, as follows:

SEC. 6. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior and the officers charged by law with the distribution of supplies to the Indians under the appropriations provided for in this act, to distribute them and pay them out to the Indians entitled to them, in such proper proportions as that the amount of appropriation shall not be expended before the end of the current year, so as to prevent deficiencies; and no expenditure shall be made or liability incurred on the part of the Government on account of the Indian service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, (unless in compliance with existing law,) beyond the amount of money previously appropriated for said service during said year.

Mr. NIBLACK. I move to strike out the sixth section. I do this for the purpose of inquiring of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE,] who has charge of this bill and is responsible to the House and the country to a great extent for any information they may require in regard to it, what the object was in striking out, or desiring to have stricken out, a portion of a preceding section in regard to the powers of the peace commissioners. I wish to inquire of the gentleman whether we are to understand by this that the Committee on Appropriations, after that investigation of the subject of Indian affairs which of course they were compelled to make in preparing this bill, are not satisfied that the operations of the peace commission have been a success? The country expected much from that commission. The proposition in the first place to appoint it I know was hailed by the country with great satisfaction as looking not only to a peace policy, but to a policy of an honest distribution of the public funds and a more careful looking after the Indians in all their relations, moral and religious as well as physical, than had been the case in previous years.

I drew from the action of the committee the inference, and I think perhaps the House and certainly this side of the House, has drawn the same inference, that the object of some of the amendments offered by the Committee on Appropiations is to circumscribe in the first place the jurisdiction of the operations of this peace commission, looking perhaps to its early abolition. If they are not allowed to supervise accounts, if they are not allowed to exercise any real control in this business, what authority will they have? We pay them no salaries it is true; still we pay them their expenses. They are officers authorized and appointed by law, and they cost us really considerable money. They have to come here occasionally to Washington, and when here may there not with propriety be given them some supervision over these accounts preparatory to their final payment by the Treasury Department? But still, if they are to look into the operations of the Indian Bureau, or to be joint superintendents of the Indian Department, or whatever else you may term it, why not invest them with some responsibility?

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman will allow me to say that we take away no power from them. We only require in the section he refers to that, when they do supervise accounts, they shall do it either in this city or in Philadelphia or in New York, and not carry the accounts all over the country, so that we may not have the official papers of the Government scattered about at Saratoga and Newport and Chicago, and anywhere and everywhere.

Mr. NIBLACK. Then, if I understand the gentleman from Ohio, it still leaves them the same authority they had before?

Mr. GARFIELD. They are simply to come nearer to the center when they pass on these accounts, so as to prevent the necessity of having the vouchers sent all over the country.

Mr. NIBLACK. I confess that when the motion was made by the gentleman from Iowa an hour ago I received a different impression.

Mr. GARFIELD. In the remarks I made I was answering the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] who wanted to give these commissioners supreme power over the head of the Interior Department.

Mr. BECK. That phrase is not warranted by anything I said.

Mr. NIBLACK. A word further in regard to what I said a few moments ago about transferring this Bureau to the War Department. I want it understood here that I do not claim for the officers of the Army, as men, greater honesty than I do for civilians; but the very nature of the service they have to perform and the fact that they hold their positions by life tenure, and are not allowed to profit by anything more than their salaries, and that they are under severe regulations, much more severe than we can apply to civilians, the motives operating upon them to engage in schemes of plunder are not as great as those which operate upon men who hold their offices only temporarily, and who hold them only because they believe they can make money out of them; at least that is the case as regards Indian agents and every one else who has anything to do with the disbursement of money to the Indians. I do not wish to be understood as magnifying the Army at the expense of civilians, but I say that the motives operating upon them to engage in frauds are not so great as those which operate on civilians; and I think the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] will concur with me in that view of the case.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I desire to say but a word, because I am anxious that we may have a vote. I do not want gentlemen to understand me or to understand the Committee on Appropriation as attempting to cast any slur on the board of peace commissioners. I hold them in the highest esteem both as men and officers. They have done a great deal of good in the Indian service, and I trust as a citizen and as a member of the Committee on Appropriations that they will continue in their positions. They are honest men, men of the highest standing, who serve without pay. They have done a great deal of good, and have succeeded to a great extent in purifying the Indian Department.

Mr. NIBLACK. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. BECK. I renew it, and I do it for the purpose of saying that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] was making an impression on the House by saying that he only opposed my desire to make these commissioners supreme over the department, which nothing that I have said warrants.

Mr. GARFIELD. I spoke of your amendment.

Mr. BECK. My amendment was simply the law as it stood for a year and a half; and the only provision of law was that these commissioners should have the right to examine the accounts, and should examine them without unnecessary delay, and give their reasons for approval or disapproval of the same, in whole or in part, and attach them to the vouchers; and (I quote the language of the law) "the said Secretary shall have power to sustain, set aside, or modify the action of said board, and cause payment to be made or withheld as he may determine." Was that making these commissioners supreme over the Secretary? Was that depriving him of any power? No; it was simply providing for advising him of facts that he cannot otherwise learn, and that these commissioners can learn, and do learn, by means of their being at the agencies themselves, or by their agents. It was merely an additional caution and safeguard. There is where all the frauds come in. But all these safeguards have been stricken out, and are persistently kept out. Why are they kept out if they are kept out for any proper purpose? The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PARKER] said very truly that purchases made by these commissioners have been more economical than those made by any one else. That is true; wherever they are allowed to act economy and honesty prevail. It was because honesty prevailed while they examined these vouchers that the law was repealed, and it is to enable dishonesty to prevail that they are not allowed to examine them. Whatever the committee may intend, that will be the effect of it, and that is the intention of every contractor and every Indian agent who intends to steal. Sir, if this House means to keep up the peace commission at all, there is no propriety in depriving them of the right to perform a duty which they are both willing and anxious to perform.

You have gone still further and struck out this provision, which you yourselves proposed:

These powers and duties shall not be construed as compelling said board, or any member thereof, to examine and pass upon the accounts and vouchers of the Indian Bureau if said board shall not deem such examination necessary.

You had previously said that "the examination of vouchers and accounts by the executive committee of said board shall not be a prerequisite of payment." For fear the payments of these accounts would be crippled by the investigation provided by this clause you have stricken it out, so that the moment a voucher comes in, however fraudulent it may be, it is to be paid at once before the peace commissioners can have a chance to see it.

Mr. BECK. I withdraw my amendment.

The Clerk read the following:

SEC. 8. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and empowered to set apart, of the annuities which may be payable to the respective Indian tribes in money under existing treaties and laws, such amounts as he may deem best for the welfare of said Indians, to be expended under his direction for civilizing and beneficial purposes, in teaching the arts of peace, and in establishing and maintaining schools among them: Provided, That the amount set apart from the funds of each tribe shall be expended for the benefit of said tribe; but this proviso shall not be so construed as to prevent the conjunction of the funds of neighboring tribes, if necessary, in the support of a school or schools which shall be common to said tribes; and, in case of vacancies in any Indian schools, the children of tribes that have no annuities shall be entitled to privileges in said schools: And provided further, That the sum of $24,480.86, being the unexpended balance of an appropriation of "$40,000 to carry on the work of aiding and instructing the Indians of the central superintendency in the arts of civi"zation with a view to their self-support," made by act of March 3, 1871, is hereby reappropriated, and may be expended for the purpose named.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move to amend by inserting after the first proviso the following:

Provided further, That the sum of $10,000 be appropriated for the support of schools in the central superintendency.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I move to amend this section by adding to it that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

And provided further, That no part of this act shall be so construed as to divert or interfere with the application of such funds as are already provided for by treaty stipulations with the organized tribes of the Indian Territory, or with any wild tribe, until its consent to such diversion has been previously obtained.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman to leave out the portion relating to wild Indians; with that modification there will be no objection to the amendment.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I modify my amendment as suggested.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move to add as an additional section that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

No agent or employé of the United States Government, or of any of the Departments thereof, while in the service of the Government, shall have any interest, directly or indirectly, contingent or absolute, present or remote, in any contract made, or under negotiation, with the Government, or with the Indians, for the purchase or transportation or delivery of goods or supplies for the Indians, or for the removal of Indians; nor shall any such agent or employé collude with any person who may attempt to obtain any such contract for the purpose of enabling such person to obtain the same. The violation of any of the provisions of this section shall be a misdemeanor, and shall be punished by a fine of not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, and by removal from office; and in addition thereto the court shall in its discretion have the power to punish by imprisonment of not more than six months.

Mr. BECK. Does that embrace the officers of the Interior Department?

Mr. GARFIELD. It embraces the officers of all the Departments.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BECK. I desire to apply to this appropriation bill a provision of law which has been applied to former appropriation bills, and to which I think there will be no objection. I send it to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the several appropriations herein made for teachers, millers, blacksmiths, engineers, carpenters, physicians, and other persons, and for various articles provided for by treaty stipulations, may be diverted to other uses for the benefit of the various Indian tribes, within the discretion of the President, and with the consent of such tribes expressed in the usual manner, and that he cause a report to be made to Congress at its next session thereafter of his action under this provision.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. There is no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move the following as an additional section:

SEC. 10. That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $12,000 for the support and relief of the Otoe and Missouria tribes of Indians, this amount to be used under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior in rebuilding agency buildings in place of those recently destroyed by fire, and for the support of the destitute Indians of said tribes: Provided, That the money hereby appropriated shall be repaid to the Treasury of the United States from the proceeds of the sale of the lands of said Indians heretofore authorized by act of June 10, 1872, entitled "An act for the relief of certain tribes of Indians of the northern superintendency," which repayment the Secretary of the Interior shall cause to be made as soon as the money arising from such sale shall be available.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BECK. I desire to move to strike out this eighth section.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. That has been passed and additional sections adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will have an opportunity to make his motion.

Mr. SHANKS. The right was reserved to move an amendment on page 2 of this bill to the clause relating to agencies in Washington Territory.

The clause referred to was as follows:

Three for the tribes in Washington Territory, namely, Neah Bay, Yakama, and S'Kokomish agencies.

Mr. SHANKS. I move to amend by striking out "three" and inserting "four;" and inserting after the word "Yakama" the word "Colville."

Mr. GARFIELD. There is no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move to amend by adding to the bill the following as a new section:

That the Secretary of the Interior cause to be prepared and delivered to the Public Printer by the 1st day of September, 1874, a tabular statement of the items paid out of the appropriations made for the Indian Department for the year ending June 30, 1874, each item being placed under the appropriation for which it was paid in such a manner as to show the disposition made of each appropriation and the amount unexpended of each; also, an itemized statement of the salaries and incidental expenses paid at each agency for the said year and the appropriations out of which paid and the number of Indians at each agency; and that the same be laid before Congress on the first day of the next session; and that the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, with the reports of the agents, be printed and laid before Congress on the first day of the next session of Congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BECK. I move to strike out the eighth section.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I desire to say in regard to the section which the gentleman moves to strike out, that it was put in by the advice of the Secretary of the Interior, who thought he had good reasons for it; but upon further consideration the committee have concluded to consent to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Kentucky restate his amendment?

Mr. BECK. It is to strike out the whole of the eighth section down to line 16, where the second proviso begins.

Mr. GARFIELD. The proviso which the gentleman has already moved ought to be retained.

Mr. BECK. That is what I propose; and also all the other provisos.

Mr. GARFIELD. If there is no objection I hope that will be done.

The CHAIRMAN. It is proposed to strike out the eighth section down to the second proviso, leaving that proviso and all the other provisos which have been adopted. If there be no objection this proposition will be agreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. PHILLIPS,] which was adopted as a restriction on the eighth section ought now to go out, as that part of the section to which it applied has been struck out.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection that proviso will be regarded as rejected.

There was no objection.

Mr. HANCOCK. I move to amend by inserting after line 1053, on page 44, the following:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed and required, in paying out the several foregoing annuities, to pay to the Prairie tribe of said Pottawatomies that proportion of money which they are and were entitled to under the terms and stipulations of said several treaties, and the settlement and agreement had and entered into by and between said Prairie band and the Citizen's band of said Pottawatomies, entered into on the 18th of July, 1872; and the accounts of said bands shall be so adjusted as to give effect to said agreement.

Mr. LOWE. I make a point of order on that amendment.

Mr. HANCOCK. I have here a letter from the Secretary of the Interior and also a copy of the agreement referred to in the amendment.

Mr. LOWE. I insist upon my point of order. This is a very important matter. There are several bands of Indians connected with that tribe; and I think a hasty piece of legislation like this, which has not received consideration by the committee, would be unwise.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order. In the opinion of the Chair the amendment involves a question of discretion, not a point of order.

Mr. HANCOCK. The agreement between the Indians has already been read, and unless desired by some member of the committee it is probably unnecessary to read it again; but I ask that the letter of the Secretary of the Interior may be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, D. C., May 9, 1874.

GENTLEMEN: I acknowledge the receipt of your letter dated February 26, 1874, in which reference is made to a report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs relative to the number of the Prairie band of Pottawatomie Indians, and the basis on which a division of the funds belonging to said Prairie band and the Pottawatomie citizens should be made.

I have considered the matter, and am of opinion that the division made of the lands under the treaty of 1861 and the census thereafter taken, making the Citizen Indians fourteen hundred in number and the Prairie band seven hundred and eighty in number, was intended to be the basis upon which any future dealings with said Indians should rest. I am also of the opinion that the subsequent increase of said Citizen class to sixteen hundred and ten was unauthorized by the sixth article of the treaty of 1867, and that the appropriation should be made so as to give fourteen hundred twenty-one hundred and eightieths to the Citizen class and seven hundred and eighty twenty-one hundred and eightieths to the Prairie band. The terms of the agreement made July 18, 1873, between said parties seem to me to be reasonable and just.

Very respectfully,

B. R. COWEN,
Acting Secretary.

Messrs. A. F. NAVARRE et al.,
Delegates of the Prairie Band of Pottawatomie Indians.

Mr. HANCOCK. This subject was brought to the attention of a sub-committee of the Committee on Appropriations having charge of this Indian bill; at least it was brought to my attention, and I informed my associates of it this morning. The facts show that according to the treaty entered into in 1861 there was a division of these Indians into what were termed the Prairie band and the Citizen band; that there was also provision for taking a census, by which the money theretofore belonging to the whole tribe should be distributed. By that census it was ascertained that the Citizen band numbered fourteen hundred and the Prairie band seven hundred and eighty. By different reports coming in as to the Citizen band, commencing, if I recollect aright, in 1868 and extending to 1871, that band had increased to sixteen hundred and ten, and the annuities were paid upon the basis of that number, a corresponding deduction being made from the Prairie band, which was thus reduced to five hundred and seventy. The Indians got together and adjusted this matter by an agreement which has already been read, and which provides that the former basis as fixed by the census shall be restored, and that as the Citizen band has received more than they were entitled to, the Prairie band shall have an equal amount out of the funds remaining to their credit. A statement from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs shows that there is about enough to equalize the amounts according to the original basis. The Secretary of the Interior, in the communication just read, is also in favor of returning to the basis of seven hundred and eighty for the Prairie band and fourteen hundred for the Citizen band. The amendment which I offer will accomplish that result and settle all difficulties that may exist. It seems to me but an act of justice. I can conceive no reason why there should be any hesitation or doubt about adopting it.

Mr. LOWE. I rise to oppose the amendment. It appears from the statement of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HANCOCK] himself that this is a matter of considerable complication. It involves by his own statement the consideration of several articles of the treaty to which he refers, and the respective members of several separate bands of Indians belonging to this general tribe.

The letter which he reads from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs is entitled to all the respect which it purports to have on its face.

Mr. HANCOCK. It is from the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. LOWE. I believe it was written by the Assistant Secretary. We apply to the Departments for facts in regard to many subjects of legislation, and their opinions are exceedingly involving ones, on which they are valuable when they are well informed on the matters and subjects in respect to which they speak. But the committees of this House are organized for the express purpose of considering these important subjects of legislation before they are passed upon. This measure, for anything I know, may be entirely correct. I do not know that it is not, but it involves such large interests and such a multiplicity of facts that it would be exceedingly unwise to adopt this legislation without further consideration. The several funds of the several bands of Pottawatomie Indians is a subject which is now being considered by the Committee on Indian Affairs, and probably embraces this same subject. Not being familiar with it I cannot say. It seems to me this ought to have careful consideration by some committee. It appears that it has not had full consideration by the Committee on Appropriations, and that it has not had the support of any committee. I do not think it ought to be adopted.

Mr. AVERILL. I move to strike out the last word. I hold in my hand, Mr. Chairman, a Senate bill on this subject, which I desire to send to the Clerk's desk in order that he may read the title of it.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. No. 221) to fund the sum due the Prairie band of Pottawatomie Indians, under the provisions of the treaty of February 27, 1867, and to transfer and fund any sum which may be found due from the Citizen band of Pottawatomies to the Prairie band, according to an agreement entered into between said bands July 18, 1873, and to use both principal and interest for the civilization of said Indians.

Mr. AVERILL. It will be observed by the committee that this subject has been considered in the Senate, and a bill on the subject has been passed by that body. That bill is now before our Committee on Indian Affairs. Pending its consideration we have sent for information from the Department, as I have stated before in the early part of the proceedings. That committee have not sufficiently considered the question to make any decision upon it. I feel as ignorant in reference to the facts involved as to what should be the recommendation of the committee to the House as I was then. I believe to adopt the amendment now pending would be hasty and improper legislation, and especially when it is attempted to put it upon an appropriation bill. The question is now before the Committee on Indian Affairs for consideration, and instead of taking any action on it here we ought to wait for the report from that committee. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. HANCOCK. I do not like to insist upon anything which may seem to be wrong to any gentleman, but I cannot see where the evil is in the amendment which I have proposed. It provides simply for carrying out the terms of the treaty entered into with these Pottawatomie Indians, and is in accordance with the understanding of the Indians themselves, as well as with the recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior. It is agreed to, so far as I know, by the Indians themselves. I know no facts which can involve the slightest difficulty in determining what the particular rights of these claimants are. This, in my judgment, is the proper place and this the proper occasion, to determine the rights of the respective claimants. I fail to see any reason for delay or any further investigation. In my judgment there can be no objection to the amendment being adopted at once. If other gentlemen think differently, all I have to say is that I feel that I have done my duty in bringing the matter to the attention of the House as soon as the difficulty was known. I do not know what may be behind the contract or what may be the understanding of the Secretary of the Interior. From all the facts before me I believe that the amendment ought to be adopted as a fair determination of the whole question.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Mr. Chairman, these Pottawatomies live in my own district, and I wish to say that for some years the question has been pending between these several bands. Both have delegations here now, and the amendment proposes to settle the question in an appropriation bill which is now being discussed by these two delegations before the Committee on Indian Affairs. I hope it will not pass.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 33, noes 69; no quorum voting.

Mr. HANCOCK. I insist on further count.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I will agree to allow the amendment to be reported to the House.

Mr. HANCOCK. Under that understanding I do not ask for a further count.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. POLAND reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to the order, had under consideration a bill (H. R. No. 2343) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I demand the previous question on the bill and amendments.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was disagreed to.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. HANCOCK. I ask for a separate vote on my amendment.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I agreed to allow the gentleman's amendment to be voted on in the House.

The SPEAKER. The amendment will be read.

After line 1053, on page 44, insert the following:

Provided. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed and required, in paying out the several foregoing annuities, to pay to the Prairie tribe of the said Pottawatomies that appropriation of money which they are and were entitled to under the terms and stipulations of said several treaties, and the statement and agreement had and entered into by and between said Prairie band and the Citizen band of said Pottawatomies, entered into on the 18th of July, 1873; and the accounts of said bands shall be so adjusted as to give effect to said agreement.

Mr. HANCOCK. I ask to have the agreement between these Indian bands again read.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I object. That would be in the nature of debate.

The question being taken on the amendment, there were—ayes 37, noes 69.

The SPEAKER. A quorum has not voted. The Chair will order tellers, and appoints Mr. HANCOCK and Mr. LOUGHRIDGE.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. Pending the division, I move that the House do now adjourn.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Before that motion is put, I desire to say, because of the remarks I made at the commencement of this day's session in reference to what then seemed to me an imperfect report of a debate which occurred yesterday, that in any suggestion I made at that time that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] had changed the reporter's notes of his remarks yesterday I was in error. He has shown me since the manuscript of his remarks as written out by the reporters, and they are the same in the part to which I called attention as they appeared in the RECORD. I only wish to say that the fault was in my defective hearing or the defective hearing of the reporters, and not the fault of the gentleman from Ohio. Perhaps I ought to say, in justice to the reporters, that in the confusion attending debates in committee it must be difficult for them to get always the precise language of the speaker.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask, for the sake of facilitating business next week, that the deficiency appropriation bill, which will come up early in the week, and to which the committee propose to make a few additions in the way of amendments, be reprinted with all the additions the committee have made to it, so that the reprint may be made before the bill comes up for action.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman propose that the additions shall be printed as part of the original text of the bill?

Mr. GARFIELD. Yes; the object is that they shall go in as part of the original text.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the order will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. BECK. All points of order are reserved.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. DARRALL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 83) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to remove the powder-magazine from Fort Norfolk, Norfolk, Virginia;

An act (H. R. No. 1945) granting a pension to Juliet E. Hall, daughter of William Hall, late colonel of the Eleventh Regiment of Iowa Infantry;

An act (H. R. No. 2086) for the relief of R. W. Clarke, postmaster at Brattleborough, Vermont;

An act (H. R. No. 555) for the relief of McClintock Young, of the State of Maryland;

An act (H. R. No. 725) for the relief of James C. Livingston, late a private in Company E, Third Regiment Iowa Volunteer Infantry;

An act (H. R. No. 345) to relieve certain persons therein named, late members of Company K, Fifty-eighth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, from the charge of mutiny.

An act (H. R. No. 2094) for the relief of William A. Snodgrass, late lieutenant Company H, Thirty-ninth Regiment Ohio Veteran Volunteer Infantry;

An act (H. R. No. 1201) authorizing the payment of prize-money to the officers and crew of the United States steamer Bienville;

An act (H. R. No. 1404) for the relief of William F. Kerr; and

An act (H. R. No. 1776) for the relief of George Yount.

WAR PREMIUMS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of State, inclosing a list of claims for war premiums filed subsequent to May 15, 1872; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

TELEGRAPH OFFICES IN THE CAPITOL.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the architect of the Capitol, in answer to a resolution of the House of March 23, 1874, in relation to the telegraph offices in the corridors of the Capitol, and making certain recommendations in relation thereto; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN W. HORTON.

Mr. PLATT, of New York, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported a joint resolution (H. R. No. 95) authorizing the Postmaster-General to perfect title to certain real estate obtained from John W. Horton, a defaulter in the Money-order Bureau; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution was read. In its preamble it recites that John W. Horton, a clerk in the money-order division of the post-office at New York, known and styled as superintendent of the money-order department of said post-office, did, on or about the 3d day of August, 1871, acknowledge himself to have embezzled and appropriated to his own use moneys of the United States, being money-order funds, amounting to $115,428.71, more or less, and that he has conveyed in trust certain properties to reimburse the United States therefor. The joint resolution therefore authorizes the Postmaster-General to perfect title to the said real estate.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PLATT, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. LOUGHRIDGE that the House do now adjourn, it was agreed to.

Accordingly (at four o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, May 11, 1874.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

On motion of Mr. SARGENT, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was dispensed with.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SARGENT. I hold in my hand a memorial, sent by telegraph, signed by about one hundred firms of San Francisco, embracing leading merchants and men of the largest views. They remonstrate against any act of Congress to forfeit the additional subsidy granted two years ago to enable the China Mail Line to perform semi-monthly service. They declare that the policy of the California Legislature in regard to the Pacific Mail Steamship subsidy is suicidal, the result of temporary infatuation; and say that if it is confirmed by Congress it will involve a loss of a large portion of the Oriental trade to American shipping and throw it into the hands of English subsidized lines. These gentlemen show with great earnestness that the refusal of Congress to continue its favors to the American line is almost tantamount to a surrender of the carrying trade to the English and the loss of a large portion of direct trade to San Francisco. Since the establishment of the China Mail Line the trade at San Francisco has increased from one thousand tons of tea in 1867 to over ten thousand tons in 1871, and other merchandise in proportion. To provide for a further increase pending the construction of the steamers required by law, the Pacific Mail Steamship Company employed outside vessels, when the English line, the Peninsular and Oriental Line via Suez, which is subsidized by the English government at over $2,000,000 per annum, dropped its rates of freight so low that the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, without the benefit of the additional subsidy, which has never yet been paid, could not compete, and our direct trade fell off to 7,800 tons. With the subsidy the trade could be held and increased.

I have no right to take up the morning hour by dwelling upon the advantages to American interests, especially to the western cities, by the maintenance of this line. I shall embrace the first opportunity that opens for debate to urge that Congress sustain this line, and I desire to say for myself that while having a high respect for the advice of the California Legislature, I do not feel myself bound under any circumstances to follow that advice, certainly not to recognize it as an instruction where I am convinced that it is injurious to the interests of the State or the interests of the General Government. I think myself, with the merchants of San Francisco, that the action of the Legislature in this matter, if acted on, will be detrimental to the interests of the State and General Government; that it is reversing a policy which has been pursued with beneficial results to both trade and revenue. As a bill has been reported from the Committee on Commerce repealing the provisions for additional subsidy, I move that this memorial be printed and lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McCREERY presented the petition of John W. Williams, the petition of James L. Lampton, and the petition of Sampson Jones, citizens of Kentucky, praying compensation for property taken by the United States Government; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CONKLING. I present a memorial signed by a citizen of New York; one of Pennsylvania; one of Massachusetts; one of Maine, and one of Connecticut, being delegates of the workingmen of various States of the American Union, praying that the two Houses of Congress adjourn sine die. This memorial sets forth in respectful terms the reasons moving the memorialists; perhaps they are sufficiently comprised within the statement the rules permit me to make, by saying that the judgment of the memorialists is that the uncertainty, disquietude, and hazard which prevail in the business community touching financial and other legislation would be best and most effectually ended by an adjournment of the two Houses of Congress. I am somewhat in doubt to which committee this memorial should go; but I move its reference to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING presented a memorial of the Purchace Quarterly Meeting of Friends held at Amewalk, 29th of Fourthmonth, 1874, praying the settlement of international differences by arbitration instead of war; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of citizens of the State of New York interested as dealers in stock, praying for an amendment to House bill No. 2650, to except swine from the requirement of being unloaded from railroad trains for at least forty-eight hours while in transitu; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM presented the petition of Susan M. Mallett, widow of Abel W. Mallett, late private Company G, Seventeenth Connecticut Volunteers, praying for leave to employ and pay for services necessary in the prosecution of her claim for pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of citizens of Cleveland, Ohio, praying an amendment to House bill No. 2650, so as to except swine from being unloaded from railroad trains for at least forty-eight hours while in transitu; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

He also presented the petition of Leopold and Solomon Levi, of Cincinnati, Ohio, as assignees of A. Schwab & Co., of Knoxville, Tennessee, and as trustees for their own and for the benefit of other loyal northern creditors of said firm, praying for compensation for 12,852 pounds of tobacco seized at Knoxville, Tennessee, by order of General A. E. Burnside, and issued to the troops of his command; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PRATT presented the petition of Ellen O'Connell, of Jamestown, New York, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of Patrick Murphy and others, praying such an amendment of the pension laws as that all soldiers of the late war who have lost a leg above the knee may be placed on the pension-rolls as of the second class; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. RAMSEY presented the petition of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, signed by its officers, praying the passage of a law amending the act entitled "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Lake Superior to Puget Sound, on the Pacific coast, by the northern route," approved July 2, 1864, so far as to guarantee the payment of interest on the bonds of said company; which was referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. WADLEIGH presented a petition of citizens of Portsmouth, New Hampshire, praying for the enactment of such laws as will abolish the present system of compulsory pilotage; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SPENCER presented a petition of members of the bar of the middle district of Alabama, calling attention to the anomalous condition of the middle and northern judicial districts of that State, wherein no United States court now has circuit court jurisdiction; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PRATT. I am directed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 352) for the relief of Colonel E. McCarty, to report it with amendments. There is a House report accompanying it which the committee adopt.

Mr. WRIGHT. I am instructed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 416) for the relief of Belle E. Hammond, of Closter, Bergen County, New Jersey, to submit an adverse report thereon, and recommend its indefinite postponement. I ask that it may go on the Calendar at the request of the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee, and the report will be printed.

Mr. WINDOM, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No 3162) for the relief of settlers on railroad lands, reported it without amendment.

Mr. WADLEIGH, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 214) for the relief of Robert Coles, reported it without amendment.

Mr. MERRIMON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2348) for the relief of Rev. George Morrison, late of Kentucky, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 522) for the relief of Nathaniel P. Harben, of Georgia, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. SCOTT. I am directed by the Committee on Claims to report back the joint resolution (H. R. No. 94) directing the commissioners of claims to send to Congress without delay the claims decided prior to April 1, 1874, and recommend that it ought not to pass.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the resolution will be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. SPENCER. I ask that it go on the Calendar with the adverse report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will go on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

REPORTS ON IMMIGRATION.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution of the House of Representatives to print three thousand copies of the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury in regard to the better protection of immigrants on ship-board for the use of the House, to report it back without amendment, and recommend its passage. The law allows each House to print extra copies of any document where the cost does not exceed $500, and if it exceeds that cost it must be done by a concurrent resolution. This was a House resolution ordering this document for the use of the House, but it was found upon examination that it cost a few dollars more than the sum limited; and it is a mere act of courtesy to pass it for the use of the House. I ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was considered and concurred in, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That three thousand copies of the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury of January 21, 1874, with the accompanying reports, concerning the immigration service and the better protection of immigrants to the United States, be printed for the use of the House.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. RAMSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 796) amendatory of and supplementary to an act entitled "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Lake Superior to Puget Sound, on the Pacific coast, by the northern route," approved July 2, 1864, and the acts and resolutions additional thereto and amendatory thereof; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Railroads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHERMAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 797) to amend an act in relation to the survey of certain lands; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SPENCER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 798) for the relief of settlers on the public lands in the States of Alabama, Arkansas, Louisiana, Mississippi, and Florida, under the homestead laws of the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 799) to amend the act passed March 2, 1867, entitled "An act for the removal of causes in certain cases from the State courts;" which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

BILLS RECOMMITTED.

Mr. WRIGHT. On the 4th of this month Senate bill No. 88, for the better organization of the district courts of the United States within the State of Louisiana, was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with the recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed. At the request of the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. WEST,] and with the concurrence of the members of the committee, I move that that bill be recommitted to the committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT. I move that Senate bill No. 657, for the relief of John J. Anderson, surviving copartner of Anderson & White, be recommitted to the Committee on Claims. There has been a favorable report made, but the committee desire it to be recommitted for the purpose of further examination.

Mr. McCREERY. I have only to say that unless the Senator's reasons are imperative, I hope the bill will take its place on the Calendar. It has been before the committee something like eleven years, and I think by this time they might have arrived at a conclusion, and probably have arrived at a correct conclusion already. I do not know exactly the ground on which the Senator makes the motion; but unless the reasons are very urgent I desire that the bill take its place on the Calendar.

Mr. SCOTT. I will state very briefly, and I think the Senator from Kentucky will be satisfied that it is no desire to delay the case that forms the ground for the recommittal. It is a claim for compensation for cotton. It happens that in a subsequent case coming before the committee evidence came out that other cotton was taken at the same time and from the same warehouse where that of Anderson & White was taken, and while the committee have found in favor of both claims, the evidence in the latter case gives rise to a question in the committee as to whether the amount allowed in the case of Anderson & White is not entirely erroneous. The motion is for the purpose of having the members of the committee to whom these cases were referred, as a sub-committee, compare the testimony in both, so that if there be an error it may be corrected. That is the only purpose of the re-reference, and I think it is entirely proper that the bill should be recommitted for that purpose.

Mr. McCREERY. May I ask the chairman of the committee a single question, whether the assessment of the officer does not prevail in the bill reported by the committee?

Mr. SCOTT. The assessment of the officer?

Mr. McCREERY. Yes, sir; the value of the cotton as reported by him.

Mr. SCOTT. There were several questions in the case; and I do not know to which officer the Senator refers. One officer was of the opinion that one of these parties ought to have nothing at all, because the Government had kept a portion of the cotton so long that what was left had risen in price sufficient to pay them for the whole of it. That assessment certainly was not adopted. It was a case involving a good deal of testimony as to the value of the cotton. That is the only question in the case of Anderson & White. The value of their cotton is reported at fifty-five cents a pound, while in the other case the cotton taken at the same time from the same warehouse is put at twenty-three cents a pound. It is to reconcile this difference that the recommittal of this bill is now asked.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The motion was agreed to.

THE WASHINGTON MONUMENT.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be instructed to ascertain whether or not the materials of the present unfinished Washington monument would be sufficient for the erection of an arch, imposing as to size and artistic in form, to be called the Arch of Washington, the probable expense of such a change, and also to ascertain if the Washington National Monument Society will give their assent to any such arrangement, provided Congress should agree to the same.

It is obvious, I suppose, to all Senators that this monument, unfinished as it is, has long been a by-word and reproach to the country. There are various projects pending relative to its final completion, all involving a very large expenditure. It has occurred to me that there are ample materials for the building of a large and imposing arch that would be very much better as an ornament and far more beautiful as a whole than this monument would be even if it should ever be finished, and it could be done at comparatively a very small expense. Then a large number of the very beautiful blocks that are contained in the inside of the present structure, where they are completely hidden from view, might be brought where they would be seen and made not only useful but ornamental.

I merely ask for this information in order to contribute something to the solution of what appears to be a great difficulty as to what shall be done with the unfortunate monument. I understand that there are thirty acres of land attached to it, and if the society should consent to this arrangement we should recover the thirty acres of land, besides completing the monument in such form as would perhaps satisfy the country.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. ANTHONY. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That hereafter the daily hour of the meeting of the Senate be eleven o'clock a. m.

Mr. BOREMAN. I object to the consideration of that resolution to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be laid over, under the rule.

Mr. BOREMAN subsequently said: After consideration, I think it proper to withdraw the objection I made to the resolution of the Senator from Rhode Island.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That resolution will be again read.

The resolution was read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the words "until otherwise ordered" be added.

Mr. ANTHONY. I accept the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be so modified.

The resolution, as modified, was agreed to.

BUSINESS OF COMMITTEE ON CLAIMS.

Mr. DAVIS. Some ten days ago the chairman of the Committee on Claims gave notice that he would ask that the bills reported from that committee be considered to-morrow. I desire to ask the Senate to permit me to submit a few remarks, as soon as the regular morning business shall be over to-morrow, on the subject of claims.

UPPER AND LOWER BANDS OF SIOUX.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bills on the Calendar will be reported.

The first bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 405) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to discharge certain obligations of the United States to creditors of the Upper and Lower bands of Sioux Indians.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. House bill No. 420, precisely like the Senate bill now under consideration, has passed the House; and I move that it be substituted for the Senate bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 420) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to discharge certain obligations of the United States to the creditors of the Upper and Lower bands of Sioux Indians.

The Secretary of the Interior is by the bill empowered to discharge all obligations of the United States to the creditors of the Upper and Lower bands of Sioux Indians, arising under the treaty of June 19, 1858, between those bands and the United States, and from the diversion by the United States of the funds and assets of the Indians in their possession and control applicable to that purpose, but the amount allowed and paid on the indebtedness shall in no event exceed the sum of $70,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senate bill No. 205 will be indefinitely postponed.

POTTAWATOMIE INDIANS.

Mr. INGALLS. During my absence from the Senate in February last the bill (S. No. 218) to enable the Secretary of the Interior to make final settlement with the Pottawatomie Indians, of Michigan and Indiana, under treaty stipulations existing with them, was passed over because I was not present to give it my attention. In order that the matter may be disposed of I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of that bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Let the bill be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information, subject to objection.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. I object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I hope the Senator will withdraw his objection, and let the bill be considered.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. I am not ready to consider it. My impression is that the bill does not do justice to the Pottawatomie Indians. I have seen some of them since I have been here. They have heavy complaints to make. I do not know whether they are well founded or not; but it is a matter that ought to be looked into carefully, and if I understand this bill aright, it does not provide a sufficient fund to satisfy the just demands of those Indians against the Government. That is my belief, and therefore I prefer that the matter should go over.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Then I will suggest that it be called up again at an early day, by which time the Senator may have an opportunity to look into it.

Mr. RAMSEY. What bill is this?

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. The bill in regard to the Pottawatomies.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) Objection is made to the consideration of the bill, and it will be passed over.

FISK UNIVERSITY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 313) to confirm the purchase, by the executive department, of three acres of land, more or less, in the vicinity of Nashville, Tennessee known as the site of Fort Houston, and to donate and convey the same to the Fisk University for educational purposes.

Mr. BOUTWELL. When that bill was last up I recollect that the Senator from Vermont, who is not now in his seat, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] objected to it, and I should like to have it go over on his account.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Does the Senator object to its consideration?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I object on account of the circumstance that the Senator from Vermont who is not now in his seat, when present expressed a desire to discuss this bill.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I shall call it up when he is present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be laid aside informally.

CHARLES M'CARTY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2095) granting a pension to Charles McCarty; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Secretary of the Interior is directed by the bill to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Charles McCarty, late an engineer on the Mississippi Railroad, and pay him a pension.

The Committee on Pensions reported an amendment to add the words "at eight dollars per month."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

It was ordered that the amendment be engrossed, and the bill read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

STREET RAILWAY IN WASHINGTON.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2102) to incorporate the Capitol, North O Street and South Washington Railway Company.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I object to the consideration of the bill in consequence of the absence of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.] I desire it to be laid aside informally.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be laid aside.

MINERAL LANDS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No 2543) in relation to mineral lands.

Mr. INGALLS. Let that go over informally so as not to lose its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered.

HOMESTEAD SETTLERS.

Mr. INGALLS. I object to the next bill also, the bill (S. No. 174) for the relief of certain settlers upon homestead and pre-emption lands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be laid aside.

SALT WORKS IN KENTUCKY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 496) for the relief of those suffering from the destruction of the salt-works near Manchester, Kentucky, pursuant to the orders of Major-General Carlos Buell.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not believe that can pass without objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be laid aside.

THE TWO PER CENT. FUND.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 637) to settle certain accounts between the United States and the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois.

Mr. SARGENT. I object to the consideration of that bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be laid aside.

Mr. OGLESBY. The bill which is objected to has been "read and passed to a second reading," according to the Calendar. Is there any objection to reading it a second time now?

Mr. CONKLING. What is the motion about that bill?

Mr. OGLESBY. There was objection to its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CONKLING. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be laid aside.

Mr. OGLESBY. May I not understand the position of the bill? It was read once and appears on the Calendar as having passed to a second reading. I wish to ascertain now whether the bill can be read the second time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is on the Calendar in regular order, and is to be considered as in Committee of the Whole when taken up, and then reported to the Senate. In order to do that it must be read a second time; but objection is made to its present consideration, and it therefore goes over.

Mr. CONKLING. And I will say now in frankness to the Senator that whenever it is proposed to read it a second time, I have a point of order to submit, which point of order disputes the presence of the bill in the Senate, whether in Committee of the Whole or anywhere else, and I have no objection to making the point of order now if the Senator wishes me to do it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has not yet been read the second time.

Mr. OGLESBY. I should like to hear the point of order now.

Mr. CONKLING. I will make it if it be the pleasure of the Senator. I did not expect to make it at this time, and therefore I have not the record before me, and the Senate will pardon me for occupying a moment more than would be necessary otherwise.

As I understand the history of this bill, a petition was brought here by a person acting as agent, so called, of those concerned. That petition was handed, I think to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. PRATT] with a request, I am informed, that he should have it referred to a particular committee, one of the land committees of the Senate, the subject having previously been in charge of another committee. Although this does not concern the point of order, I mention it in justice to myself as one of my reasons for insisting on the point.

From the committee thus selected by the agent, who was managing this business beyond the walls of the Senate, a bill was reported by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. OGLESBY.] It turned out afterward, as I understand the facts—and if I am wrong I of course shall be corrected—that five members of that committee, as I am told, united in a report adverse to this bill; and I inquire of the Senator from New Hampshire, whom I see in his seat, whether I am or am not right in supposing that the report presented by him was signed by five members of the committee?

Mr. WADLEIGH. It was.

Mr. CONKLING. There is a report, then, adverse to this bill made upon this bill, and signed not only by a majority of the committee but by all the committee save two of its members, as I understand.

My point of order is that, although a committee has power to originate a bill never referred to it, although it has power to bring it into the Senate and cause it to be read a first and second time and so be on the way to its third reading, two members of a committee, in defiance of the adverse judgment of five other members of the committee, cannot originate and report a bill. And as supplemental to the point I venture to suggest to the Chair that I am not late in making this point of order, because a point of order is always in time if made as soon as the information reaches the Senate upon which the point of order rests. It was not known nor could it be known to any member of the Senate that five of this committee had reported adversely to this bill. It now is reached, and at the earliest moment, taking this time at the suggestion of my friend from Illinois, I submit, and I suggest to the Chair that I submit in season, this point of order.

Mr. SARGENT. I did not wish to interrupt my friend from New York, but I believe this is entirely out of order. I objected to the consideration of the bill, which objection I suppose embraces the point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator having objected to the present consideration of the bill, the bill must be laid aside. The Senator from New York then stated what would be a point of order when the bill was reached; he has given notice of a point of order.

Mr. CONKLING. And then the Senator from Illinois requested me to make the point of order now, which I did not for my own convenience but for his. I only want to address the point to the Chair so that it may take effect at the proper time.

Mr. OGLESBY. I am unwilling that——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator rise to a point of order?

Mr. OGLESBY. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. OGLESBY. I state the point of order that the objection raised against the consideration of this bill in its proper place on the Calendar comes too late, as made by the Senator from New York.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York has not made a point of order. He has simply given notice that he will make it when the bill shall be taken up and has stated what the point of order will be. It is not made and is not before the Chair.

Mr. OGLESBY. I wish to make this remark——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is out of order.

Mr. OGLESBY. I am not going to debate anything. I am only desiring to make an inquiry of the Chair. Can a Senator rise in his place on this floor upon a proposition to raise a question at some future time, and, in explanation of what his motion will be, state facts about a report that when a full examination shall be made he will not be able to sustain, and then, after the explanations are made and have gone into the RECORD, no opportunity be given for a counter-explanation?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from Illinois desires to make a personal explanation he can ask leave to do so, and the Senate will undoubtedly give him leave.

Mr. CONKLING. There is no objection to that.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it is right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. OGLESBY. I think it not so important to myself as to the rights of the States concerned. Those States were represented by a State agent employed and authorized by each of them to represent their interests here in this matter. That State agent, Mr. I. N. Morris, of Illinois, comes here during this session of Congress and presents in the name of the three governors of Indiana, Ohio, and Illinois a memorial. One of the Senators from the State of Indiana presented in this body that memorial and supposed in presenting the memorial that he also presented a joint resolution. The memorial was referred to the Committee on Public Lands. When it came into the Committee on Public Lands the Senator from Indiana discovered that he had omitted to present the joint resolution with the memorial. The subject was then taken up in the Committee on Public Lands and a vote was taken in the committee upon reporting the measure. There was a majority of the committee who recommended that a bill be prepared and brought into the Senate providing for the payment of the claims of these three States. I was then instructed by the Committee on Public Lands to prepare a report and to bring that report before the Committee on Public Lands prior to final action. I did so prepare a report on the subject; I did bring it into the Committee on Public Lands; I did open it, and propose and insist upon reading the report to the committee. I was prepared, and I was anxious to read it. The committee said they did not care to take time to hear the report, that they were satisfied without that, and thereupon the chairman of the committee, the honorable Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. SPRAGUE,] inquired of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. PRATT] if he voted in favor of reporting the bill with the report, and he answered that he did. He then inquired of the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM,] and he answered that he did. He then inquired of the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. TIPTON,] and he replied that he did. He then inquired of the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. KELLY,] and that Senator replied that he did so vote. He then inquired of me and I replied that I did, and I thereupon took down the votes. No one of the members of the committee signed that report. I had prepared the report; and I authorized the gentleman who took it to the Public Printer to add our names to it, and the whole five names were put there under my direction as each one of the Senators on the committee had in response to the chairman of the committee said that he instructed me to report the bill from that committee with that report, and to recommend its passage.

These are the facts, and upon them I reported the bill; the report went to the Public Printer, came back into this body with our names signed to it, and it was alluded to and discussed here on an objection raised by the honorable Senator from New Jersey when all five of the members were in this body and knew that the majority report signed by five was here before them. It was perfectly well understood, and every Senator whose name was to that report must have known it was there by his own consent and direction. Subsequently, under the permission of the committee, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. WADLEIGH] prepared a minority report. The committee gave him full authority to do so. After the Senator from New Hampshire prepared his minority report, he submitted it individually to members to sign it, and five Senators signed that minority report, as the Senator from New York says. Five have signed that report; and I had explicit, open, and direct authority to put the five names I did to the first report. I did so, and I am responsible for it, and I know it was their report. Now if any Senator chooses to change his mind about it, that is good ground of course. If all the Senators who signed the majority report on consideration prefer to sign the minority report, I shall not object, and no one else will. There was no misunderstanding certainly when the report was brought in.

I did wish at some day to have a fair hearing of this measure. I was anxious, representing one of those States, that this subject might be fairly debated in this body, and if the States are not entitled to the money they claim, let it be decided against them and dismiss them from this Congress and from all Congresses. But if they are entitled to the money, it is proper and right that the matter should be settled during this session of Congress. I am not willing that the subject shall be ejected from congressional consideration by side motions or by any other than a direct vote. I believe the claim is just.

Mr. KELLY. I wish to make a personal explanation in regard to this matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the Senator from Oregon making a personal explanation? The Chair hears none.

Mr. KELLY. There is certainly a misapprehension on the part of the Senator from Illinois, who reported this bill, as to what took place in the committee. It was discussed for some time, and finally in the absence of the Senator from Nevada who is a member of the committee, [Mr. STEWART,] and the Senator from Massachusetts who is on the committee, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] a majority were in favor of this report. There were 4 to 3. I was in the committee, and the vote was 4 to 2, leaving myself out.

I made a statement to the purport that I had voted for the bill at the last session of Congress, but that I was not wholly satisfied with it; that I reserved the right to make a further investigation of the matter. I stated that in view of the fact that there was a majority then present in favor of reporting the bill. I made the statement, as I think the chairman and others of the committee will verify, that I had voted for the bill at the last session of Congress, but was not altogether satisfied with it; that I wished further investigation upon the subject, and that I had no objection to make to the reporting of the bill. That was what I said, that I made no objection to reporting the bill; but I did not wish myself to be committed by the report. That was my distinct statement. I suppose the Senator who reported the bill understood from what I said that I favored the bill, or from the fact that I had voted for it that I meant to vote for it in committee. That was not my statement. I did vote for the bill at the last session of Congress, but I suppose that one may change his opinion if he becomes satisfied that the vote he gave was an erroneous one; and that is what I said.

I did not authorize my name to be signed to the report. I would not have signed it had it been presented to me. I did sign the so-called minority report against the bill. This bill is properly on the Calendar, as I understand, because two members who have signed what may be called the minority report, or the report against the bill, were absent from the committee when it acted, and as I understand a quorum being present, the majority undoubtedly did authorize the bill to be reported.

Mr. OGLESBY. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. KELLY. Certainly.

Mr. OGLESBY. Does not the Senator remember that I was authorized to prepare a report and to bring it to the committee before reporting the bill to the Senate?

Mr. KELLY. Undoubtedly.

Mr. OGLESBY. Did I not prepare a report and lay it before the committee?

Mr. KELLY. Certainly.

Mr. OGLESBY. Was not the bill, with the report, the chairman being in his seat, the Senator from Rhode Island, submitted to the consideration of the committee, to all those present in the committee-room?

Mr. KELLY. I do not know whether they were all present.

Mr. OGLESBY. Did I not open the report and offer to read it?

Mr. KELLY. Yes, sir.

Mr. OGLESBY. And do you not remember that then the chairman of the committee called each gentleman and asked him if he voted to report that bill and recommend its passage, with that report? I certainly remember that the chair called us one after another. The Senator from Oregon sat immediately on my left and answered "ay."

Mr. KELLY. The Senator is mistaken in that.

Mr. OGLESBY. How could I then have had this report ordered to be made by a majority?

Mr. KELLY. For the very reason that two who signed the other report were absent. The Senator from Massachusetts was absent and the Senator from Nevada was absent, and a majority of those present were in favor of reporting the bill.

Mr. OGLESBY. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator; but how could I have been instructed by the gentlemen named to make the report? I stated to a gentleman to put down in pencil-mark the names of those who voted for the bill. I took it down and have the minute in my desk. He gave me the names. Now, the Senator I believe does not think that he voted "ay" in response to the call of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. KELLY. I did not vote for it.

Mr. OGLESBY. The vote was to report the bill to the Senate and recommend its passage.

Mr. KELLY. I simply said that I made no objection to reporting the bill back, but that I did not consider myself committed by the report. There was already, as I have stated, a majority without me, to report the bill favorably in the absence of the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Nevada. There was a majority present in favor of it, and a majority did direct it to be reported; but, as I stated, I did not commit myself to it. I wished further light on the subject and did not sign the report and did not authorize my name to be signed to it.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator rise to a personal explanation?

Mr. SPRAGUE. A word on this subject. The Committee on Public Lands did authorize the Senator from Illinois to make the report, and the qualifying expression as to the vote that he gave was stated by the Senator from Oregon. At the same time the Senator from New Hampshire was authorized to make a minority report, and one of the committee stated at the same time that he should unite with the minority report when made. The appearance of the names of other members on the minority report is accounted for by their not being at that meeting of the committee. But that the Senator from Illinois was authorized by a majority of the committee to make the report, is clearly so.

Mr. CONKLING rose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator rise to a personal explanation?

Mr. CONKLING. I rise to ask unanimous consent to move to recommit this bill to the Committee on Public Lands, which I do neither in friendship nor hostility to the bill. Evidently there is a misunderstanding among the members of the committee, and the record here looks very strange. Here is a committee of seven, five members one way and five the other!

Several SENATORS. A committee of nine.

Mr. CONKLING. Nine. That makes it worse. Then there is a committee of nine, with five each way. [Laughter.] My honorable friend from Illinois says five authorized the bill to be reported, and here is a report before us signed by five saying that they are opposed to it. I must insist that there were five one way and five the other, although there were only nine men on the committee; and it is a little hard to see how it was done. But there is a misunderstanding about it, and I suggest that the true way is to recommit the bill and let such action be taken as will harmonize with itself upon the record. If the committee be in favor of the bill that will not retard it at all; on the contrary it will be better off than it is now, hung up on first reading with this point of order pending. Therefore if there be no objection I move to recommit the bill.

Mr. OGLESBY. I object.

Mr. SHERMAN. We all understand how it is. This occurs a hundred times.

Mr. MORTON. I hope the bill will not be recommitted.

Mr. SHERMAN. This thing has often occurred in the absence of members of a committee. A majority of a committee may be really against a bill, and yet a majority at the moment may concur in reporting it. The explanation made by the Senator from Oregon is very simple. The report was made and he reserved the right to object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from Ohio to object to the motion being entertained.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not in order. The bill has been objected to, and is not before the Senate.

Mr. KELLY. Can it not be taken up by vote of the Senate? I move that all prior orders be dispensed with and this bill be taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him.

Mr. CONKLING. For the purpose of recommitting it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. THURMAN. If it is taken up you cannot limit the purpose.

Mr. OGLESBY. We are willing to take up the bill for consideration.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I object to taking up the bill at the present time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oregon to take up the bill under consideration.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 637) to settle certain accounts between the United States and the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois was read the second time.

Mr. KELLY. I now move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

The message also announced that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the following bills:

A bill (H. R. No. 3161) to enable the Secretary of War to carry out the act of April 23, 1874, entitled "An act to provide for the relief of the persons suffering from the overflow of the Mississippi River;" and

A bill (H. R. No. 3028) giving the assent of Congress for the improvement of the Wolf River across the Menomonee Indian reservation, in the State of Wisconsin.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 149) for the relief of certain settlers on the Fort Randall military reservation;

A bill (S. No. 347) granting a portion of the United States military reservation at Salt Lake City for cemetery purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 3028) giving the assent of Congress for the improvement of the Wolf River across the Menomonee Indian reservation, in the State of Wisconsin;

A bill (H. R. No. 3161) to enable the Secretary of War to carry out the act of April 23, 1874, entitled "An act to provide for the relief of the persons suffering from the overflow of the Mississippi River," and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 83) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to remove the powder-magazine from Fort Norfolk, Norfolk, Virginia;

A bill (H. R. No. 1201) authorizing the payment of prize-money to the officers and crew of the United States steamer Bienville;
A bill (H. R. No. 1404) for the relief of William F. Kerr; and
A bill (H. R. No. 1776) for the relief of George Yount.

OCCUPYING CLAIMANTS ON PUBLIC LANDS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2078) for the benefit of occupying claimants.

The bill was read.

The Committee on the Judiciary reported the bill with amendments, which were in line 6 after the word "entitled" to insert "in the Federal courts," and in line 10 to strike out the words "emanated from" and to insert "been granted by."

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to hear the bill read as it will stand if amended.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That when an occupant of land, having color of title, in good faith has made valuable improvements thereon, and is, in the proper action, found not to be the rightful owner thereof, such occupant shall be entitled in the Federal courts to all the rights and remedies, and upon instituting the proper proceedings such relief, as may be given or secured to him by the statutes of the State or Territory where the land lies, although the title of the plaintiff in the action may have been granted by the United States after said improvements were so made.

Mr. SARGENT. I have my doubts as to that bill.

Mr. STEWART. I doubt whether the bill ought to pass. It ought to be looked into.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill will be laid aside.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is too late to do that this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business, which is Senate bill No. 7, called the Geneva award bill, upon which the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to inquire whether my motion will be the pending motion in the morning hour to-morrow? I do not want the bill to lose its place.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There have been two bills passed over informally this morning, which will take precedence of this one.

Mr. SARGENT. I suggest to the Senator from Iowa that we can examine this bill by to-morrow. It may be that the bill is right.

Mr. WRIGHT. I desire to have it understood that it is not passed on the Calendar.

Mr. SARGENT. I will withdraw the objection, and will examine the bill by to-morrow morning.

THE GENEVA AWARD.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 7) for the creation of a court for the adjudication and disposition of certain moneys received into the Treasury under an award made by the tribunal of arbitration constituted by virtue of the first article of the treaty concluded at Washington the 8th of May, A. D. 1871, between the United States of America and the Queen of Great Britain, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. THURMAN, which was to strike out in section 12, commencing on line 13, the following words:

And no claim shall be admissible or allowed by said court by or in behalf of any insurance company or insurer, either in its or his own right or as assignee, or otherwise, in the right of a person or party insured as aforesaid, unless such claimant shall show, to the satisfaction of said court; that during the late rebellion the sum of its or his losses, in respect to its or his war risks, exceeded the sum of its or his premiums or other gains upon or in respect to such war risks; and in case of any such allowance, the same shall not be greater than such excess of loss.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Before the Senator from Ohio commences his remarks and while the Senate is full, I wish to give notice that on account of the lateness of the season and the large number of matters on the Calendar, I shall ask the Senate, (in which I hope the Senator from Ohio will concur,) to stay here to-day and finish this bill.

Mr. THURMAN. I suppose there are other Senators who wish to speak on the bill, and I cannot be a party to any arrangement which will deprive them of an opportunity to do so.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I desire to speak myself, but I wish to have the bill disposed of to-day.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, the question immediately before the Senate is the amendment offered by me to strike out that clause in the twelfth section of this bill which prohibits the payment of anything to insurance companies, or to speak more briefly, to underwriters, beyond the amount that they may have lost in their general business as underwriters upon the risks taken by them for war premiums. The bill excludes the claim of these underwriters unless upon a balance-sheet of their whole business it appears that they have incurred loss, and then it indemnifies them no further than the loss that appears thus to have been incurred upon their whole business. It introduces an element in the calculation of loss never before heard of, I believe, in any legislative assembly or before any judicial tribunal. It requires a man to lose a perfectly valid claim if in the whole of his business—not simply that business out of which that particular claim arose, but all his other business—he has been so fortunate as to make money. It makes the justice of a man's claim depend not upon its validity under the law, not upon the principles of morality or equity as known to the civilized world, but upon his success as a business man. That is the bill of this committee.

Mr. BAYARD. May I ask my friend if it would not work also the other way? Suppose his losses exceeded his gains, would he be remunerated at all?

Mr. THURMAN. Then they will remunerate him in the one particular case, but they will not remunerate him for the whole amount of his losses.

That is the bill of this committee. I propose to strike out that provision which excludes the claims of the underwriters from consideration. I do not propose to enact that their claims shall be allowed. All I ask is that their claims may go before the court which it is the purpose of this bill to establish, or before such other judicial tribunal as may have the charge of adjudicating upon these claims, to stand or to fall according to their merits. That is all that I ask. I ask that these people may have the same right that all other people have in a case that is in its nature judicial, to have their claim heard and not to have it cut off by legislative decree instead of by judicial sentence.

Now, let us see what these claims are; and first in regard to the amount of them and by whom they are held; because it seems that some prejudice has grown up against insurance companies and their claims are regarded as the claims of extortioners. It has been said they received a premium for insuring, and if they paid the loss they paid nothing more than they were bound by their contract to do, and they ought to bear the loss. Those who say that, have but an imperfect idea of what the contract of insurance is; but of that I will speak presently. Others again have said that they were sharks, extortioners, who sought to obtain money out of a business in which they had already accumulated vast sums of money; as if the business of insurance was not a lawful business, as if it were not a meritorious business, as if it were not a business upon which the success of commerce to a great degree depends, as if it were not especially a business that is beneficial to the poor man who is unable to bear the loss and therefore cannot insure himself.

Now, let us see what these claims of the insurance companies are. The amount of the claims as ultimately revised was $4,002,872—I speak without interest, of course—and of these there are held by mutual insurance companies $2,634,243, and by stock companies $1,368,629. Of these stock companies ten of them in the city of Boston failed by reason of the Boston fire, holding claims to the amount of $666,691, every dollar of which, if these companies receive it under this award, will go to pay the losses of the sufferers by the Boston fire. I do not think these are a set of men who deserve to be very much denounced, or that the ultimate destiny of this money is one that the Congress of the United States ought to prevent by an arbitrary edict of law.

But again, sir, I have shown you that much the larger portion, two-thirds of the amounts due to insurance companies are due to mutual insurance companies. What are mutual insurance companies? Mutual insurance companies, the marine companies, are companies in which merchants and shippers take stock and agree in effect to mutually insure each other. That is what they do, and they are as much, in equity, in morals, in conscience, entitled to be paid for their losses as is the man who sailed his ship without any insurance at all and became his own insurer. They are not men speculating upon war premiums paid by other persons; they are men who pay the premiums as between themselves, and whatever profit is derived from the war premiums goes to themselves. They make no money off the necessities of other people. They speculate off no man's misfortunes. They simply mutually guarantee each other against loss; that is all they do; and if the stronger of them are able to pay, then the weaker are protected. Those are the kind of companies which hold two-thirds of these claims. I defy any man to give any good reason why ten merchants constituting a mutual insurance company should be compelled to present a balance-sheet of all their gains and losses, while ten merchants who each insures for himself, that is, take no insurance at all, are not required to make any such exhibit. It cannot be done. There is no difference in principle between the one case and the other.

But, Mr. President, here is another thing. It has been said, "If you pay to these insurance companies the money will not go to those who were shareholders in the insurance companies at the time the losses accrued, but will go to other persons who have no earthly interest whatsoever in the money and never paid anything for it." That is a mistake. The most of these insurance companies are in the State of New York, and to meet that very case, with the assent of the insurance companies, upon their petition as I am informed, the General Assembly of New York has passed an act that the money if recovered by them shall be paid to those who were shareholders at the time the losses were paid.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is that act constitutional, does the Senator think?

Mr. THURMAN. I think if the insurance companies have petitioned for that act, and assent to it, it is perfectly constitutional.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is, if every shareholder has petitioned?

Mr. THURMAN. I think there is no trouble about that, and none need be anticipated upon that score.

These, then, are the men whose claims are presented for consideration. Now, let us see upon what foundation their claims rest. They rest upon the foundation of a law almost as old as commerce itself in modern times; a law that prevails in every civilized country of this globe where there is such a thing as underwriting known. It is the law which subrogates the underwriter to the rights of the assured upon an abandonment of the property lost and payment by the insurer.

How is it that this rule obtains? Why, sir, it obtains and is part of every contract of insurance. I said awhile ago that objection had been made that these insurance companies had received premiums for insuring, and therefore had been paid what they stipulated to receive; and that hence they were bound to pay the loss and had no right to ask any indemnity for it. That is not the true statement of the contract of insurance at all. The underwriter does not insure for the premium only. The law of the land is written in that contract as effectually as if it were written in express words; and that law of the land is that the insurer shall have not simply the premium, but also what the law calls the spes recuperandi, the hope of recovery of anything that can be recovered, either of the thing that was lost in specie or from any wrong-doer who has occasioned the loss. The contract of insurance, therefore, is just as if it were written "for so many dollars and for the right of reclamation of all of the insured thing that can be reclaimed in specie and of all damages that can be obtained from any wrong-doer causing the loss, I, the underwriter, agree to insure you against loss and damage." Those are the considerations, and they enter into every contract of insurance just as if they were written in it, and they are understood by the whole mercantile world. They are better understood in marine insurance policies than they are in fire insurance policies, although precisely the same law obtains in the case of the fire policy, as was decided by the Supreme Court of the United States only two years ago.

That is the contract, then. The merchant makes that contract with the insurance company, and he has no right whatsoever to break that contract; he has no right whatsoever to repudiate that contract; and to the honor of the American merchants I say that while there were thousands of these claims, there were very few men who dared, who had the effrontry, to claim that they should receive pay for their property under the Geneva award or from Great Britain when they had received pay from the insurance companies.

But, sir, is that the law that there is this subrogation, and that therefore it enters into every contract? For I need not tell a lawyer that the law of the land is part of every contract and need not be written in the contract. The law writes it there as fully as any scrivener could do. Is that the law? In the first place, I might say that it is hardly necessary to consider that question in the most of these cases, for in almost every one of them the insured made an assignment to the insurer, the underwriter, when he received his loss; so that here by plain contract of assignment these insurance companies hold all the rights that the original owners held. But, sir, they needed no such written assignment. The law itself is as good as any assignment could be; and that that is a fact I beg leave to refer to the very highest authority that can be read upon this subject. What said the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Comegys vs. Vasse, (1 Peters, 193,) and in which the authorities upon the subject are considered? Vasse was an underwriter. The ship that he insured was illegally captured by the Spaniards. In the course of time Vasse become bankrupt and proceedings in bankruptcy under the act of 1800 or 1801 were prosecuted against him, and he made the assignment required by that law. In the course of time Spain paid an indemnity for the losses sustained by American citizens owing to illegal captures made by Spanish vessels, and among others paid on account of the ship that had been insured by Vasse the sum of $3,846.14. That money was paid by the Government to the assignees in bankruptcy of Vasse, Comegys and another. Afterward Vasse filed a bill against those assignees in bankruptcy and claimed the money himself. Mark it, he did not deny that the money went to the underwriter, but the point upon which he claimed it was that the claim was not in its nature assignable under the bankrupt law to the assignees and did not pass by his assignment in bankruptcy, and therefore remained to himself.

What did the court decide? The court decided that upon the abandonment of the vessel by the owner the whole right to that vessel, and not only the right to the vessel and whatever might be saved of her, but the right to any indemnity that might be obtained from Spain, passed instantly to Vasse, the underwriter. His right being established, then came the question whether or not that right which was thus vested in Vasse passed by his assignment in bankruptcy to his assignee, and the court held that it did. That is not material to this question; but the court held distinctly that it was a claim that was assignable; that the right to recover the spes recuperandi even against a foreign government, even though it could not be enforced by any proceeding in law, even though it could not be enforced except by our own Government by means of war or reprisals or negotiations, yet that spes recuperandi was an assignable thing, and did pass by the assignment made by Vasse to his assignees in bankruptcy. Upon that subject Judge Story delivered a most elaborate opinion; and after reviewing and quoting the authorities and showing that such is the law in England, he says:

> But it is decisive that the assignment by abandonment is competent not only to pass the property itself, or its proceeds, if restored, after an unjust capture, but also any compensation awarded by way of indemnity therefor. The case before Lord Hardwicke was the stronger, because the indemnity was awarded to the party by his own sovereign, and not by the sovereign of the captors. Mr. Marshall and Mr. Park manifestly contemplate the case as establishing the principle that any indemnity, however arising, is a trust for the underwriters, after they have paid the loss.

Judge Story proceeds to state the case of Gracie vs. The New York Insurance Company, (8 Johnson's Reports, 237,) and to approve of that; and in that case Chief Justice Kent said:

> One question was whether the jury were at liberty to deduct from the total loss the value of the spes recuperandi. The court held that they were not. Mr. Chief Justice Kent, in delivering the opinion of the court, said:
> "If France should, at any future period, agree to and actually make compensation for the capture and condemnation in question, the Government of the United States, to whom the compensation would, in the first instance, be payable, would become trustee for the party having the equitable title to the reimbursement; and this would clearly be the defendants, (the underwriters,) if they should pay the amount."

Could words be more appropriate to this case? I might say mutatis mutandis, and it might have been said before Great Britain paid this money in the very language that Kent used: "If Great Britain should, at any future period, agree to and actually make compensation for the capture and condemnation in question, the Government of the United States, to whom the compensation would, in the first instance, be payable, would become trustee for the party having the equitable title to the reimbursement; and this would clearly be the defendants, (the underwriters,) if they should pay the amount."

Again, the Supreme Court of the United States cite the case of Watson vs. The Insurance Company of North America, (1 Binney, 47,) and show that it proceeds upon the same principle:

> It admits—
> Says Judge Story—
> that the spes recuperandi passes by an abandonment to the underwriter; and the question there was, whether its value, when not abandoned, was to be deducted from the total loss.

But, sir, a case was referred to in this decision, Randall vs. Cochran, (1 Vesey, 98,) in the English court, in which Lord Hardwicke, the greatest chancellor that ever sat upon the wool-sack in England, decided, even in a case in which the indemnity was obtained by letters of marque and reprisal, where the British government obtained indemnity by main force, by reprisals, and the money came into the treasury, that it was money in trust for the sufferers, and that the sufferer in the particular case was the underwriter, who by subrogation was entitled to all the claims of the assured. That is a stronger case, the strongest case on record.

But, sir, I like the way in which it was put by Cowen in the case of Rogers vs. Hosack's Executors, (18 Wendell, 319,) the beginning of the case. In that case, in which the same doctrine was recognized and enforced, Judge Cowen, delivering the opinion of the court, said:

> All the authorities are that the assignment becomes absolute from the time of the abandonment. It was not too strongly put upon the argument. The deed of a man's farm could not operate more clearly to change the legal right. That an abandonment passes to the underwriters all the claim of the assured against a foreign government on account of illegal capture was held by the Supreme Court of the United States in respect to the late claims of our merchants upon Spain.

Citing Comegys vs. Vasse, 1 Peters. There you have the judicial decisions; there is not one to the contrary; and it is not only the law in this country, but it is the law elsewhere. As I showed to the Senate, it is the continental law. The doctrine came from the civil law, as my friend from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] suggests. The doctrine is briefly stated in Gauthier on Subrogation, a work well known to lawyers as of the highest authority upon the civil law, in which it is said—I translate:

> The insurers who have paid the loss upon an abandonment, for example in the case of a capture of the ship, are equally subrogated to all the rights of the assured.

Dixon on Subrogation says:

> The right of subrogation exists in favor of an insurer who has been subjected to liability and made payment of a policy of insurance on the happening of the loss to all actions against the person by whose negligence or wrong the loss was caused.

So that it is the civil law as well as our own law that this is in effect a part of the contract between the insurer and the insured; that the insurer shall have not simply his premium, but also whatever can be recovered either of the property in specie or from any wrong-doer or other person who is bound to make indemnity. It may be that I am hardly excusable for taking up so much time to establish what is not denied by the majority of the Judiciary Committee. They do not deny, they are too good lawyers to deny, that this right of subrogation exists, and therefore they put this bill upon a different footing.

Before passing, however, to consider the ground urged by the chairman of the committee I ought to mention another thing. This right of subrogation was expressly admitted before the Geneva tribunal by Sir Roundell Palmer, the counsel for England, the attorney-general of England, and also by Chief Justice Cockburn, the English arbitrator. It was insisted upon on our side and admitted on the side of the British government.

But that is not all. We have, I am told, a striking instance of the application of this rule under the proceedings of the mixed commission which sat under this very same treaty, but held its sessions here in Washington for the adjudication of claims of British subjects upon the United States and of American citizens upon Great Britain growing out of other matters than those which were generically called the Alabama claims. By this mixed commission claims have been allowed to British insurance companies for insurance of French property, although there was nothing in the treaty agreeing to pay Frenchmen any loss. The treaty is simply to pay the loss of British subjects; and yet where a Frenchman had his property insured in a British insurance company, the loss taking place and the company paying it, it became the loss of the British subject and the claim has been allowed by the mixed commission. That is one of the strongest applications of the doctrine that could possibly be conceived; but it is no more than the law, it is no more than justice, it is no more than right.

Now, Mr. President, I proceed to notice the objection that is made to allowing these insurance companies any indemnity. It consists of this proposition, laid down by the chairman of the committee, that there was belligerency between the United States and the Confederate States; that these captures were made by vessels of the Confederate States; that they were therefore captures made by a belligerent, and being made by a belligerent they were, according to the law of war, legal captures, out of which no claim by any individual could possibly arise; and that as no claim against the captors, the confederates, could arise, ergo no claim could arise against Great Britain, because, says the chairman, Great Britain was an accessory before the fact.

These propositions of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee will by no manner of means bear an examination. In the first place, it is true that an individual does not acquire any cause of action, so to speak, in technical terms for the loss of his property taken by a recognized belligerent. If we were at war with Great Britain and Great Britain were to capture our ships on the high seas, of course that would give no right to the individual losers to prefer a claim against the British government. That is all very true; but that it is not exactly the case. In the case of a rebellion it is not clear law that if the rebellion does not succeed the captors who were rebels are not responsible.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the honorable Senator think that they are personally responsible?

Mr. THURMAN. My own impression is that they ought not to be considered responsible individually now; but I cannot say that that is the law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the Senator think as matter of law that they are responsible?

Mr. THURMAN. I can say to the Senator that they have been held responsible by judgment after judgment of the courts.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In what case?

Mr. THURMAN. They have been held responsible in the courts of the United States, as well as in the courts of the State, in West Virginia.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What case in the United States courts?

Mr. THURMAN. In suits brought against members of the invading armies of the confederacy for taking property.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator be kind enough to name the case?

Mr. THURMAN. I cannot name the case, but I know the fact. I know it from the counsel who were engaged in the case. I know it has been so held. It shocked me a little that it should be under such circumstances; but it has been so held, and if the Senator will endeavor to answer the argument upon the law, he will find it a pretty difficult thing to do. The doctrine is in case of an insurrection that if the insurrection succeed, whatever was done under the authority of the insurrectionary power is to be considered as if it had been done by the order of an existing recognized government; but if the insurrection fails, every individual is personally liable who is engaged in a trespass.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Suppose it to get larger than an insurrection and become civil war, what then?

Mr. THURMAN. I am not going to argue that question, because I should myself be horrified at the idea of holding the confederate armies and every man in them liable for the injuries committed by them, or holding individuals liable for the injuries committed by these cruisers. But when the Senator says that this case is like the case of a war between us and one of the recognized powers of the earth, he says what is not stated to be the law in the books.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It has been stated so by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not care how that may be. I am willing to let that branch of the argument go, because I do not wish to argue questions that it is not really necessary to argue. But here comes an error of the Senator for which he will find no support in the books, I venture to say, and that is that Great Britain occupied not the position of a neutral, but the position of an aider or abettor, an accessory before the fact, and that therefore, as there could be no claim against the principal, the Confederate States, there could be no claim against this accessory before the fact. I say that that is to import into this case a nomenclature of mere municipal civil law, a nomenclature that has no existence in the law of war or international law. An accessory before the fact, an aider or abettor, is a belligerent, if the government that is injured sees fit to treat it as such. It is within the power of the government to treat it as a belligerent if good cause is given, or to treat it as a neutral violating its neutral obligations. If the acts of Great Britain were such as gave us just cause of war, we had the option to declare war against her and treat her not as an accessory but as a principal in that war; or we had the right to treat her as a neutral violating her neutral obligations, and make our demands upon her accordingly. And now the question is, in what character did we treat her? Did we treat her as a belligerent, or did we treat her as a neutral? If we treated her as a belligerent, if belligerency between Great Britain and us existed, then every one knows the consequences; then every contract made between British and American citizens during the four years of war was absolutely void; every American citizen who made a contract with a British citizen was liable to punishment under our statutory law. But nobody pretends any such thing as that. During the whole time of that war our minister was at the court of Saint James, the British minister was in Washington, the ordinary intercourse between the governments and between the citizens of the governments went on precisely as if there had been no war; and from the inception of these claims down to the very last day of judgment upon them, our whole claim upon Great Britain was that she omitted to discharge the duties of a neutral; and it will not do now to come and say that Great Britain did not occupy the position of a neutral, but that she was a quasi belligerent, so that no individual claim of a citizen whatsoever could arise or accrue against her. Is there any mistake about this? Let me look a little into the history of these claims to show how they arose.

We had good reason indeed for wanting to maintain peace with Great Britain. We had good reason for not declaring war against her. Had we declared war against her she would have had France on her side and on the side of the Confederate States in twenty-four hours. We, instead of having to fight our southern brethern, would have had to fight them backed by two of the greatest powers of Europe, and perhaps by a third. But, sir, this state of peace that existed between us and Great Britain shielded us from that great danger, and not only shielded us from it but enabled us to draw from her tenfold the supplies of war that were drawn by the confederates, who could only obtain supplies or munitions by means of running our blockade. No, sir; for the best reasons in the world it was that our Government treated Great Britain as a friend and as a neutral; and if there is anything that sheds more glory than another, in my judgment, upon the administration of the President at that time, and especially of the Department of State, it was the infinite skill with which they avoided bringing this country into armed conflict with England and France. I do not think that the diplomacy of any country exhibits more skill than was exhibited by Mr. Lincoln and Mr. Seward in keeping this country at peace with the European powers during the late civil war.

But now, sir, let us see how we treated this matter——

Mr. CONKLING. Will it interrupt the Senator if I should say a word at this point?

Mr. THURMAN. No; I am speaking under so many disadvantages and feel so poorly that I shall be glad of a little rest.

Mr. CONKLING. I have listened with great pleasure to the statement made by the Senator from Ohio as to the relations between Great Britain and this country which preceded the treaty. I would like him to say something of the law upon this point: what difference does it make practically in the face of the treaty and in the face of the award, what the precise relations were before that?

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator is just anticipating me.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg pardon. The Senator from Vermont, referring to the Prize cases, has said that the Supreme Court spoke of the war as being a public war. Suppose that to be true in every sense, and suppose Great Britain, in place of being a negligent or blamable neutral, had been an ally of our enemy, not only an accessory before the fact but a principal in the second degree of those engaged in arms against the Government of the United States; and notwithstanding all that, a treaty was negotiated in which certain agreements were made, and that treaty was consummated by an arbitration, and by the judgment of the tribunal certain claims like those for enhanced war rates, &c., were excluded and certain other claims, among those the one the Senator speaks of, were included in the judgment. Now, even if it had been true, as I have supposed, that a war had existed to which war England was a party against us, we having made this treaty, the award having taken place, and we being parties abiding by it, I beg to know what difference it would make after all as to the rights of underwriters one way or the other? If we find by the treaty and by the award that indemnity has been recovered which upon the face of the papers would pass by right of subrogation, how is that right impaired or how is it affected by whatever may be said of the condition of things which went before and led to the adjudication at Geneva?

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from New York has said what I intended to say in the course of my remarks; but he has said it so much better than I should have done and he has relieved me so much that I am obliged to him for calling the attention of the Senate to that consideration. I shall, however, run a little over the history of these claims to show that from the beginning to the end they were regarded, first as claims of private citizens, and second as claims upon Great Britain as a neutral and founded upon the allegation that she had omitted to perform her neutral obligations. Now, sir, let us see what was the first claim that was made.

I ought to state in general that as these losses occurred, from time to time the losers reported them to the State Department, and in every case the State Department received them, filed them, acknowledged their receipt, undertook to present them to the British government, and did present them to the British government as the individual claims of American citizens who were injured by her breach of neutrality obligations. The first claim arose owing to a destruction of American ships by the Alabama, and it was reported to this Government by Mr. Harvey, our then minister at Lisbon.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator be kind enough to tell me the document he is reading from?

Mr. THURMAN. United States Claims, volume 3, page 64, and volume 3, page 57.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I beg pardon; I thought the Senator was reading from a printed document before him.

Mr. THURMAN. Upon that Mr. Seward wrote to our minister at London in these words, transmitting the paper which had been received from Mr. Harvey:

The President desires that you lay copies, or the substance of them, before Earl Russell—

The British minister of foreign affairs—in such manner as shall seem best calculated to effect two important objects: first, due redress for the national—and private injuries sustained; and, secondly, a prevention of such lawless and injurious proceedings hereafter.

There was the distinct claim made for the private loss, and the proofs of the private loss and of the claim made by the loser were furnished to the British government. Furthermore, on the 3d of November, 1862, the telegraph having announced the destruction of another half-dozen vessels on the seas by the Alabama, Mr. Seward again wrote to Mr. Adams, and said:

The legal proof in support of the claim for indemnity will be collected and transmitted to you as speedily as possible.

On the 19th of December, those papers having been furnished to the British government, Earl Russell, replying to Mr. Adams at length, says:

Her Majesty's government cannot, therefore, admit that they are under any obligations whatever to make compensation to the United States citizens on account of proceedings of that vessel.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator tell me what document he is reading from?

Mr. THURMAN. Volume 3 of the United States Claims, page 92, an abstract. Does the Senator doubt the correctness of these quotations?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not doubt anything. What I wish to get at is, if the Senator does not object, what is the document he is reading from, in order that I may get the same compilation.

Mr. THURMAN. It is a collation made by Mr. Evarts. No doubt the Senator has it. I have compared these quotations with the original as far as seemed to be necessary, but I do not think it necessary to do so to verify Mr. Evarts's citations. I have the books here.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am merely inquiring as a matter of convenience in order that I may have the pleasure of seeing what the Senator has. I have not been favored with one of those documents.

Mr. THURMAN. I think I can send for one for the Senator.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I seem to have been omitted in the distribution.

Mr. THURMAN. I am quite sure the Senator had one at the last session, and I think copies were laid on the table of every Senator. That is the way I picked it up.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I happen to have lost mine.

Mr. THURMAN. I have one which I will send to the Senator.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am obliged to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. THURMAN. I have had occasion to compare many of these citations, and I have never found them erroneous in a single instance; and the original volumes themselves are here at my desk. Now mark, "Her Majesty's government cannot, therefore, admit that they are under any obligations whatever to make compensation to the United States citizens" for claims. Why did not they consider themselves bound? Because they denied that they had been guilty of any negligence. They denied that they had violated any neutral obligation. They did not say "we will not pay the United States citizens because" (as the Senator from Vermont now says) "there could out of these occurrences grow up a claim of a private man upon Great Britain." It was reserved for the Senator from Vermont to make that discovery; and whenever a patent shall be granted for it he will be found to be the first inventor. That never was thought of until the Senator urged it upon the consideration of this bill a year ago. No, sir; it was upon the ground that Great Britain had not been guilty of the imputed negligence that Earl Russell said she would not admit her liability, not to the United States, but to United States citizens. But, sir, it does not end there. Let me turn the attention of the Senate to the first claim made by an insurance company. On the 31st of January, 1863, the following memorial was addressed to Mr Seward:

Your memorialists, representing the New York Mutual Insurance Company of the city of New York, respectfully submit to the Department of State of the United States the following facts, namely, that the said New York Mutual Insurance Company had certain policies of insurance upon the following vessels: Ship Brilliant, $9,245; ship Manchester, $7,500; and the said vessels, in the prosecution of their lawful voyage, were arrested on the high seas by a steamer called the Alabama, and by her boarded and burned, and the New York Mutual Insurance Company have paid the policies of insurance on the above-named vessels in consequence of said destruction; and your memorialists are of the opinion that the said steamer, having been built and fitted out and sailed from a port in Great Britain, and her crew being composed principally of the subjects of the government of Great Britain, she is to all intents and purposes a British vessel.

And your memorialists therefore claim from the government of Great Britain—

The memorialists claim from the government of Great Britain—

And your memorialists therefore claim from the government of Great Britain the repayment to them of the above amounts, with interest accruing thereon, and respectfully request the United States Government to make the necessary claim on their behalf.

JOHN H. EARL, President.
W. P. HANDSFORD,
Secretary.

And what did the Government of the United States do? The Government of the United States did make the necessary claim on behalf of these underwriters. Here is the letter in which that claim was sent to Mr. Adams for presentation:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, February 2, 1863.

SIR: Herewith I inclose, for presentation to the British government, a copy of a memorial just received at this Department from the New York Mutual Insurance Company of the city of New York, relative to losses sustained by it on account of the destruction of the ships Brilliant and Manchester on the high seas by the piratical steamer Alabama.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

CHARLES FRANCIS ADAMS, &c.

On the 19th of February, 1863, Mr. Adams transmitted the above memorial to Earl Russell with the following note:

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
London, February 19, 1863.

MY LORD: At the request of my government, I have the honor to submit to your lordship's consideration a copy of a memorial addressed to the Secretary of State by an association of underwriters in New York.

Renewing assurances, &c.,

CHARLES FRANCIS ADAMS.

Right Hon. EARL RUSSELL, &c.

And so it went on with each case. From that time forward—that was the first—down to the last filing of these claims, each one of them was taken by our Government to prosecute for the sufferer, and forwarded to our minister in London to be laid before the government of Great Britain as a claim made by American citizens for losses accruing out of her failure to perform her neutral obligations. Then what followed? The close of the war came and Great Britain still declined to acknowledge her liability, and thereupon Mr. Johnson, of Maryland, was sent as minister to England, and he negotiated with the British government a treaty known as the Johnson-Stanley treaty. It was expressly in so many words—I will not stop to read the first article of it which will verify what I am saying—a treaty for the indemnity of citizens of the United States by reason of these losses.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And does not the Senator also remember that upon that ground, among others, it was opposed by a distinguished Senator who has lately departed this life?

Mr. THURMAN. I had not forgotten what is referred to, and I will show to the Senate that it never was opposed upon any such ground at all, as his speech will show, which the Senate saw fit to have published. That treaty was made. It was for a mixed commission to adjudicate the claims of American citizens upon Great Britain and of British citizens upon the United States. It was not satisfactory, and the consequence was, a change of ministry having taken place, that the Johnson-Clarendon treaty was negotiated, and that treaty was precisely like the other in its scope. It was for a mixed commission to adjudicate the claims of American citizens upon Great Britain and of British subjects upon the Government of the United States. That treaty was rejected by the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the treaty to which I referred in connection with the remarks of the late Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. THURMAN. The other never came before the Senate. Upon that we know that the Senator from Massachusetts made an elaborate speech, and we know that the Senate, without entirely approving all that was said in that speech, as its subsequent votes very clearly show, allowed the injunction of secrecy to be removed and that speech to be published. Now, says the Senator from Vermont, it was one of the objections made by the Senator from Massachusetts to the Johnson-Clarendon treaty that it thus provided for the adjudication of private claims. No, sir; there is not one word in that speech that even implies such an objection, much less asserts it. The Senator from Massachusetts did not object to the Johnson-Clarendon treaty because it provided for the adjudication of these private claims.

His objection was not that it provided for them, but that it did not provide for other things besides. It was not what it did provide for, but what it did not provide for, that constituted in his judgment the defect of that treaty.

What were the objections of the Senator from Massachusetts? First, he claimed that there was reparation due to our national honor, that the recognition by Great Britain of the belligerency of the Southern States was an unfriendly act, and that it required from Great Britain some reparation to the wounded national honor of the American Government and people. He argued that for Great Britain to recognize the belligerency of men in armed insurrection or rebellion against the Government of the United States was an injury to the United States that required atonement at least by apology, and hence we all very well know that it was owing to that position taken by him that ultimately there was inserted in the treaty of Washington that expression of regret on the part of Her Majesty which the Senator from Massachusetts himself afterward admitted to be a sufficient atonement, and which the Government of the United States agreed to receive as an atonement. It was "pretty thin" I thought, but it was satisfactory to those who made the claim for atonement and the country considered it sufficient. What next?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Shall I interrupt the Senator if I ask him whether he has had his attention called, as I have no doubt he has, speaking of Mr. Evarts's views, to the instructions given by the Government of the United States to those who managed the American case at Geneva?

Mr. THURMAN. O, I hope the Senator will not take me out of the line of what I am speaking on now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I merely asked permission to call the Senator's attention to a fact.

Mr. THURMAN. If it was pertinent to what I am saying, I would not object; but I suppose I know exactly to what the Senator refers and I will try to show the Senator himself that it has not the slightest bearing on this question. I suppose he intends to read to me that Mr. Fish wrote to our people there, "We do not want you to have the Geneva tribunal decide the question whether the insurance companies are entitled." Is that it?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I leave the Senator to say. He declines to be interrupted.

Mr. THURMAN. If that is it, I have only to say that we did not desire them to decide any such thing. We wanted them to decide that for the losses which were covered by that insurance there should be payment by Great Britain, and then it would be easy for us to say who were the persons entitled to the indemnity. If by the law—as known all over the civilized world almost, I was going to say—the underwriters are subrogated to the rights of the insured, it was to be presumed that the Government of the United States would not trample that law under its feet, and it was not necessary for the Geneva tribunal to assert whether that was the law or not. All they had to do was to find what was the amount of the property destroyed. That is what the Senator was going to say.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is all they had to do; and that is all they did do.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator can see well enough that it was no part of the business of the Geneva tribunal to decide between A B and C D. They were to decide upon loss, and not between individuals; but that did not make it any the less a private claim or any the less a private loss.

But what more did the Senator from Massachusetts contend? He contended that the United States itself was entitled to large damages by reason of the prolongation of the war and various other matters, by reason of the transfer of commerce from American bottoms to British bottoms, and the like. Indeed the scope of his claims was so large that he himself shrank from any attempt to compute them. They constitute what afterward were called "the indirect claims." They were so enormous in their amount, that Great Britain refused to submit them to any tribunal whatever and we ourselves in effect abandoned them. By what hook or by what crook, by what devious ways, we came to the abandonment is in the recollection of us all; but we know that we did abandon them; we know that we jumped at the decision of the Geneva tribunal that they were not admissible; we seized it eagerly to get out of that strait.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the Senator mean to say that we seized that opportunity eagerly, or that he did?

Mr. THURMAN. I never thought there was but one ground to stand on, and the Senator knows that I asserted that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have not any right to know anything on the subject.

Mr. THURMAN. I had no jumping to do. The Government came up exactly to where I stood; not on account of any respect they had for me, but on account of the force that reason has even over minds that sometimes are not entirely disposed to follow its dictates.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Government came down, the Senator means.

Mr. THURMAN. Well, Mr. President, that was the objection. I was endeavoring to show that the Johnson-Stanley treaty and the subsequent Johnson-Clarendon treaty both recognized these as claims of individual citizens or American companies upon the British government. What followed? That treaty was rejected, and all negotiation was at an end. What then did the President of the United States do in order to bring Great Britain once more to consider this subject? In his annual message in 1870 he distinctly proposed that Congress should pay these American citizens their losses, and thus, to use his own language, become the owners of these private claims, that it might prosecute them as claims of the United States belonging to the Government of the United States. That language will perhaps bear repetition. In his annual message of December 5, 1870, the President said:

> I regret to say that no conclusion has been reached for the adjustment of the claims against Great Britain, growing out of the course adopted by that government during the rebellion. The cabinet of London, so far as its views have been expressed does not appear to be willing to concede that Her Majesty's government was guilty of any negligence, or did or permitted any act during the war by which the United States has just cause of complaint. Our firm and unalterable convictions are directly the reverse. I therefore recommend to Congress to authorize the appointment of a commission to take proof of the amounts and the ownership of these several claims, on notice to the representative of Her Majesty at Washington, and that authority be given for the settlement of these claims by the United States, so that the Government shall have the ownership of the private claims as well as the responsible control of all the demands against Great Britain.
> It cannot be necessary to add that whenever Her Majesty's government shall entertain a desire for a full and friendly adjustment of these claims, the United States will enter upon their consideration, with an earnest desire for a conclusion consistent with the honor and dignity of both nations.

There the President not only recognized these as private claims against Great Britain, but recognized them as claims which the Government of the United States would do well to purchase, and thus become the owner of them, and assert them as national claims in connection with the other national claims which he thought the Government had a right to assert. That intimation to Great Britain was no doubt the cause of the treaty that was afterward negotiated at Washington. It brought about that treaty. And now let me call your attention to that treaty, for, as was well said by the Senator from New York, we need not go further than the treaty and the adjudication.

The Senator from Vermont argues, bear it in mind—the whole of his argument is based upon the proposition—that these were legal captures by the confederates, and that Great Britain was an ally of the confederates, and therefore, as there was no responsibility on the part of the confederate government there was no responsibility to individuals on the part of her ally, the British Government. That is directly the opposite of an assertion of responsibility on the part of Great Britain as a neutral nation. As I have said before—and I beg the Senate to remember it—we had the right either to treat Great Britain as hostile to us and make war with her, or to treat her as a neutral violating her neutral obligations. I have shown that we did treat her as a neutral up to the time of this treaty, and now I proceed to show that it was entirely on the foundation of her neutrality that this indemnity was obtained.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish he would tell the Senate, for my information, what a neutral is at the moment she is violating her neutral obligations—what her character is at that moment.

Mr. THURMAN. I am really so dull that I cannot comprehend such a question as that. If the Senator does not know what a neutral nation is, I certainly am not here to teach him.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very good.

Mr. THURMAN. I would advise him to go back to his books if that is the dense state of his ignorance.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well. That is a very satisfactory answer to me; the best one that the Senator can make, no doubt.

Mr. THURMAN. The first article of the treaty recites:

> Whereas differences have arisen between the Government of the United States and the Government of Her Britannic Majesty, and still exist, growing out of the acts committed by the several vessels which have given rise to the claims generically known as the Alabama claims; and whereas Her Britannic Majesty has authorized her high commissioners and plenipotentiaries to express, in a friendly spirit, the regret felt by Her Majesty's government for the escape, under whatever circumstances, of the Alabama and other vessels from British ports, and for the depredations committed by those vessels.

That was the acknowledgment which satisfied us. Mark, it is not a regret that Great Britain was an ally of the confederates; it is not a regret that Great Britain was accessory before the fact to the war carried on against the United States by the confederate forces; it is not a regret that Great Britain was a belligerent; but it is a regret that these vessels escaped from the British ports. That is the regret, and that satisfied us all; we ratified the treaty; that saved our honor, atoned for our wounded feelings. Then comes the provision that this matter shall be submitted to arbitration; and now comes the sixth article of the treaty, an article upon which the award was made, an article that was devised in order to enable Great Britain to pay us money, an article that was devised in order that there might be a judgment against Great Britain and thereby settle these claims forever, and prevent war between the countries. Everybody must have felt that it was so. This is the article which contains the celebrated three rules. Great Britain denied that they were rules of international law. We did not assert that they were rules of international law, I believe; but if we did, Great Britain never acknowledged that they were rules of international law. If Great Britain had stood by what she claimed to be international law, she never would have admitted these rules at all, but would have insisted that by international law she was not responsible. Why, then, was it that Great Britain agreed to these rules and agreed that they should be retroactive? Because she knew that it behooved her to have this matter settled, and settled before it was too late; and thereby she was willing to make a law pro hac vice—that is it; she was willing to make a law for this particular case and have the case adjudicated upon that law pro hac vice, in order that she might not be held to have violated international law, but that there might be certain rules adopted that would enable a tribunal to give judgment against her. That is the real truth of that whole businsss. What are these rules?

I am sorry to disturb the Senator from Pennsylvania; though I do not know that I ought to object to letting the Senate talk as much as it pleases. This is only a matter of four or five millions that belongs to some one or other American citizen.

Mr. CONKLING. More than four or five.

Mr. THURMAN. Yes; the whole amount is seventeen or eighteen millions. The Senate is bound to act upon it judicially, and render a just and true judgment in the case. Three-fourths of the Senators are away, and when the case comes to be decided they will come in here without having heard a word of the argument on either side, and some one will inquire, "How does this committee vote?" another, "How does Jones vote?" another, "How does Smith vote?" another, "How does Tom vote?" and so they will follow, some the committee, some Jones, some Smith, some Tom, and so on, and they will decide this question, and that will be the way in which justice will be administered by the Senate of the United States.

Mr. CAMERON. The Senator from Ohio had a right to reprimand. I ought not to have spoken so loud, but I was about going away and I was endeavoring to get a pair. Perhaps the Senator himself will pair off with me on the currency bill.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator will have to tell me what currency bill it is. I have not read it. I have such high respect for the good sense of the Senator from Pennsylvania that I am quite sure he will agree with me before we get through on something or other.

Now, what is article 6 of this treaty?

In deciding the matters submitted to the arbitrators, they shall be governed by the following three rules, which are agreed upon by the high contracting parties as rules to be taken as applicable to the case, and by such principles of international law not inconsistent therewith—

That is, not inconsistent with these rules—as the arbitrators shall determine to have been applicable to the case.

RULES.

A neutral government is bound—

What was the use of talking about what bound a neutral government if Great Britain was an ally of the confederacy and not neutral at all, as the Senator from Vermont would now have us to believe? What was the use of talking about the rules that govern neutral obligations?

RULES.

A neutral government is bound—

First, to use due diligence to prevent the fitting out, arming, or equipping within its jurisdiction, of any vessel which it has reasonable ground to believe is intended to cruise or to carry on war against a power with which it is at peace—

That is one of the rules that stuck Great Britain in damages, to use a familiar phrase. She was a power at peace with the United States, a neutral power, and therefore bound to use due diligence to prevent this fiting out, arming, and equipping of vessels within her jurisdiction intended to operate against us—and also to use like diligence to prevent the departure from its jurisdiction of any vessel intended to cruise or carry on war as above, such vessel having been specially adapted, in whole or in part, within such jurisdiction, to warlike use.

Secondly, not to permit or suffer either belligerent to make use of its ports or waters as the base of naval operations against the other, or for the purpose of the renewal or augmentation of military supplies or arms, or the recruitment of men.

Thirdly, to exercise due diligence in its own ports and waters, and, as to all persons within its jurisdiction, to prevent any violation of the foregoing obligations and duties.

Those were the three rules. They are all rules that appertain, as the treaty declares, to a neutral nation, to a nation at peace with the United States. Then what took place? Thereupon the Geneva tribunal met. I hold in my hand the American case, the case which according to the terms of that treaty was to be submitted by our Government to the tribunal. What is the claim that is made in that American case? That Great Britain was an ally of the confederacy? That she was an accessory? No, sir; not one word of any such thing. There are in the first place sixteen pages taken up under the title, "The unfriendly course pursued by Great Britain toward the United States from the outbreak to the close of the insurrection." That is the preliminary matter; it is what if you look into the old law-books of England you will find styled "aggravating the case." Every lawyer knows how he will find in the old reports, in a criminal case especially, "and thereupon Her Majesty's solicitor addressed the jury and aggravated the case." [Laughter.] So here our solicitors began by aggravating the case. They began by showing that Great Britain had been unfriendly, as they alleged, toward the United States. But for what? Did they assert that as a distinct and substantive ground of claim upon her? Not one word of it. Did they claim damages for that? No, sir; but that introductory matter showing her unfriendliness to us was simply to give interpretation to the testimony they would afterward offer in respect to her negligence, to make it probable upon the facts afterward stated that she had connived at the escape of these vessels, or had omitted to do what as a neutral she was bound to do. That was all; because here were her acts which if they had taken place in a country whose government was warmly our friend might bear one interpretation, and if they took place in the jurisdiction of a government that was not friendly to us might well bear another interpretation; and it was therefore for the purpose of stating what may be called the surrounding circumstances, so that the tribunal could judge what weight to be given to the evidence which was afterward to be adduced, that these sixteen pages are taken up with showing that Great Britain was not friendly to us.

What then follow? Then follow one hundred and thirty-nine pages, under what title? "Wherein Great Britain failed to perform its duties as a neutral." That is the whole of it; that is the whole case. Here is the introduction put there for the reason I have stated, and then comes the statement, and the whole of it, from beginning to end, is a statement that she has not discharged the duties of a neutral. Not a word of this idea which the Senator from Vermont now asserts, that she was an ally of the confederacy, and that therefore, this being a case of belligerent capture, she was not liable. I might cite any quantity of documents to the same effect, but I need not do it. You well remember that after the case was put in, then the arguments were put in after a lapse of five months, and the whole of our argument was the same way, that Great Britain had failed to discharge her neutral obligations. And now I come to the judgment.

Mr. HOWE. Has the Senator before him the preliminary award which the arbitrators made that was so much spoken of at the time as to the "consequential damages?"

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, sir; I have here in these protocols every word of it. It might take me some time to turn to it.

Mr. HOWE. I do not wish to embarrass the course of the Senator's argument, but I have not looked at that since it occurred.

Mr. THURMAN. I have shown what the treaty was and that it rested solely upon the idea that Great Britain might have failed to discharge her neutral obligations. I have shown that that was what we alleged against her in the case that we filed with the tribunal. I have shown that those were the arguments that were made in our arguments which we filed there, and nothing else, and now I come to the judgment. I read from the Government translation. The tribunal decided in regard to each vessel by itself. After reciting that the treaty was made and that certain persons were appointed arbitrators, and that they organized and that the agents of the parties appeared, and stating the usual verification of their credentials, it then goes on to state the delivery of the case and counter-case and the arguments and the deliberation of the tribunal, and proceeds as follows:

The tribunal has arrived at the decision embodied in the present award.

Then comes the award.

Whereas, having regard to the sixth and seventh articles of the said treaty, the arbitrators are bound under the terms of the said sixth article, "in deciding the matters submitted to them, to be governed by the three rules therein specified—

These are the rules I have read as to the duties of a neutral—and by such principles of international law, not inconsistent therewith, as the arbitrators shall determine to have been applicable to the case;" and whereas the "due diligence" referred to in the first and third of the said rules ought to be exercised by neutral governments in exact proportion to the risks to which either of the belligerents may be exposed, from a failure to fulfill the obligations of neutrality on their part; and whereas the circumstances out of which the facts constituting the subject-matter of the present controversy arose were of a nature to call for the exercise on the part of Her Britannic Majesty's government of all possible solicitude for the observance of the rights and the duties involved in the proclamation of neutrality issued by Her Majesty on the 13th day of May, 1861; and whereas the effects of a violation of neutrality committed by means of the construction, equipment, and armament of a vessel are not done away with by any commission which the government of the belligerent power, benefited by the violation of neutrality, may afterward have granted to that vessel; and the ultimate step, by which the offense is completed, cannot be admissible as a ground for the absolution of the offender, nor can the consummation of his fraud become the means of establishing his innocence—

It seems as if the tribunal had anticipated the argument of the Senator from Vermont, for this recital is a complete answer to it—and whereas the privilege of exterritoriality accorded to vessels of war has been admitted into the law of nations, not as an absolute right, but solely as a proceeding founded on the principle of courtesy and mutual deference between different nations, and therefore can never be appealed to for the protection of acts done in violation of neutrality; and whereas the absence of a previous notice cannot be regarded as a failure in any consideration required by the law of nations, in those cases in which a vessel carries with it its own condemnation; and whereas, in order to impart to any supplies of coal a character inconsistent with the second rule—

That is, the rule of the treaty—

prohibiting the use of neutral ports or waters as a base of naval operations for a belligerent, it is necessary that the said supplies should be connected with special circumstances of time, or persons, or of place, which may combine to give them such character; and whereas with respect to the vessel called the Alabama it clearly results from all the facts relative to the construction of the ship at first designated by the number "290" in the port of Liverpool, and its equipment and armament in the vicinity of Terceira through the agency of the vessels called the Agrippina and the Bahama, dispatched from Great Britain to that end, that the British government failed to use due diligence in the performance of its neutral obligations; and especially that it omitted, notwithstanding the warnings and official representations made by the diplomatic agents of the United States during the construction of the said number "290," to take in due time any effective measures of prevention, and that those orders which it did give at last for the detention of the vessel were issued so late that their execution was not practicable; and whereas, after the escape of that vessel, the measures taken for its pursuit and arrest were so imperfect as to lead to no result, and therefore cannot be considered sufficient to release Great Britain from the responsibility already incurred; and whereas, in despite of the violations of the neutrality of Great Britain committed by the "290," this same vessel, later known as the confederate cruiser Alabama, was on several occasions freely admitted into the ports of colonies of Great Britain, instead of being proceeded against as it ought to have been in any and every port within British jurisdiction in which it might have been found; and whereas the government of Her Britannic Majesty cannot justify itself for a failure in due diligence on the plea of insufficiency of the legal means of action which it possessed—

You will remember that the British government set up that the municipal statutes of Great Britain were not sufficient. The arbitrators say that is your own fault.

Four of the arbitrators for the reasons above assigned, and the fifth for reasons separately assigned by him, are of opinion that Great Britain has in this case failed, by omission, to fulfill the duties prescribed in the first and the third of the rules established by the sixth article of the treaty of Washington.

Not for acts done as an ally, not for acts done as an accessory, not for positive acts at all, not for acts of commission, but simply for acts of omission they held her responsible; and yet the Senator from Vermont argues here as if our claims against Great Britain were not an indemnity awarded to us against her for violations of her duty as a neutral. After having obtained this money upon the ground that our citizens had rights of reclamation against her which we asserted and upon which the award was made, when we have got the money, and got it upon the foundation of these private rights, and upon nothing else under the heavens than these private rights, without one single public right entering into that award, the United States herself being compelled as a mere ship-owner to undertake to pay a few hundred thousand dollars for vessels that belonged to the Government that were seized by these cruisers, putting her on the footing simply of a ship-owner—after the award has thus been made, and on the private rights of these citizens, and this money has been paid, we are told by the Judiciary Committee that it is money that belongs to the United States to do with whatever it pleases to do! I am utterly unable to understand any such reasoning as that.

But is it true that the award was made in respect of these claims? There is nothing more clearly susceptible of proof in this world than that. There were different claims that were made we all know. The United States asserted in its case that Great Britain was answerable to us for various matters, which were afterward called the indirect claims. What were they? They were the increased cost of the war; that was one, and one of the greatest; second, the transfer of American commerce from American to British bottoms; third, the enhanced price of insurance, or what is now familiarly called war premiums. Those were the three principal items of the matters that were claimed as the indirect or consequential damages. We know that the arbitration came near failing because Great Britain would not assent to submit them at all. How was the difficulty got rid of?

But before referring to that I ought to speak of another thing. Pending that dead-lock what was done? Our minister at London, General Schenck, sent to us a proposition which he said if agreed to by the United States would remove the difficulty, and that was that we should abandon those claims in consideration of the establishment of a fourth rule of neutral obligation. I can speak of that now, because, although it was in executive session, the injunction of secrecy must have been removed, for I find it here in the published documents. What did we do? We amended that in the Senate, and proposed that in a certain form we would agree to it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is the Senator quite sure that the injunction of secrecy has been removed from the matter he is now discussing?

Mr. THURMAN. I am not; but it is here in these public documents, which were not printed in confidence.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But those documents were not printed by the Senate.

Mr. THURMAN. I speak of documents then that are published by the Government; and I will assume that something of that kind took place.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not make any objection, except for the regularity of procedure; but I do not remember of the injunction of secrecy on that topic having been removed.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not remember it either; but it must have been. I intended to have looked it up, but finding it here in a published volume of the State Department sent abroad to the whole country and sent to every foreign legation, I take it that it is so; it must have been removed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there any statement in that document as to what the Senate did or did not do?

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, sir. The injunction of secrecy must have been removed. I do not remember that it was, but it must have been; otherwise it would not be here.

Well, sir, we were willing to get out of that dead-lock. The pretext for it was a fourth rule; but we could not agree upon the rule. We would not agree to the rule of Great Britain, and she would not agree to ours; and therefore the dead-lock continued. What then took place? These arbitrators obiter loquens, as I may say, said to the counsel, "Whether the treaty covers these claims or whether it does not cover them; whether we have any jurisdiction over them or whether we have not jurisdiction over them, we decide against them." What then? Then said the Secretary of State, writing to our minister in England and writing to our agent at Geneva, "We never expected any money from these claims; we only inserted them in order to have a decision of the principles that ought to govern neutral nations and the liability of neutral nations; and now that the tribunal has decided the legal question, we are perfectly satisfied, and you may consider them as laid aside;" and therefore Mr. Bancroft Davis, our agent, announced to the tribunal that the Government of the United States would no longer press those claims, but would accept the decision of the tribunal as determinative of each and every one of them; and from that time forward those claims were excluded from the consideration of the tribunal. It then proceeded to take up vessel by vessel and consider the question of the direct loss to American citizens occasioned by the depredations of those vessels, and also the loss to the United States growing out of the destruction of two or three revenue-cutters and one or two small vessels.

I have before me in a public document a list of the claims that were filed before that tribunal just exactly as they were filed before it. It contains every one of the vessels that were lost and who it is that claims in respect of that loss; and it contains every one of the claims now asserted by the insurance companies without an exception. What did the tribunal do? It so happened in a few cases comparatively that the owners also asserted claims for the loss. The tribunal said, "We cannot pay twice for the same vessel;" and therefore they estimated the value of the vessel or the value of the goods lost, and rejected the double claim that was thus asserted. That was perfectly right. It was so manifestly right that there was no contest about it, that these double claims ought to be eliminated. In fact, our counsel there apologized for the fact that there was any such thing as double claims, and said they had tried to eliminate them as far as they were able to do. The question was, what is the amount of the loss, and not the question of whether A B was to be paid or C D.

Now, what are these claims? Let me show the Senate, taking one of them as an instance, how they were presented to that tribunal. I have already shown you the case of the Brilliant, which was the first case of an insurance company filing a claim in the Department of State here to be laid before the British government. There were afterward other claims on account of that vessel, and here is the way they were laid before that tribunal:

Ship Brilliant, of New York: 839 21-95 tons burden. George Hagar, master. Owners: Joshua Atkins and Edwin Atkins, copartners, Brooklyn, together with George Hagar. Sailed from New York on the 13th of September, 1862, with a cargo of grain, flour, &c., bound to London, Great Britain. On the 3d of October, 1862, in latitude 40° north, longitude 50° 30′ west, was captured and burned by the Alabama.

Total claims filed, $125,212.83.

CLAIMS.

Owners:
Loss of vessels	$75,000 00
Loss of freight, (£3,415 9s. 8d.)	16,531 03
	91,531 03
Atlantic Mutual Insurance Company, of New York:
Insurers on freight—money for J. Atkins & Co	18,000 00
New York Mutual Insurance Company:
Insurers on vessel	9,245 00
Union Mutual Insurance Company, Philadelphia:
Insurers on cargo for Lehigh Zinc Company	1,975 00
George Hagar, (master:)
Loss on personal property, chronometer, &c	1,250 00
B. E. Clark & Co, New York:
Loss on cargo	3,211 80

Then comes the list of papers. That is the evidence which proves these various claims. That is a specimen of them. That is the way in which they were made up. The owner, if the insurance did not cover his loss, claimed for the balance of the value of the vessel; the insurance company claimed for the amount they had paid; the master claimed for his personal losses; the owner of the freight claimed for the value of the freight that was not insured; if it was insured, the underwriter claimed for it; and so it was to the end of the chapter in each one of these cases, and in every single instance it is shown who it was that preferred the claim.

Then, when we come to the end of this document, there is a summary of the amounts claimed. Here is the revised summary. There was claimed on account of destruction by the Alabama, giving the name of every vessel so destroyed, $7,050,293.76; by the Boston so much; by the Chickamauga so much; by the Florida so much; by the Clarence so much; by the Tacony so much; by the Georgia so much; by the Jeff. Davis so much; by the Nashville so much; by the Retribution so much; by the Sallie so much; by the Shenandoah so much; by the Sumter so much; by the Tallahassee so much; and then comes a recapitulation, making, $19,782,917.60; miscellaneous $479,033; increased insurance $5,146,219.71; making a total aggregate of $26,408,170.31. That was the claim. Thereupon an estimate was made by Mr. Staempfli, one of the arbitrators, at the request of the arbitration. Of course this claim for increased insurance or war premiums was thrown out at once, and he reduced the amount until it was brought down to fourteen million and something. The British made it between seven and eight million. Mr. Staempfli came to the conclusion that it ought to be about $12,000,000.

Mr. HOWE. Did you not say that Staempfli's estimate was $14,000,000?

Mr. THURMAN. No.

Mr. HOWE. Whose estimate was it that made it $14,000,000?

Mr. THURMAN. Ours after they had eliminated the items that were disallowed. That left our own estimate $14,000,000. We claimed $26,000,000, but they eliminated from that one item and another; for instance "increased insurance" at one fell swoop took away $6,000,000; and then our claim for $25,000,000, you recollect, included various vessels for which they did not allow us anything; so that they brought us down upon our own showing to fourteen million and something. The committee of the board of trade employed by the British government reduced it $7,300,000, and then afterward upon further proof being brought in increased it to $7,600,000. Mr. Staempfli estimated that it ought to be $12,000,000, and then proceeded to calculate what it would be at 7 per cent., 6 per cent., and 5 per cent. interest, and so on. Finally the tribunal arrived at the conclusion to award $15,500,000. It does not matter at all what was the rate of interest that entered into that. Sir Alexander Cockburn said they allowed interest at the rate of 6 per cent. If he is correct in that statement, then they must have settled upon the principal sum of $10,000,000 or thereabouts. It was asserted here I think, and said to be upon the authority of one of the arbitrators, though how he knew I do not know, that the rate of interest allowed was less than that, and that they must have taken the estimate of Staempfli, $12,000,000, and adopted a less rate of interest; but that does not matter one way or the other. Here is the fact that stares you right in the face, that every dollar that was awarded, except about $200,000 that the Government of the United States had a right to by reason of the destruction of some revenue cutters, and one or two other little vessels, was awarded in respect of these private claims, and of those private claims between $4,000,000 and $5,000,000 of them were owned by insurance companies—owned, to use the language of Judge Cowen, by as good a title as any man could own his farm conveyed to him by a proper deed; and now the question is whether, having obtained this money on the foundation of these private claims, and the law being that the claims upon which these $4,000,000 or $5,000,000 were obtained were the absolute property of these underwriters, just as much their property as the coat on your back is your property, the United States shall turn around and say: "We were not your agent; we were not a paternal Government taking care of its people; on the contrary, on the foundation of your right, on the foundation of your loss, on the foundation of your property, we have obtained by the highest tribunal that ever sat in the world an award against Great Britain which she has honestly paid; and now we will take the proceeds of that award and do with it what we please." Sir, for one, I never can agree to do any such thing.

As I said in the opening, I have no interest in this matter, nor have my constituents to the value of a single cent, except one constituent whose interests are adverse to these insurance companies; but, Mr. President, I have not assisted in an humble way to administer the law for now nearly forty years without having acquired some respect for its precepts and some regard for its observance, and I cannot see my own Government set an example of violation of law and utter disregard of its plainest principles, as in my humble judgment this bill does, without raising my voice to protest against it.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, it would be entirely a work of supererogation to continue an argument upon the same line with the honorable Senator from Ohio. He has stated so exhaustively the law as applied to these insurance claims, that it would be but a work of feeble repetition for me to follow in his track on that subject. I can only say that I indorse very heartily the closing words of his speech. It does seem to me that there are two wrongs which would result from retaining in this bill the language which he has proposed to strike out. The first would be a wrong to the meritorious class of our own citizens, whose legal rights to this fund have been thoroughly demonstrated by the Senator from Ohio; the other wrong would be not to this small class of our people alone, not merely to the individual stockholders in these insurance companies under whose name a meritorious, lawful, favorite branch of legitimate business has been transacted, but to the whole American people, by proposing what I must consider a clear and flagrant breach of trust. This money came into the Treasury for a certain specified purpose. It was received by the officials of the United States and deposited in the public Treasury for certain uses only. We obtained it on the ground of certain claims, and we are not at liberty to deny now that those claims did exist, which we averred and which we made the basis of our recovery from the government of Great Britain.

After the confirmation of the treaty at Washington in 1871, the State Department called upon all of our citizens having claims known generically as the Alabama claims, to present them to the Department of State. They did present them, and they were in turn forwarded to our agents for presentation abroad to the arbitration at Geneva. Where was there an intimation from any officer of our Government that insurance claims were to be excluded? My friend from Ohio has handed me the form in which these claims were called for by the Government of the United States. It is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, September —, 1871.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the — instant, and its inclosures.

In reply, I inclose a copy of the treaty concluded with Great Britain on the 8th of May last and general instructions as to the proof of claims prepared for the use of claimants in the absence of rules by the tribunal which may pass upon the claims.

In the absence of rules and in anticipation of the action of the tribunal, this Department can not assume to determine what claims it may or may not be proper to prefer under the first eleven articles of the treaty, nor to direct what form or extent of proof will be necessary to establish them, nor the effect of insurance upon the question of right to compensation. It will present to the tribunal at Geneva, to be taken into account in estimating the sum to be paid to the United States, all "claims growing out of the acts committed by the several vessels which have given rise to the claims generically known as the Alabama claims," which may be presented to the Department in time to enable it to do so. Persons desiring to lodge claims in the Department for that purpose are requested to do so without delay, in such form and sustained by such proofs as they may be advised or think proper to rest their claims upon, as the time for presenting the case of the United States expires on the 16th day of December next.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

Secretary.

Thus it will be seen that the State Department called upon all of our citizens who had claims known as Alabama claims to present them. They were presented. Why was it that in the face of the known demand insurance companies and those whom they represented were not notified not to present their claims, for such would not be presented to the arbitrators nor would they be considered allowable? Having called upon our citizens to present these claims, which we received ourselves without discrimination as to whether they came from individuals who had suffered the losses or whether they came from those subrogated claimants who had paid the losses of others whom they had insured, having taken them all in bulk and presented them without discrimination to the tribunal of arbitration, for us now to say "We have received this money in the Treasury on account of these claims for these claimants, but we will raise a question which shall exclude them," it seems to me would be so plain and so clear a breach of honorable duty that if it had been proposed by an individual, there is not a court of equity in the country that would not instantly have remedied it. Most frankly I say the honor of this country will not permit one dollar of this money to remain in the Treasury of the United States so long as there remains due, unpaid, any of these debts which we ourselves have made the basis of claim.

If this defense did exist, it was the duty of the Government to have discriminated against these claims at the time it called for their presentation. It accepted them; they were presented under the call; they were sent forward to the tribunal of arbitration under the inspection and auspices of the Government; the money was recovered by the Government to pay these claims, and we cannot honorably make any other disposition of this money than to execute the trust which is contained within the facts which I have stated. There cannot be any special pleading to relieve it. If there is a distinction drawn, depend upon it it is sophistical. There is a sound, simple, clear, honorable obligation upon the Government of the United States to use this money for, and only for, the purposes for which they claimed it, and for which it was paid. It would stain the hand of an honorable man to keep one dollar of that money if he had received it in his private capacity, and refuse to pay it to those who were the cestui que trusts, as are all the citizens whose claims were presented by the Government and allowed by the tribunal, or made the basis of their allowance against the government of Great Britain. Nothing that I have seen, nothing that I have heard, (and I have listened attentively, and I have read somewhat excursively on the subject,) affords the least loop-hole of escape from the results which I have simply stated. The Government of the United States paying all of these claims, including the insurance claims, will simply be executing the trust which it has proposed for itself through its own laws, through the treaty, and through its own officers.

Mr. President, the contract of insurance is certainly meritorious. It certainly is to be encouraged. As has been said here, and as was said a year ago by myself and by others, the system of insurance and underwriting, whereby the average of loss can be spread over a large body of capital instead of being concentrated upon a small portion of capital, is essential to every commercial country. It is a favorite contract with the law, favored by the civil law, favored by statute, favored by courts in its application to the principles of law. There is no doubt of the complete and thorough subrogation of the insurer to the rights of the assured.

Now, let me illustrate the perfect inequality, not to say the absurdity, of saying that you will not pay the loss by an assurer when you pay a similar loss to one who has assured himself. We will take the case, which is very frequent, of men engaged in commerce upon a large scale resolving to insure themselves. It is the constant custom with men whose operations are upon a sufficient scale to justify the creation of those averages upon which all doctrines of insurance are based. It may not be improper to mention that Mr. Astor, of New York, who owns dwelling-houses and other structures by hundreds, insures himself, and by the saving of the premiums of insurance has a fund that replaces his losses by the accidents of fire. So we know the same habit exists among those who are largely engaged in the commercial marine. They follow the same plan of self-assurance. Now, let us take a case. A merchant during the late war sends out eight adventures. He insures none. He thinks the war premium is too high, and that by saving it in those cases he will be the gainer in the long run. He makes eight successful voyages. He has paid no premium. His merchandise has been enhanced of course by the risk it has run, and he has grown rich by the result. On the ninth voyage his vessel is captured and destroyed by one of these confederate cruisers. Learning by experience, he insures for the tenth voyage, and that again is unfortunate, and the tenth adventure is destroyed by a cruiser. Now come the claims of the two. The merchant has one claim in his own right for the destruction of a ship and cargo. The insurer who has paid him the loss on the tenth adventure is subrogated to his rights for a ship and cargo, and both of these are presented under the auspices of the American Government duly and formally to the tribunal of arbitration at Geneva, and they allow both. Why should they not allow both? The loss in the ninth case which I have stated was to an individual, the merchant; the loss in the tenth case was to another class of citizens who owned the capital stock of the insurance company that insured him and paid the loss when it occurred. Where is the merit of one claim beyond the other? Where is the impolicy of paying both claims or placing both upon an equality? Surely the discrimination is unreasonable; it is fine-drawn; it is unfair; and before any such discrimination can be made you must show that insurance in time of war is an immoral, impolitic contract under the laws of the country. Until that is done, the moral right, the legal right, the equitable right of the company and of the stockholders who form that company, whose capital is embarked in that company, to repayment for their loss, stands on grounds just as secure, just as recognizable in law or in equity as does the claim of the original claimant himself. No such distinction is known as will admit the one and exclude the other.

Why, then, is it raised in the present case? I have heard of nothing that justifies it; I have heard no suggestion that warrants it. I cannot, for my own part, imagine the objection to it. I have thought that perhaps, as profit was not intended to be made, it might not be inequitable to say that the war premium in each identical case of loss having been paid to the insurer should be deducted from his claim in the case of each individual loss; but not that his whole business in matters in no wise connected with this transaction, should be brought into court, and you should sit and balance his profit and his loss between himself and other parties where no question has ever been made and where no loss has ever occurred. Suppose the war premium to amount to 10 per cent., and upon an insurance of $10,000 the person who insures has paid $1,000 of premium; that the insurance company has received. The loss takes place. They pay him the full amount of the policy, $10,000. Now, if you pay the insurer $9,000, the other 90 per cent., he is made whole again; and I can understand that in our claim, by the very nature of our claims upon Great Britain before this arbitration, it was intended simply to reimburse our citizens, and not that they should make profit by the transaction. If, therefore, of the 100 per cent. of the loss 10 per cent. has been received by way of premium and 90 per cent. is then added by way of payment for the loss, the insurer is made whole; the insured has been made whole by the payment of the loss before. Therefore I should not object upon that doctrine of equal reimbursement for all of his outlay and the exclusion of gain in the transaction that in each identical case of a loss by these confederate cruisers the war premium in that case, which had already been received by the insurer, should be charged against him, and he should be allowed to receive the remaining per centum, 90 or 95 per cent. as the case might be, upon the whole amount. I can understand in that the ground of equity based upon the meaning and the purview of this treaty, which was simply reimbursement for loss, and not a gain upon the adventure in which the loss occurred.

But, Mr. President, this being so, I will never by my vote signify that there has been anything unlawful, unworthy, dishonorable, or impolitic in the contract of insurance by which these companies took risks upon the property of their fellow-citizens during the last war. Commerce was to be encouraged. Perhaps it was more necessary, and perhaps the contract of insurance became a more meritorious contract during the war than in times of peace. It was not every company that could embark in it. Supplies were more necessary for this Government then than ever before, and we all know the vast amounts of warlike supplies that were drawn from the kingdom of Great Britain by the United States during the war. Perhaps upon that very class of risks these war premiums were charged, and they were incurred for the benefit of American commerce and of the American people at a time when they most especially needed them; and I for one would be unwilling now by this afterthought to suggest the illegality or something that was wrong in a contract which on the contrary I consider is so much to be encouraged.

Then again as to the broader question of the honor of the country, I say distinctly that in my view not one dollar of this money can remain in the Federal Treasury after the dismissal of these claims. If by the frame of this bill it shall be so provided that any money that shall remain in the Treasury because we refuse to pay those claims upon which we obtained it, or if we divert it from those claims and pay others not included in those upon whose basis we obtained this money, I shall move an amendment that that money be paid back again to the kingdom of Great Britain. We cannot, as an honorable people, obtain money under false pretenses. We cannot retain money under false pretenses. We obtained this money to repay certain losses which we specified ourselves, and if we do not appropriate the money to those ends, we have no right to hold it for any other purpose, and we are bound in honor to return it. It was only paid for the losses which these proceedings and the finding of the arbitration set forth. If we do not apply it to them, we must return it to the nation that paid it. The honor of the American people will not permit profit from money paid in good faith and in honorable observance of treaty stipulations by a friendly power under an agreement of arbitration; and what a commentary it would be when we have all felt the sublimity of this appeal to reason, to justice, to law, and not to brute force, when almost for the first time in the history of the world methods of peace have been resorted to instead of war—what a commentary would it be that the high rules of honor which accompany acts of war should be forgotten when we come to the equally high methods of obtaining reparation through peaceful means! No, Mr. President, the honor of a nation should be as delicate as the honor of a single individual. A nation cannot transgress the rules of morality more than a man. It is equally amenable in the courts of conscience; and neither the multitude of its people nor the complexity of its laws can shake it from the obligations of that simple good faith required alike in the dealings of men and in the dealings of great peoples. This money is ours in trust and only in trust. We cannot profit by it. It was not given to stay in the Treasury of the United States; it must be applied to the purposes for which the arbitration designed it, or it must be returned to the power that paid it; and we cannot exclude this class of claimants in whose name we presented our demands and in whose name and for whose use this money was paid to us. If we had intended to exclude the insurance companies, it should have been done when we called on our citizens to present their claims to us. Had we meant to signify that they were not upon the same level of conscience, of right, and of equity as other classes of our citizens, we should have said so then. We did not say so, and we are estopped now from saying so. We cannot exclude them without injustice to them and without dishonor to our Government, and I am willing to do neither. But I hope the trust will be executed precisely as the treaty made it, as every one knew it was intended to be made; and believing that we are so bound, I shall vote most cheerfully for the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Vermont a question which has presented itself to my mind under the eleventh section of this bill. I do not know that my attention was called to it when the bill was before the Senate on a former occasion. I did not hear much of the discussion then; I followed the committee in my votes upon the bill, if this is the same bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The same bill exactly, with the mere changes of phraseology made necessary from the fact that the money is now in the Treasury, and when we passed the bill before it was not.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator from Vermont in his remarks on Friday, in which he laid down the general principles upon which this bill is predicated, took the ground, as I remember his speech—I have it here but have not had time to read it—that this award was the property of the United States; that it was not a special fund held in trust by the Government and to be administered by the Government for the benefit of the particular persons whose property was destroyed by those cruisers for which the government of Great Britain was responsible, that it is a general fund like any other sum of money belonging to the Government of the United States and to be administered by Congress in its discretion. Do I state the principle correctly?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Reasonably so.

Mr. MORTON. That is my recollection of the Senator's statement. If that is it, I wish to inquire of the Senator upon what principle the distribution of this fund is confined to a particular class of claimants? The section reads thus:

> SEC. 11. That it shall be the duty of said court to receive and examine all claims admissible under this act that may be presented to it, directly resulting from damage caused by the so-called insurgent cruisers Alabama, Florida, and their tenders, and also all claims admissible under this act directly resulting from damage caused by the so-called insurgent cruiser Shenandoah, after her departure from Melbourne on the 18th day of February, 1865.

The distribution is to be confined to this class of claimants here specified. Now, I will take the case of the Shenandoah for illustration. What equity have those persons whose property was destroyed by the Shenandoah after she left Melbourne over those persons whose property was destroyed by the same vessel before she went to Melbourne? She was equally a confederate cruiser before and after, but at Melbourne her force was augmented by the British government. It is so found. If those persons whose property was destroyed by her after that time have no special claim, if they have no special equity, and this fund is to be distributed on proper principles of equity, I ask why you distinguish against those persons whose property that ship destroyed before she went to Melbourne? They were equally losers. Some of them were insured and some of them were not. The loss fell upon them as heavily and disastrously as upon those whose property was destroyed by the vessel after her force was augmented in Australia.

If I have made myself intelligible to my friend, I have accomplished all the purpose I have in these remarks. Putting it upon the ground that the persons whose property was destroyed by the Alabama, or by the Shenandoah after she left Melbourne, have no special equity, that this fund is not held in trust for them, that they are not legal or equitable claimants in any sense of the word whose claims could be recognized by a court of law or equity sitting upon the case, but that the fund belongs to the Government as much as any other sum of money and is to be distributed equitably, then I inquire why it shall not be given to those whose property was destroyed before as well as after, taking the case of the Shenandoah for illustration; and there were other confederate cruisers with which the British government had no connection at all that destroyed much American property and the equitable claims of the owners of which in that point of view are as strong as any others.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I do not speak for the committee at this moment, because their particular views and reasons for having the bill as it stands might not rest precisely on the same grounds as mine do; but I wish to say, if my friend from Indiana will pardon me for saying it now, that the point he has raised is not precisely the one which is at present logically before the Senate. The present and precise question is whether we shall pay to the war insurance companies the value of property which they insured against destruction, when under the particular circumstances of the case they entered into that kind of business, speculative and honest to be sure, with a view of taking the chance of gain or loss on that subject. That is a different question.

Now, the question put to me respects what finally ought to be done with any balance of this fund after applying it to these direct instances where upon moral grounds, speaking for myself alone, I think it ought to go; and perhaps, upon moral grounds, when that part of it is disposed of, there might be strong reason for saying, as the Senator suggests, that you might go further. I put the right of these people for whom we do provide upon what are really moral grounds; that is to say, we have recovered a certain sum of money just as we would have recovered it by the sword when our time came but for the treaty, only we should have got more—a certain sum of money in respect to injuries done to our citizens. The injuries were done under such circumstances as it appears to me did not give those citizens a right in point of law—and when I say law I mean public law, I mean municipal law, I mean equitable law, I mean all those guiding rules which govern the intercourse of a government with its citizens, of obligations upon one side and right upon the other—did not give them a right in law to ask any indemnity whatever. But when you look at the fact that their vessels were the special objects of pursuit by these cruisers; and that they were destroyed by these cruisers in consequence of the aid that the government of Great Britain had given to those cruisers—putting it, as I say, upon the moral ground of extending as far as the Government can out of this recovery its aid to those extreme cases of special injury in respect to which we have been enabled to recover something, I think it right that these gentlemen who were the ship-owners should be paid.

Now, whether or not we can take a step further and say if anything is left of this fund that those whose property was destroyed by the Shenandoah before the augmentation of her armament and of her men at Melbourne, and by the same vessel fitted out in the same way, although the tribunal held that Great Britain had not aided the confederacy in respect to her in such a way as to be amenable to punishment for it, is a question that certainly deserves very serious consideration. I have thought of it a great deal myself, and it has been pressed with great ingenuity and great candor and with great ability, I must say, by a gentleman who I believe is not a lawyer, a constituent of the Senator from Ohio. When that question arises we must meet it in the best way we can in order to do justice and to maintain the peace on which government is founded and is carried on, that the Government cannot be made responsible without ruin to itself to make good to its citizens in all cases injuries which they receive from the warlike destruction of their property, because that would ruin any government and we cannot get on in that way. It goes beyond what government is instituted to do. Government is instituted to protect its citizens to the extent of its reasonable ability. It is not an absolute guarantor against invasion; it is not an absolute guarantor against the destruction of the property of its citizens on the high seas. It only endeavors, to the extent that the machinery of government will permit it to do, to protect the rights and property of its citizens against public enemies and against private violence such as the government is authorized to put down; and there is no question of that. But every citizen enters into society understanding those terms and subject to those limitations. He takes the chance of being the exposed one whose property is destroyed. So it has been held, as I shall state by and by, because I do not wish to occupy the time of the Senate with a general reply now; but if Senators will suspend their judgment it will appear by and by that a determination has been made by the highest tribunal in this nation, in a case that illustrates this idea that I am now speaking of perfectly, where the particular ship of a citizen in the war was captured, not destroyed—and it would make it much stronger even for these insurance companies where there was absolute destruction, which is the end of the thing, for there cannot be any spes recuperandi when the thing is gone.

The citizen's ship was captured by the public enemy; it was condemned in a prize court of the other belligerent, and was then recaptured by the naval forces of the United States—the very identical vessel in exactly the condition in which she was captured by the enemy's cruisers, and brought back into the ports of the United States. The citizen set up his claim. He said, "That is my ship; you were bound to protect me against the public enemy; the public enemy captured her; now you have got her back, as it was your duty to do if you could, and I want her." The Supreme Court of the United States say unanimously, and upon principles that are perfectly settled in public law—Senators who differ with me will pardon me for speaking so confidently on the subject—"Your right, Mr. A, was gone; we did the best we could to preserve your property, but the enemy captured it, and carried it away, and retained that firm possession of it which the law speaks of for twenty-four hours or more, so that your property was gone, and when it was recaptured it was exactly as if it had been the ship of a citizen of the public enemy against whom we were making war, and you have no right to it at all." Now, if we are to proceed upon these well-recognized and well-known principles of public law as being the guide of duty between the Government and the citizen, then, if Senators will suspend their judgment until we finish this discussion, we shall find, I am sure, in all candor, that there is no difficulty in the first instance in disposing of this question of the insurance companies. Then we shall only be met with the moral difficulty that my friend from Indiana suggests of saying how far we ought to go and where we ought to stop in respect to extending that material aid on moral ground to the circumstances of each particular case where there has been an actual loss. That, I admit, is a troublesome and a delicate question. One Senator might say the line ought to be here, and another there; but upon that point I beg the Senate to reserve the discussion until we reach it.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. President, as I am not able in this case to follow the committee, as I should naturally desire to do, and am inclined also to sustain the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio, I will state briefly the reasons which influence me.

I cannot discover that the proceedings at Geneva followed rules of equity, but that on the other hand the award was made in conformity to principles of law which, if not before existing and generally recognized, were, for the purposes of that arbitration, incorporated in the treaty and governed the arbitrators in the decision that was reached. Therefore, following that precedent, I think in the disposition of the money adjudged due to the United States, if we are to distribute it at all, if it be not the property of the United States as a Government to be held in the Treasury for the uses of the Government we should follow the rules and principles of law; and therefore I think we should submit to a judicial tribunal, from which upon every question arising there may be an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, every claim which may be presented to that tribunal.

Following that statement, it seems to me that we should provide for the legal adjudication of every claim arising from the depredations of those vessels for which Great Britain was adjudged to be responsible. It seems to me that we should adopt that course, for two reasons which are quite apparent.

In the first place, if we here by the exercise of a power which by many persons interested and by persons not interested will be deemed an arbitrary exercise of power, exclude claimants from a judicial tribunal, and thereby their claims shall not be paid, none of us will live long enough to see the time when those claimants will not be besieging the doors of this House and the other for compensation for what they believe to be money improperly if not unjustly withheld by the Government of the United States.

Therefore as a matter of public convenience, and in the interest of general peace, I think that the tribunal which passes upon these claims should pass upon the rights of all those persons who believe themselves to have been wronged or to have suffered losses by the depredations of those vessels for which Great Britain has been adjudged responsible.

Further, Mr. President, I cannot look upon the award made at Geneva as an award made to the Government of the United States as a government, the proceeds to be applied to general purposes. I look upon it as a fund in trust held by the Government of the United States to compensate those persons who suffered by the wrongs of Great Britain according to the judgment of the tribunal at Geneva. If it be otherwise, if it be a principle of national and international law that a government can avail itself of a condition of things like that which has been the subject of negotiation and arbitration, then a government may take advantage of its own wrong. Having the capacity and the power and the right to conduct all affairs with other countries, it would be an easy thing possibly for a government to so manage its foreign affairs as to create a condition of things like that through which we have passed, and, by availing itself of wrongs inflicted upon its own citizens, accumulate money in the treasury for general purposes, which certainly would be at variance with every principle of law and with every theory of ethics.

I do not accept, therefore, the statement made by the Senator from Vermont on Friday last that this money is in the Treasury of the United States as other money is there, to be paid out as a matter of duty or a matter of generosity—I think he used both those words and did not state exactly what his opinion was. Now I am clear if this money is in the Treasury and there is a duty incumbent upon us to pay it, that duty we cannot resist. If it is in the Treasury and no such duty rests upon the Government of the United States, then I seek in vain for the rule or the reason for the exercise of any generosity.

I did not rise for the purpose of entering into the debate at large—I have not prepared myself for it, and I am not in a condition to do it—but to state the view I have, that we should deal with this fund as a trust fund, to be applied to the payment of all those claims that have arisen in consequence of the depredations committed by those vessels for which Great Britain was made responsible; and if the amount received from Great Britain is insufficient, of course they will receive a pro rata dividend; and if it be in excess, the balance, no doubt, belongs to the Government of the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How so, if it is a trust?

Mr. BOUTWELL. It is a trust; and we administer the trust in good faith and pay all the beneficiaries; and under the treaty and by the award, I suppose, what is left must remain in the Treasury of the United States. I do not know that it can be got out, unless some person has a legal claim to receive it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. BUCKINGHAM in the chair.) The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I understand that this amendment now is to make distribution to the insurance companies. That is the effect of it. The amendment is to so modify the bill as to admit the insurance companies to participate in this fund. Not only that, it is to admit insurance companies that made money out of the war to be indemnified out of this national fund. To be indemnified for what? To be indemnified for what they paid the assured, notwithstanding after making that statement they were enabled to make large dividends out of the war. We are to take this national fund and to pay it to insurance companies that made money out of the war, while no one else who suffered by the war receives any compensation or indemnity.

Mr. SCHURZ. Will the Senator from New Jersey permit me to make a suggestion?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SCHURZ. He is aware probably that two-thirds of the claims made by insurance companies, the aggregate of which amount to about $4,000,000, are made by mutual insurance companies, and it is a notorious fact that the mutual insurance companies consist of owners of vessels throughout. Will the Senator be kind enough to tell me how these mutual insurance companies who bore their own losses made money out of the war or war premiums?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I understand that this bill does not exclude any insurance company that sustained a loss, and that answers the Senator. The bill as it stands does not exclude any insurance company that lost money by its war risks. If the mutual insurance company lost, they are not excluded from participating by this bill.

Mr. SCHURZ. Unless I trouble the Senator——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I did not rise to make a speech. I will give the Senator any information I have. I would rather the Senator presented his views when he has the floor himself, however.

Mr. SCHURZ. Very well.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I was going on to say that I do not see how any one can claim that this is not a national fund. Surely the man who lost by having his vessel destroyed, the owner of the vessel or the merchant, had no claim against Great Britain. No such person could make a claim, for two reasons. In the first place, we have a statute that says no one shall; and in the next place, if there was no statute, the loss was an act of war; and just as well might the owner of the vessel or the merchant sue the confederates as sue Great Britain; just as well might every person who suffered from the war sue the confederates. It was an act of war, and the sufferers have no remedy.

Mr. SCHURZ rose.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Cannot my friend keep quiet?

Mr. SCHURZ. I want to put a question. The Senator says he does not see how it can be questioned that this is a national fund. Will he be kind enough to tell me for what, in consideration of what, the Geneva tribunal awarded that sum to us?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. My friend asks a question which involves, if I should answer it—which I do not intend to do—a speech of half an hour. I do not intend to go into that question any further than this: I understand that the award was made to satisfy this nation, and that the award in express terms says that the tribunal allows a sum in gross. I understand that the Secretary of State sent express directions to our counsel in presenting this claim that they should so present it that this Government would be under no possible obligation to insured or insurers in the distribution of the fund, but that they should exercise a broad discretion as to what they should do with this national fund; and under these circumstances, the Government having protested beforehand that they were not to be bound by any presentation of this case so that this fund should belong to any individuals, those individuals cannot come forward when the award has been made in gross and say that it is their individual property.

Mr. SCHURZ. Where has the Government protested? I do not know of any protest.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. In Mr. Fish's letter.

Mr. SCHURZ. To whom?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. Fish's letter to our counsel.

Mr. SCHURZ. Was that letter made public?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Certainly.

Mr. SCHURZ. Before the tribunal? Never. The tribunal was entirely ignorant of that.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It was not a letter addressed to the tribunal.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Certainly.

Mr. THURMAN. Does the Senator think that Mr. Fish's letter to our agent would have any effect whatever on the legal right or equitable right of the people who had suffered by the depredations of the confederate cruisers? Does he think that that absolves us from doing justice?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Well, Mr. President, the last question it is hardly necessary to answer. I suppose that if any Senator avows one side of this cause, he would hardly admit that he was claiming to have injustice done. The question of justice is one which is claimed by those who take the one or the other view of this subject.

Mr. THURMAN. If I do not interrupt the Senator, will he allow me to say a word right there?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. THURMAN. It would have been impudent in the Geneva tribunal to have decided between citizens of the United States which of two citizens were entitled to the money. All that the tribunal had to do if it decided in favor of a gross award was to determine what was the value of the property destroyed. That does not absolve us from the obligations of law. I put it to the Senator if instead of a gross award they had sent this matter to assessors under the tenth article of the treaty, would they not have been bound to decide upon individual claims according to law?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Ohio that it would have been impudent for the Geneva tribunal to have undertaken to settle claims of individuals, and they have not done it, and therefore individuals can base no claim against this Government on account of that award. I agree with the Senator from Ohio that if they did anything the Geneva tribunal could have referred it to another tribunal to settle individual claims; but they did not do it. They settled the sum in gross, and it is perfectly clear that the owners of the ships, the merchantmen, had no claim against Great Britain. They have an equity which they present here, and it is that equity which we in our discretion are administering. According to my discretion it is inequitable, it is unjust——

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Not just now, in the midst of a sentence. It is inequitable, it is unjust for us to take that money, the fruit of that award, and give it to those who made money instead of losing money out of the war. That is all I wish to say on this subject.

Mr. THURMAN. If that is all the Senator wants to say on the subject——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. At the present time. I may say more at some other time.

Mr. THURMAN. Then he is bound in conscience to vote against this bill, for in the operation of this bill it will give money to men who made money out of the war. It will give money to the man whose ship made ten successful trips that three times paid all her cost and value, and that was lost on the eleventh trip. But the Senator misapprehended what I said about the Geneva tribunal. The Geneva tribunal had no right to decide between A B and C D, who should have compensation for the loss of the ship Brilliant, for instance. It could find, as an element of the amount which it would award against Great Britain, what was the value of the ship Brilliant, and it could then leave the question of who was entitled to that amount to be decided by a board of assessors under the tenth article of the treaty; or it could find an amount in gross and leave it to the justice, yes, sir, the justice and the honor of the United States of America to distribute that money according to law. If, instead of the amount being found in gross, the tribunal had simply said "Great Britain is responsible for the Alabama, for the Florida, for the Shenandoah after she left Melbourne, for the destruction caused by those three vessels, but as to the quantum of that destruction, as to who is entitled to indemnity on account of it, we refer the matter to the board of assessors provided for by the tenth article of the treaty," no man yet has denied that that board of assessors would have been a tribunal to decide between individuals, between A B, C D, and E F, and that each one of these underwriters would have had a right to present his claim before that tribunal for adjudication. No one has had the hardihood to deny that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator, I hope, has not forgotten the debate of last year in which that matter was referred to?

Mr. THURMAN. Well, if anybody has denied that, I never saw the man whose face was as hard as that—never yet. On the contrary, it is admitted by our own representatives at Geneva that in that case that tribunal must decide between individuals.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Where is the evidence of that?

Mr. THURMAN. It is in these documents, and I can show it to the Senator, and will if he wants it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear it read.

Mr. THURMAN. Well, it is here.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator read it?

Mr. THURMAN. Not now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator refer to it?

Mr. THURMAN. I will find it and refer to it. It is admitted in the argument made by our representatives there in favor of an award in gross, that if the matter was sent to a board of assessors, they must decide between the individual claimants. But pray what were they to decide? They were to decide definitely; nothing was to be decided by the Congress of the United States; but that board of assessors would make a final award; they would make a final judgment to A and to B and to C. How could they make that final award without deciding upon the conflicting claims of individuals? And yet here it is pretended that when the tribunal at Geneva, instead of sending the matter to a board of assessors, trusted to the honor and justice of the American Government to decide wisely between its citizens according to law, they made the money the money of the United States to do with it what it pleased. That is precisely the fact. No, Mr. President, you may hide this matter as much as you please, the simple question here is whether might makes right. That is the whole question. We have the power to do with this money what we please. We may do with it what we please.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Had the owner of the ship, the merchantman, any claim against Great Britain?

Mr. THURMAN. Yes.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Then I understand the Senator to hold that in violation of the statute which says such citizens shall not make any claim, and although it was an act of war, they individually had a claim against Great Britain, and he must take that ground. He had to answer "yes," for his whole argument rests upon it. I say no. I say that the merchantman, the ship-owner, had no claim against Great Britain whatever, because his loss was by an act of war. It was an injury done to this nation, not to the individual; and that being so, if the merchant or ship-owner had no claim against Great Britain, then the merchant or the ship-owner has no vested interest in this fund. And if the merchant or the ship-owner has no vested interest in this fund, then there is nothing to which the insurer has a right to be subrogated.

Mr. THURMAN. Well, Mr. President, that is a very nice argument, indeed. The Senator says that the individual citizen of the United States had no claim against Great Britain because of a statute of the United States. Does that statute say that an individual citizen can have no claim against a foreign government? No, sir; it simply says you shall prosecute that claim through your own Government. It says a citizen of the United States shall not be making treaties with a foreign government. You will not allow a State of the Union to make a treaty with a foreign government, and a fortiori you will not allow a citizen of the United States to make a treaty with a foreign government; for every settlement of his claim would be a treaty. Do you deny his claim? Do you deny that he has a right against the foreign government? No, sir. If I am not mistaken, the Senator from New Jersey supported the French spoliation bill. What was that but a bill to pay for claims of American citizens upon France? Sir, that will not do at all. For reasons of public policy we provide that claims of our citizens shall be prosecuted by the Government. Every government does so. Does that make them national claims. Only because they are claims of the citizens or subjects of the government, and the government is bound to protect the interests of its citizens and its subjects. That is the only national interest there is in it. If a foreign government seize me when peaceably traveling through it and imprison me in one of its dungeons without cause, that is an injury to me individually and it is also an injury to the nation to which I belong, because the nation is bound to protect my rights.

Now, to say that because, forsooth, a citizen cannot prosecute his own claim, because he cannot bring an action against Great Britain for trespass or trespass on the case, and he cannot bring an action against his own government, this citizen whose property was destroyed and the destruction of which was caused by the omission to perform her obligations as a neutral which rested upon Great Britain has no claim, no claim that Great Britain was bound to respect, no claim that his own government was bound to respect, but that his own government might assert that claim and get money on that claim and put that money in its pocket or give that money to somebody else—all that is consistent with the laws and the ethics and the morality—well, I will not say of whom.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Senator might as well have finished his sentence; it would not have done any hurt. Mr. President, I do not believe that this question can be carried by calling hard names or by a hard manner of one Senator toward another. I take it that we are all too old to be much affected by that kind of thing. If we are influenced by that manner and by denunciation and by being told that what we do is a violation of justice and honor and national integrity, we had better take our hats and go home as children unfit for this arena.

I understand the Senator to have undertaken to answer what I said. I said this, and he will see how he has, unintentionally of course, avoided answering my point. I said that this was not a claim of the individual, because there was a statute which prohibited a citizen from presenting or making a claim and because the loss which the ship-owner or the merchant suffered was a loss by an act of war. It was an inury done to the nation, and the nation was the one to be indemnified for that injury, and then the citizen could appeal to the equity or discretion or justice of his own nation for such indemnity as that nation thought he was entitled to. Therefore the claim of these ship-owners and merchants was not a claim against Great Britain. Being not a claim against Great Britain, they have no vested interest in this fund. Having no vested interest in this fund, there is nothing for the insurer to be subrogated to; and there is no answer to it. We are bound to do justice here; and if any one of these insurance companies has suffered by the war, I am in favor to the last dollar that there is of the fund of paying it out to them; but where there has been no loss, according to my judgment there is no claim to indemnity.

Mr. BAYARD. I should like merely to state one fact in reply to the Senator from New Jersey. He seems to consider that the insurance company should have no indemnity for its loss in the identical case, provided the average of its business during the war arising from war risks resulted in a profit; and that was the basis of reasoning upon which he sustained this feature in the twelfth section. Now, sir, the question of profit or loss during the war has nothing to do with the justice of the claim under this bill. The merchant who chooses to insure adds to the price of his commodity the premium of his insurance. It is enhanced so much to the consumer, and the merchant's gain is just as great. Suppose he insures himself, pays no premium to an insurance company but becomes his own insurer. He has gained during the war. He has gained in a dozen different adventures. He loses on the thirteenth. You have just as much right in equity and morals and law to call him into court and make him bring his books and show that his whole business during the war has not brought him profit as to say the same thing of an insurance company. In order to make this discrimination between the man who is subrogated to the rights of the insured or the man who has paid the loss in his individual capacity, you must first establish that the contract of insurance is against public policy and is to be punished. Whenever the people of this country can be satisfied that the contract of insurance is a contract against public policy, against public morals, and that we must deal with it in a punitive way, then you may find some justification for this attempted discrimination; but until you do find it, you will be obliged to say that in the case of two classes of your citizens equally meritorious in law and in morals you refuse to pay one and you do pay the other. Unless you can show that there is something in the two claims which renders the one open to punishment and subtraction and the other to payment in full, I think your argument will be found wanting in the mind of any sensible man not prejudiced.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from New Jersey thinks that the Government is under no obligation to its citizen because its citizen has no claim against any foreign government. Let us see what the Government of the United States thought of the claims of its citizens. Let us see what it did. Let us see what it undertook to do. I hold in my hand an official circular issued by the Department of State, dated Washington, October 28, 1865. It reads as follows:

OFFICIAL CIRCULAR.

The following official notice to claimants against foreign governments was published on the 25th ultimo by this Department:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, September 22, 1865.

Citizens of the United States having claims against foreign governments, not founded on contract, which may have originated since the 8th of February, 1853, will, without any delay which can be avoided, forward to this Department statements of the same, under oath, accompanied by the proper proof.

The following rules, which are substantially those which have been adopted by commissions organized under conventions between the United States and foreign governments for the adjustment of claims, are published for the information of citizens of the United States having claims against foreign governments, of the character indicated in the above notification; and they are advised to conform as nearly as possible to these rules in preparing and forwarding their papers to the Department of State.

Each claimant should file a memorial, setting forth minutely and particularly the facts and circumstances from which the right to prefer such claim is derived by the claimant; and it should be verified by his or her oath or affirmation.

The memorial and all the accompanying papers should be written upon foolscap paper, with a margin of at least one inch in width on each side of the page, as in this circular, so as to admit of their being bound in volumes for preservation and convenient reference; and the pages should succeed each other like those of a book, and be readable without inverting them.

When any of the papers mentioned in Rule 2 are known to have been already furnished to the Department by other claimants, it will be unnecessary to repeat them in a subsequent memorial. Nor is it necessary where several vessels have been captured by the same cruiser to repeat in each memorial the circumstances in respect to the equipment, arming, manning, flag, &c., of such cruiser, which are relied upon as the evidence of the responsibility of a foreign government for her tortious acts. A simple reference to and adoption of one memorial in which such facts have been fully stated will suffice.

It is proper that the interposition of this Government with the foreign government against which the claim is presented should be requested in express terms to avoid a possible objection to the jurisdiction of a future commission on the ground of the generality of the claim. Claims of citizens of the United States against this Government, growing out of the late insurrection, are under the cognizance of other Departments, of the Court of Claims, or are the subjects for an appeal to Congress.

Then it goes on to give the rules. Here was a public, official circular of the Department of State, calling upon citizens of the United States to prefer their claims, and notably and especially if I were to read the rules, still further calling upon all who had claims against Great Britain on account of the grievances we alleged against her to assert their claims. But the Government did not stop there. That was in 1865. In 1871 the Department of State replied to the various claims which had been referred to it in the letters inclosing those claims, in this form:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, September —, 1871.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the —— instant, and its inclosures.

In reply, I inclose a copy of the treaty concluded with Great Britain on the 8th of May last—and general instructions as to the proof of claims prepared for the use of claimants in the absence of rules by the tribunal which may pass upon the claims.

This very treaty of Washington—

In the absence of rules and in anticipation of the action of the tribunal, this Department cannot assume to determine what claims it may or may not be proper to prefer under the first eleven articles of the treaty, nor to direct what form or extent of proof will be necessary to establish them, nor the effect of insurance upon the question of right of compensation. It will present to the tribunal at Geneva, to be taken into account in estimating the sum to be paid to the United States, all "claims growing out of the acts committed by the several vessels which have given rise to the claims generically known as the Alabama claims"—

Quoting the very language of the treaty—

"which may be presented to the Department in time to enable it to do so." Persons desiring to lodge claims in the Department for that purpose are requested to do so without delay, in such form and sustained by such proofs as they may be advised or think proper to rest their claims upon, as the time for presenting the case of the United States expires on the 16th day of December next.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

HAMILTON FISH,
Secretary.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator be kind enough to read that clause again which speaks of the purpose of presentation with a view to an estimate?

Mr. THURMAN. It is:

It will present to the tribunal at Geneva, to be taken into account in estimating the sum to be paid to the United States, all "claims growing out of the acts committed by the several vessels which have given rise to the claims generically known as the Alabama claims."

And yet after this invitation to citizens of the United States to file with the Department their individual claims for compensation for losses incurred by them and the solemn pledge of the Government to lay those claims before the Geneva tribunal in order that it might award a sum in gross, or that finding the liability of Great Britain, the matter might go before a board of assessors under the tenth article of the treaty, the Senator from New Jersey says there were no individual claims at all, that no citizen of the United States had any claim at all!

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, it is well known that both the government and people of Great Britain denied that they had any responsibility whatever either to the United States or to the citizens of the United States, in consequence of the acts of those cruisers. Great Britain was a little uneasy as to her status with regard to the action of neutrals in any future war in which she might engage, and Great Britain was exceedingly anxious to arbitrate and to settle this point as to the status of neutrals. While she denied absolutely all liability she said: "For the purpose of making this settlement we will pay a round sum to the Government of the United States," and that round sum lies in the Treasury to-day. Now, I take it, that it is there for us to do justice with. The first man who has a claim against our Government under this award is the ship-owner. If the ship-owner has suffered loss by the destruction of his property, we are bound, so far as this award goes, to make him whole. That we propose to do. But you go to the ship-owner and he says: "I have been paid that; the insurance company has paid me the whole of my loss with 10 per cent. profit both on ship and cargo;" and that is what insurance companies do; they insure not only for the value but for a profit. Has he any claim on the Government? No man would claim that he has any. He has been paid in full and an anticipated profit upon his venture. Then comes in the insurance company and says: "I want the money." What for? You charged during the whole war 10 per cent. war risk; that was the exact amount. You made enormous sums of money by this war risk over and above all your losses. "But, nevertheless, we now come and demand that we shall be reimbursed for what we have already been paid in war risks." Is there any justice, equity, or common sense in the proposition? I aver not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. SCHURZ. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. O, no; do not let us adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. SCHURZ called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. SCHURZ. Before the yeas and nays are called I wish to make a proposition. I understand there are several Senators who wish to address the Senate upon this subject; and I propose, if it be agreeable to the Senator from Vermont who has the bill in charge, that we agree upon a certain hour when we shall take the vote to-morrow, and I propose that it be two o'clock if that is agreeable to the Senator, we adjourning now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is entirely agreeable to finish this bill to-night, and I think that in the state of the public business we ought to do it; but if the Senate is willing to come to an understanding that the general debate on this bill shall close to-morrow at one o'clock, and that the person having the bill in charge shall have an hour after that to make a general reply and then take the vote upon any amendments that may be proposed, and upon the bill without further debate, I shall not insist upon asking Senators to stay here to-night, if that is agreeable to the Senate.

Mr. SCHURZ. It would be entirely agreeable to me; and in order to come to a definite understanding, I propose that the debate commence after the morning business is disposed of to-morrow, even before the expiration of the morning hour, and then at one o'clock the Senator from Vermont will have one hour to reply to all that has been said, and the voting to commence at two o'clock.

Mr. DAVIS. The chairman of the Committee on Claims is not in his seat. He gave notice some ten days ago that to-morrow he would ask the Senate to consider bills reported from that committee. In conversation with him to-day he said he expected to insist upon to-morrow for that business, and I also have given notice that to-morrow morning directly after the regular morning business is done I shall desire to submit some remarks on the subject of claims.

Mr. SCHURZ. Let me suggest to the Senator that that can be done after we have disposed of this bill. If the voting commences at two o'clock we shall certainly be through by half-past two or three.

Mr. DAVIS. It would take more than one day, I should think, to dispose of the claims on the Calendar reported from the Committee on Claims. There are a number of them which have not been considered yet.

Mr. WRIGHT. In the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Claims, exceedingly anxious as I am to accommodate myself to the wish of the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary in connection with this bill, I shall feel it my duty to object to any arrangement, inasmuch as there was unanimous consent given that we should take up reports from the Committee on Claims to-morrow, and inasmuch as the chairman is not here, I do not think I can consent to any such arrangement as that now proposed. I think it better that we should dispose of this bill to-night.

Mr. SCHURZ. Then I renew my motion to adjourn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope we shall not adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved that the Senate adjourn, and upon this motion the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 13, nays 34; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Cooper, Fenton, Gordon, Hager, Kelly, McCreery, Saulsbury, Schurz, Stockton, Thurman, and Tipton—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Anthony, Boreman, Boutwell, Buckingham, Chandler, Conkling, Conover, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Logan, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Sargent, Scott, Sherman, Wadleigh, Washburn, West, Windom, and Wright—34.

ABSENT—Messrs. Allison, Brownlow, Cameron, Carpenter, Clayton, Cragin, Davis, Dennis, Dorsey, Ferry of Connecticut, Goldthwaite, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Howe, Johnston, Jones, Lewis, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Ransom, Spencer, Sprague, Stevenson, and Stewart—26.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. THURMAN. I am perfectly willing that we shall sit this bill out to-morrow, but I am not willing to fix a definite hour at which the vote shall be taken. This is a large subject. It was debated very briefly at the former session. It has been debated only to-day and a part of another day at this session. It is a question of deep interest to the citizens of the United States and affecting the national reputation for honor and integrity. I cannot agree that the vote shall be taken at a definite hour which will cut off discussion. I am willing to "sit it out" to-morrow, with a belief that the debate can be finished to-morrow, for I am as anxious as any one to speed the business of the session and let us adjourn at a reasonable time. I move now that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SCHURZ. Will the Senator withdraw his motion for a moment?

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SCHURZ. I do not know how much debate the Senator may anticipate on this bill yet; probably he knows better than I; but from what I have been told, all the debate there is likely to be may be compressed in the space of an hour and a half, exclusive of what the Senator from Vermont will claim for himself. I am also informed by the Senator from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the Committee on Claims, that he is ready to agree to the arrangement, and I will therefore renew the proposition to the Senate to have the voting commence at two o'clock to-morrow, with the understanding that at one o'clock the Senator from Vermont shall have the floor to make the closing speech, the discussion to commence immediately after the close of the morning business, which will probably give us an hour and a half.

Mr. THURMAN. I hardly think that proposition is right. The chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary did at a previous session very fully explain his views. He has explained them not so fully at this session. The subject has undergone no more consideration now than it did then. To agree to the proposition of the Senator from Missouri would be to cut off all other Senators from expressing their views on this subject. I would be perfectly willing to fix a later hour to-morrow if that is the sense of the Senate—say four o'clock—but I do not think we ought to agree that after one speech to-morrow, for that is what it comes to, from the chairman of the committee the vote shall be taken.

Mr. SCOTT. I have been informed that during my absence from the Chamber a proposition for unanimous consent to vote upon this bill to-morrow was objected to because of the special order made setting apart the day for the consideration of bills from the Committee on Claims; and if I am correct in my apprehension of the effect of the order, it would be displaced if this bill goes over as the unfinished business, so that the committee would not secure the benefit of the order until the disposition of this bill. While I am very desirous that all parties interested in bills which have been reported from the Committee on Claims should have the benefit of an early consideration, I can hardly see that I would be advancing their interest by objecting to an arrangement of this character, because we should be in that event securing a portion of the day at least, while if this goes over as the unfinished business without an agreement for an hour fixed at which it is to be terminated we might not secure any consideration whatever to-morrow. I understand the Senator from Ohio, however, to object to that arrangement, so that my consent would then practically be of no benefit as representing the Committee on Claims. I should be willing, in the view which I take of it, to consent, so far as the special order is concerned, that this bill shall be disposed of to-morrow at two o'clock, the Committee on Claims taking the rest of the day.

Mr. THURMAN. Say four o'clock.

Mr. SCOTT. That is practically abandoning the day altogether. But if the Senate is willing, by unanimous consent, to assign the next day for the consideration of the bills reported by the Committee on Claims I shall not be averse to that. However, I understand the Senator from Ohio objects to fixing an hour to-morrow.

Mr. THURMAN. I am willing to fix four o'clock to-morrow and I certainly am willing to agree, and I think the Senate ought to agree, to assign the next day to the Committee on Claims. I do not want to cut off Senators who desire to speak on this subject to-morrow. That is all. Perhaps they may not speak and we may get to a vote earlier. I think we had better, by unanimous consent, agree to fix the next day for the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SCOTT. If the Senate by unanimous consent will assign Wednesday for the Committee on Claims I will not stand in the way of expediting business.

Mr. THURMAN. I hope that will be done.

Mr. SHERMAN. I feel it my duty to object to that arrangement. On Wednesday I shall submit to the Senate a proposition to take up the currency bill with a view to have prompt and decisive action upon it. I cannot consent to this arrangement unless the Senate should overrule me.

Mr. SCOTT. I am still willing to assent to the arrangement for to-morrow at two o'clock if unanimous consent can be obtained for that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The Chair understood the Senator from Ohio to object to two o'clock.

Mr. SHERMAN. I objected to setting aside Wednesday for any exclusive purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair referred to the other Senator from Ohio, who objected to an arrangement for voting to-morrow at two o'clock. The motion is that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope not. Let us stick if we cannot make an arrangement.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I understand from what has been said that the losses which have been sustained are losses for which no individual who sustained them can make any claim upon Great Britain, that the losses were the result of an act of war, and that in consequence no merchant has a claim, but the Government has made claim and brought into its Treasury a certain amount in consequence of these losses. It appears to me that this fund is made up from individual losses; the award was based upon those losses; and when we undertake to distribute it, it appears to me we must distribute it in accordance with the claims that were made by each individual. It is proposed to divide it equitably; but it is said there are certain insurance companies which may or may not have made money during the war out of extra war risks or extra war premiums, and that they must stand on a different footing; and the proposition is that if any insurance company, after showing its books and presenting a balance-sheet shall show that it has lost money, then this bill proposes to make up the deficiency to that company. If that is right, why not go a little further, and if the insurance company by showing a balance-sheet shall show that it has made money, why not require that company to pay the balance into the Treasury of the United States? I see no difference. It seems to me when you require an insurance company or an individual to show his balance-sheet to show what he has made or what he has lost in consequence of these depredations by rebel cruisers, if you are to make a right distribution of the balance, if it is right to take it from the Treasury of the United States to pay for the loss, it is equally right to make a claim that all who made money shall return the profits to the Treasury.

The difficulty, it appears to me, arises from the fact that the proposition is to concentrate all the loss into one balance-sheet and determine the loss or the profit there. But that is not the way insurance is ever adjusted by an insurance company or by a merchant. Each and every loss is adjusted upon its own merits; and upon any other basis you cannot settle a loss; and I do not know whether you should undertake to settle one by the Congress of the United States by a distribution of this fund in any other way. It seems to me that when you undertake a different rule, you set aside mercantile usage and come short of doing justice; and it appears to me that you would come so far short of justice if you should pass the bill as it now stands, and it seems so much more equitable to amend it as proposed by the Senator from Ohio, that I shall vote for that amendment.

Mr. STOCKTON. Mr. President, I rise simply to say a word on the subject of the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio. If this clause in reference to insurance companies is left in the bill, I cannot see why the same law should not be applied to all other claimants. The doctrine avowed by those who are in favor of retaining the clause is that this money is appropriated to meet losses and damages, and it is inequitable and unjust to give any portion of the fund to those who have made money out of the war. True, this is res inter alios acta. True, they do not confine the making of money to the adventure. Any one who has made money in the war has not suffered loss or damage by the war, and therefore he is to have no part of this. Now suppose some of these claimants who are not insurers, some of these gentlemen claiming in their own right, made money out of shoddy contracts during the war; suppose they made money by selling bad blankets to the soldiers; they come precisely within every reason given by gentlemen on the other side for excluding the payment to these insurers; that is, that in some other transaction, some other adventure, some other business even, for their doctrine covers even that, they have made money. That seems to me a strange argument.

We invited these claimants to come and put in their claims. We sent those claims under the treaty to this tribunal to be arbitrated upon. We have received an award, to be sure in gross, but a gross amount made up from an examination of the details of all claims of all kinds; and now we insist upon it that a considerable portion of those claimants are not entitled to the share they claimed because they were more fortunate than others and made money during the war. It is not only, as has been well said to-day, a violation of our duty to the claimants themselves, but it is undoubtedly a violation of our national faith; it is a violation of our duty to ourselves; it is a violation of our duty to the history of this country.

We do not wish to have another case such as the case of French spoliations brought up again. If we do not wish to be placed in the position of being charged with getting money from a foreign government as the agents of our own claimants and putting it in our Treasury and keeping it there, and refusing to give it to the honest claimants until finally they are told that their claim is old and stale, if we do not wish to repeat that unfortunate chapter in our history, I think it well that those who were admitted to be claimants in this case should not be prevented from having the sum which they are entitled to now under any such sophistical reasoning as that which we have heard from the other side. If there is any good reason whatever why they should not have their claims adjusted, gentlemen certainly have not given it. When under every principle of law and equity the insurer is subrogated to the rights of the party assured, in courts of equity as well as courts of law, it cannot be expected that in this great case, where the principles of equity should so especially be our guide, we can have all these arguments from analogy answered by the statement simply, "Why, they made money out of the war."

I insist upon it, Mr. President, that if these insurance companies have made money out of the war, so have many and many of the claimants made money in other ventures with the very ships that were afterward captured. They made money not only in the same business but in other businesses during the war, and the reasoning applies with equal force, and no line can be drawn to prevent it from applying equally to individuals as to those who make their claims under their contracts of insurance.

After the vote is taken upon the pending amendment I have an amendment to offer to cover the ground I have stated in the few remarks I have made.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, when the Senate adjourns to-day does it meet to-morrow at eleven or twelve o'clock?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. At eleven o'clock.

Mr. CONKLING. I rather think some of the Senators who objected to an arrangement had forgotten that, and I will attempt to get an understanding by proposing that at three o'clock to-morrow we vote. If the Senator from Ohio farthest from me [Mr. THURMAN] were here, I think he would consider that substantially his own suggestion. He proposed four o'clock, and if we meet at eleven o'clock, it will give us substantially the time he suggested.

Mr. THURMAN entered the Chamber.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I was proposing in the absence of the Senator from Ohio, who has just come in, that we agree now to vote to-morrow at three o'clock, and I remind the Senator that we meet to-morrow at eleven.

Mr. THURMAN. I will agree to that.

Mr. CONKLING. That substantially comes to his original suggestion. I do not think the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] has any objection to that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have no objection to three o'clock if it is satisfactory to the Senate. My only desire is to get forward with the business; and as we meet at eleven o'clock to-morrow, if I can have the floor at two o'clock to occupy an hour it will be satisfactory to me.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to inquire whether the Senator from Vermont, who has this bill in charge, has made his speech yet, or when he proposes to do it?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have stated the grounds upon which in general the idea of the bill rests, and this understanding is that I shall have an hour at the end, beginning at two o'clock, an hour before the voting commences, to sum up for the committee.

Mr. STEWART. Will that be sufficient?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That will be time enough.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York proposes that at two o'clock to-morrow the floor be given to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] to close the debate, and that at three o'clock the debate shall close and voting commence upon the amendments and the bill without further debate. Is that agreeable to the Senate?

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to offer two or three amendments, to which I think the Senator from Vermont will assent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The understanding is that any Senator may offer any amendment he chooses.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will there be no opportunity of speaking at all on amendments?

Mr. STEWART. Let us have the five-minute rule on amendments.

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes; let us have the five-minute rule on amendments. That is about my limit in speaking. I think I shall want to occupy five minutes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think that had better be left as it is, in these agreements, to a question of general consent. If any Senator offers an amendment and wishes to explain it, Senators never object to his doing so; but if we adopt the five-minute rule, we could run this thing till midnight to-morrow.

Mr. HAMLIN. We very often in our arrangements do have it expressly understood that each Senator who may offer an amendment shall have an opportunity of speaking five minutes upon it. I would myself be very unwilling to trespass upon any agreement that I had assented to. There would be no rule to prevent me from doing it; but there would be a sense of propriety which would bind me to the agreement, and I would not trespass upon it. I do not often trespass on the Senate beyond five minutes. I may want to do so for ten minutes on this bill, and I would prefer not to say what I have to say until I shall have had the sense of the Senate upon the pending motion, and I fear we shall not get that question until the time within which debate is restricted shall have expired.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I feel sure that if any fresh amendment be offered which presents a fresh question, as the Senator suggests he may offer one, nobody will object to the mover of that amendment occupying a few moments to explain it, and any member of the committee the same number of moments to reply to it if he wishes to do so; but if we are to have an understanding, in view of the pressure of business and the lateness of the season, I think the understanding had better be that debate shall terminate at three o'clock, except general consent be given for an explanation, which I have found in practice nobody has ever objected to.

Mr. THURMAN. I have said I would agree to the proposition to take the vote at three o'clock to-morrow, the chairman of the committee having the last hour to close the debate. I will agree to that yet and stand by what I have said, but I must say that it is not exactly the best mode to close a debate upon a question like this. It would be much better to agree to sit the bill out, and the reason of that is very obvious. If we agree to take the vote at three o'clock to-morrow we do not know how many Senators will be in attendance before the hour of three; and besides that, when the chairman of the committee rises to close the debate there is a natural indisposition to intrude on his time by interrupting him, and however he may start new theories or refer to facts perfectly explainable, it is only by his courtesy that we are allowed to explain a fact that he may state or documents that he may read, and which are perfectly explainable; and the vote may be taken by the Senate with the last speech made wholly and entirely unanswered; and that, too, in a case like this, where the opening of the debate was not as full, I think, as is usual. That being the case, it does seem to me that much the fairest way to arrive at perfect justice in this case would be to agree to sit the bill out to-morrow. Nevertheless, if it is the desire of the Senate to take the vote at three o'clock, I shall not object; but I do not think it is the best way to arrive at a correct conclusion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the proposed arrangement satisfactory to the Senate?

Mr. BAYARD. What is it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state it. The proposed arrangement is that at two o'clock to-morrow the Senator from Vermont who has charge of the bill shall take the floor and occupy it for one hour, and at three o'clock the voting shall commence upon the amendments and the bill without further debate.

Mr. THURMAN. It is not intended that there shall be no debate on amendments that shall be thereafter offered, is it?

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. Except a limited debate by general consent.

Mr. THURMAN. Of course there ought to be some debate on amendments that are offered, if it is only a five-minute debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the proposition agreed to? ["Yes," "Yes."] The Chair hears no objection, and the proposition will be regarded as agreed to.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. The Senator from Missouri suggested that discussion on the question should commence immediately after the morning business to-morrow. Is that the understanding of the Senate? I would rather it should not be. It seems to me we should have the morning hour for the Calendar; but if that is the understanding I will not object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That was suggested, but it was not stated in the proposition.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, you will recollect that this morning I gave notice that to-morrow morning (supposing that to-morrow would be set apart for claims, as had been suggested) I should desire to submit some remarks in that connection. As the bill now pending will be before the Senate to-morrow, I shall ask on Wednesday morning to be allowed to address the Senate in pursuance of the notice I gave.

Mr. CONKLING. Then it is understood that the consideration of this bill will be resumed immediately on the completion of the morning business to-morrow?

Mr. SCOTT. Am I correct in stating that the unfinished business will displace the order made by unanimous consent for the consideration of claims to-morrow?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business takes precedence among the special orders, and will displace any special order.

Mr. SCOTT. Then I wish to give notice that as soon as this bill is disposed of I shall ask the very earliest moment for resuming the consideration of bills from the Committee on Claims.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will lay before the Senate bills from the House of Representatives for reference.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (H. R. No. 1051) for the honorable discharge from their several positions in the Army of Captain J. Horace McGuire, First Lieutenant Henry R. Gardner, Second Lieutenant William D. McGuire, and Second Lieutenant William C. Reddy, all late of the Tenth Regiment United States Colored Artillery, (heavy,) and directing their honorable muster out of the service of the United States as of the date of their dismissal; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1775) for the relief of Foster A. Hixon, late a paymaster in the United States Army.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Finance:

A bill (H. R. No. 1955) for the relief of John Henderson, of New Orleans;

A bill (H. R. No. 3266) for the relief of the Pekin Alcohol Manufacturing Company; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3267) changing the name and location of Irasburgh National Bank of Orleans, county of Orleans, State of Vermont.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs:

A bill (H. R. No. 1924) for the relief of James L. Johnson, surviving partner of Beck & Johnson, authorizing payment for Indian depredations; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1925) for the relief of James Preston Beck, administrator of Preston Beck, jr., deceased, authorizing payment for Indian depredations.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (H. R. No. 1952) granting a pension to Nancy C. Marlette; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2925) granting a pension to Dorothea Irons, mother of Lieutenant Joseph F. Irons.

The bill (H. R. No. 1938) to extend the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1871, entitled "An act to provide for the collection of debts due from southern railroads," was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (H. R. No. 3327) to provide for the improvement of the Oostenaula River, in the State of Georgia, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill (H. R. No. 2398) granting a medal to John Horn, jr., for his heroic exploits in rescuing men, women, and children from drowning in Detroit River, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 95) authorizing the Postmaster-General to perfect title to certain real estate obtained from John W. Norton, a defaulter to the postal Money-order Bureau, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The bill (H. R. No. 1937) for the relief of the State of Tennessee was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. COOPER. That bill should go to the Committee on Military Affairs. It arises out of military claims.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, sir; it should go to the Committee on the Judiciary. The bill relates to a judicial controversy.

Mr. COOPER. It arises out of military claims.

Mr. CONKLING. If we adjourn, that can be examined by to-morrow morning and it will be no loss. The Chair can hold the bill until to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will lie on the table without reference.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We had better dispose of the question one way or another.

Mr. COOPER. If the chairman of the Judiciary Committee wants it referred to his committee, I have no objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not want anything. I only wish to state to the Senator from Tennessee that this question has been now for two years before the Judiciary Committee as a law question between the United States and the State of Tennessee, growing out of legal liability that is said to exist on the part of the State, although there was a railroad at the bottom of it. Therefore I suggest, as the bill came from the Committee on the Judiciary in the House of Representatives, that it should be referred to the same committee of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee object to that reference?

Mr. COOPER. Not at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be referred to that committee.

The bill (H. R. No. 3166) to correct the date of commission of certain officers of the Army was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BOGY. I hope that bill will be ordered to lie on the table. The same subject has been reported upon by our committee, and the object is to take up this bill when the Calendar is called and the Senate bill is reached and substitute it in place of the Senate bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will lie on the table.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. BOREMAN, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Sarah A. Monroe be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CONKLING. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at five o'clock and five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, May 11, 1874.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of Saturday last was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This being Monday, the first business in order during the morning hour is the calling of the States and Territories for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions for reference to their appropriate committees, not to be brought back into the House by motions to reconsider. Under this call memorials and resolutions of States and territorial Legislatures may be presented for printing and reference. The morning hour now begins at eight minutes past eleven o'clock.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE.

W. F. MATHEWS.

Mr. LOWNDES also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3291) for the relief of W. F. Mathews, late a captain in Company F, Thirteenth Regiment Maryland Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

SARAH B. HOWE AND MARY CRANSTON.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia, introduced a bill (H. R. No 3292) granting pensions to Mrs. Sarah B. Howe and Mrs. Mary Cranston; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

DUTY ON PEASE.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia, also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3293) repealing so much of the act of June 6, 1872, as imposes a duty on pease imported for agricultural purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

THE NAVAL SERVICE.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia, also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3294) relating to the naval service; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

LICENSE LAW.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3295) to so modify the license law as not to require a new license upon the change of name of a firm by death or the addition of names; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

HIRAM B. RIDDLE.

Mr. VANCE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3296) for the relief of Hiram B. Riddle, private in Company C, Second Regiment North Carolina Mounted Infantry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

HENRY SMITH AND OTHERS.

Mr. VANCE also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3297) for the relief of Henry Smith, Charlotte Smith, and others, of the Eastern or North Carolina Cherokees; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

DIRECT TAXES.

Mr. SLOAN introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3298) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption and sale of lands held by the United States under the several acts levying direct taxes, and for other purposes;" which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

COURT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. SLOAN also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3299) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act to establish a court for the investigation of claims against the United States," approved February 24, 1855; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

COMMERCE BETWEEN THE STATES.

Mr. SHEATS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3300) to promote commerce between the several States, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

MILTON KENNEDY.

Mr. BUNDY introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3301) for the payment of $800 to Milton Kennedy, for night services of the steamboat Piketon; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM E. DOYLE.

Mr. ORTH introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 97) for the relief of William E. Doyle, of Indiana; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ME-SHIN-GO-ME-SIA.

Mr. TYNER introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3302) supplemental to an act entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to make a partition of a reservation to Me-shin-go-me-sia, a Miami Indian," approved June 1, 1872; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ADDITIONAL BOUNTY.

Mr. HOLMAN introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3303) to extend the time for filing claims for additional bounty under the act of July 28, 1866; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

GENERAL WILLIAM THOMPSON.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3304) for the relief of the legal representatives of Brigadier-General William Thompson; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committtee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

PRESIDENTIAL TERM.

Mr. MORRISON introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 98) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States to fix the term of the presidential office at six years, and to make the President ineligible for more than six years in any term of twelve years after the next presidential election; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

MARY A. ALLEN.

Mr. FORT introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3305) to grant a pension to Mary A. Allen, widow of George B. Allen, late of Company G, of the Fourth Michigan Calvary; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC LANDS IN MISSOURI.

Mr. BLAND introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3306) granting to the State of Missouri all public lands therein situated for public school purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN B. TOY.

Mr. COTTON introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3307) granting a pension to John B. Toy; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

NEVADA COUNTY RAILROAD, CALIFORNIA.

Mr. PAGE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3309) granting to the Nevada County Narrow-gauge Railroad Company the right of way through the public lands for a railroad; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. PAGE. I move that this bill be referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

Mr. CLYMER. That bill ought to go to the Committee on the Public Lands. We have all the bills of that kind.

The SPEAKER. Bills of this character ordinarily go to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. PAGE. Very well; let it go to that committee.

The bill was accordingly referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

WAHSATCH AND JORDAN VALLEY RAILROAD.

Mr. HOUGHTON introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3308) granting to the Wahsatch and Jordan Valley Railroad Company the right of way through the public lands, for the construction of a railroad and telegraph; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. HOUGHTON. I move that this bill be referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

Mr. CLYMER. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. HOUGHTON. This bill has already been considered and agreed to by the Committee on the Pacific Railroad under a previous reference.

Mr. CLYMER. All bills of that kind have heretofore gone to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. HOUGHTON] states that this bill is already before the Committee on the Pacific Railroad. The salient feature of the bill is the right of way through the public lands, which naturally belongs to the Committee on the Public Lands. The mere organization of the company of course means but very little; the principal feature of the bill is the right of way through the public lands.

Mr. HOUGHTON. It is already before the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and has been considered and agreed to by that committee.

The SPEAKER. It is for the House to determine to which committee this bill shall be referred. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLYMER] moves to amend the motion of the gentleman from California [Mr. HOUGHTON] so as to substitute the Committee on the Public Lands for the Committee on the Pacific Railroad. The question is upon the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to, and the motion, as amended, was adopted; and accordingly the bill was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

SUSCOL TRACT, CALIFORNIA.

Mr. LUTTRELL introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3310) for the relief of the settlers on the Suscol tract of land in Solano County, California; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

JONATHAN WHITE.

Mr. DUNNELL introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3311) for the relief of Jonathan White; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

AUGUSTIN OLVARA.

Mr. AVERILL introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3312) for the relief of Augustin Olvara; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed.

PATENTS FOR LANDS IN OREGON.

Mr. NESMITH introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3313) to authorize the issuance of patents for lands granted to the State of Oregon in certain cases; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

GENERAL B. S. ROBERTS.

Mr. NESMITH also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3314) to correct the order retiring Brevet Brigadier-General B. S. Roberts, and to retire him a colonel of cavalry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN FLETCHER.

Mr. PHILLIPS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3315) for the relief of John Fletcher; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

SURVEY OF RIVERS IN WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. HEREFORD introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3316) making appropriation for survey of certain rivers in the State of West Virginia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

HEIRS OF CERAN ST. VRAIN.

Mr. ELKINS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3317) for the relief of the heirs of Ceran St. Vrain; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

PAYMENT FOR INDIAN DEPREDATIONS.

Mr. ELKINS also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3318) authorizing payment to certain citizens of New Mexico for Indian depredations; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

LAND DISTRICT IN WYOMING.

Mr. STEELE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3319) to establish a new land district in the Territory of Wyoming; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

ELECTION OF TERRITORIAL OFFICERS.

Mr. STEELE also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3320) to enable the people of the Territories to elect their governors and all other territorial officers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Territories, and ordered to be printed.

GEORGE H. PLANT.

Mr. CHIPMAN introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3321) for the relief of George H. Plant, surety for Robert Clarke, formerly pension agent for the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

COMPROMISES IN INTERNAL-REVENUE CASES.

Mr. BECK introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3322) to authorize the Commissioner of Internal Revenue by summary proceedings to compromise cases arising under the internal-revenue laws in which penalties and forfeitures may have been incurred without fraudulent intent; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN P. DAVIS.

Mr. SMALL introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3323) granting a pension to John P. Davis, sergeant Company H, Twelfth New Hampshire Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. WELLS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3324) making additions to the fifteenth section of the act approved July 2, 1864, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes,' approved July 1, 1862;" which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and ordered to be printed.

DISTRICT COURT IN TEXAS.

Mr. McLEAN introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3325) providing for holding a term of the United States district court at Dallas, in the State of Texas; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The States and Territories having been called through for bills on leave and joint resolutions, they will now be called for resolutions. The call rests at the State of North Carolina.

ELECTION OF INTERNAL-REVENUE OFFICERS.

Mr. ROBBINS submitted the following resolution; which he moved be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and on that motion demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the House of Representatives of the United States of America, that supervisors and collectors of internal revenue ought to be elected by the people of their respective districts.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

WESTERN JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF TEXAS.

Mr. ASHE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3326) prescribing the times and places of holding courts in the western judicial district of Texas, on which he demanded the previous question.

The bill was read a first and second time.

The first section provides that the courts in the western judicial district, Texas, shall be held at Tyler, Waco, and Austin, as follows: At Tyler on the first Mondays in March and October, and may continue in session four weeks; at Waco the first Mondays in May and December, and continue in session four weeks; at Austin the first Mondays in January and June, and continue in session until the business may be disposed of.

The second section provides that all process issued against defendants residing in Milam, Robertson, Leon, Freestone, Livingston, Navarro, Falls, Hill, Bell, McLennan, Bosque, Erath, Comanche, Eastland, Palo Pinto, Parker, Hood, Johnson, Ellis, Cooke, Wise, Moulogue, and Jack be returned to Waco.

The third section provides that the action take effect from its passage.

Mr. MILLS. Is it in order to make some remarks on that bill?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Has this been considered by any committee?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It has not.

Mr. MILLS. One of my colleagues is opposed to it.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 26, noes 54.

So the House refused to second the demand for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WILLARD] rises to debate the bill, and it goes over under the rules.

Mr. MILLS. Let it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot ask unanimous consent for anything during the morning hour on Monday. It may be referred after the morning hour by unanimous consent.

OOSTANAULA RIVER.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3327) to provide for the improvement of the Oostanaula River, in the State of Georgia, on which he demanded the previous question.

The bill was read a first and second time. It appropriates the sum of $10,000 for the improvement of the Oostanaula River, in the State of Georgia.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 37, noes 20; no quorum voting.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia, demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The SPEAKER appointed Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont, and Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia, as tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 94, noes 56.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I demand the yeas and nays on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 135, nays 52, not voting 103; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Beck, Bell, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bradley, Bright, Brown, Buckner, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Roderick R. Butler, Caldwell, Cannon, John B. Clark, jr., Clements, Clymer, Coburn, Conger, Cook, Cox, Crittenden, Crocker, Crossland, Crounse, Darrall, DeWitt, Donnan, Dunnell, Durham, Eames, Eldredge, Farwell, Fort, Freeman, Frye, Giddings, Glover, Gooch, Gunckel, Hagans, Robert S. Hale, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Harrison, Hatcher, Havens, Joseph R. Hawley, Hays, Gerry W. Hazelton, John W. Hazelton, Hereford, E. Ward, Wheeler, Whitehouse, Wilber, John M. S. Williams, William Williams, Jeremiah M. Wilson, and Woodford—103.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The House resumes the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill, which comes over from Saturday with the previous question operating upon it. But before proceeding with that order the Chair will entertain motions for reference of bills by unanimous consent.

THOMAS F. YOUNG.

Mr. COX, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3328) for the relief of Thomas F. Young, of New York, assignee of Byam K. Stevens; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

MISSISSIPPI CONGRESSIONAL ELECTION.

Mr. LYNCH, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3332) to fix the time for the election of Representatives in the Forty-fourth Congress from the State of Mississippi; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Elections, and ordered to be printed.

MARY F. MONCRIEFF.

Mr. ALBRIGHT, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3329) granting a pension to Mary F. Moncrieff, widow of George F. Moncrieff, late quartermaster-sergeant Fifth United States Artillery; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

EXECUTION OF TRUSTS IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. CHIPMAN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3330) in relation to the execution of trusts in the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referrrd to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

SOUTH CAROLINA TAX-PAYERS' MEMORIAL.

Mr. POTTER. I submit the views of a minority of the Committee on the Judiciary, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WARD] and myself, in relation to the memorial of the tax-payers' convention of South Carolina, and ask that they be printed, and also that they be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The views of the majority and also of a minority of the committee have already been printed.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The report is as follows:

Mr. POTTER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following as the views of a minority:

The undersigned, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the memorial of the tax-payers' convention of South Carolina, asking for relief against the alleged misgovernment in that State, dissent from the report of the committee thereon, and join in the recommendation that a commission of investigation should be appointed, for the following reasons:

Whatever may be the condition of public affairs in South Carolina, we are not prepared to say that the Federal Government has now any authority to interfere with the government of any State where popular suffrage prevails, even if such government result in general plunder by taxation, under the form of law, of one class of the population by the other.

At the same time, the condition in South Carolina is doubtless most deplorable; a State in which one-third of the farms in one section were sold for taxes in a single year, in which in the principal city the taxation of the improved real estate equaled the whole revenue from it, and in which private bills are openly passed by the Legislature for bribes—none of which allegations before the committee do we understand to be controverted; although a republican government in form, is none the less a government not worthy to be preserved.

The Constitution of the United States provides for its own amendment. Its framers did not foresee the steamboat, the railway, and the telegraph, and the consequent physical changes in the country; but they did at least foresee that the States might in time become a great nation, and that the provisions of the Constitution, required by small, sparse, and poor communities, would then need to be changed to properly adapt the same principles of government to the growth and changes of the people.

If the condition of things in the South be owing to the late constitutional amendment forbidding any restriction in suffrage on account of race or color, it may be, we do not say that it will be, found that some further amendments looking to educational or other qualifications for Federal suffrage are necessary.

At any rate, distress and abuses prevail over so large an area and in such a degree throughout the South as seems to us to warrant the investigation recommended by the minority of the committee with a view of ascertaining whether there be any great and prevalent evil which can be cured by any legislation now or that may hereafter be properly brought within the power of Congress.

CLARKSON N. POTTER.
J. D. WARD.

FORT GRATIOT MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. CONGER. I ask unanimous consent to introduce for present consideration a bill authorizing the Secretary of War to grant a right of way across a corner of the Fort Gratiot military reservation to the city railroad company.

The bill was read.

Mr. SPEER. I must object to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. CONGER. I have here the letter of the Secretary of War giving his consent to this bill, which cuts off but a little corner to make a curve where otherwise a turn-table would be laid around the military reservation. The road has already been laid and is within a quarter of a mile from the post. It only cuts off a little corner of fifteen feet.

Mr. SPEER. The bill had better go to a committee.

Mr. RANDALL. I understand that it is before the Military Committee now.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that the letter of the Secretary of War may be read.

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

Mr. CONGER. I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order, because the House on Saturday ordered the previous question on the third reading and engrossment of the Indian appropriation bill, and that bill is now before the House as unfinished business.

Mr. CONGER. There ought to be some times when gentlemen should be allowed to ask action on bills such as I have submitted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks there will be plenty of time for that purpose to-day.

ALIZARINE.

Mr. PIERCE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3331) to place alizarine on the free list; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

J. B. HERIMON.

Mr. ELDREDGE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3337) granting a pension to J. B. Herimon; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill, which comes over from Saturday as unfinished business. The question at the adjournment on Saturday was on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. HANCOCK,] on which the House was dividing.

The amendment was as follows:

Amend by inserting after line 1053, on page 44, the following:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed and required, in paying out the several foregoing annuities, to pay to the Prairie tribe of said Pottawatomies that proportion of money which they are and were entitled to under the terms and stipulations of said several treaties and the settlement and agreement had and entered into by and between said Prairie band and the Citizens band of said Pottawatomies, entered into on the 18th of July, 1872; and the accounts of said bands shall be so adjusted as to give effect to said agreement.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to say, that after examining that amendment they are willing that it should be adopted, if that can be done now by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. If no gentleman objects the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. GARFIELD. The committee do not call for a separate vote upon it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BECK. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Is it in order at any time while this bill is pending, as the regular order, to move to suspend the rules and take up anything else?

The SPEAKER. It is not, because the previous question has been operating and is partially executed. This order takes precedence of all other business until disposed of.

Mr. BECK. I demand a separate vote on the amendment striking out a portion of section 2 of the bill.

Section 2 of the bill was as follows:

SEC. 2. That the sum of $15,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary to pay the expenses of the commission of citizens serving without compensation appointed by the President under the provisions of the fourth section of the act of April 10, 1869, is hereby appropriated; and said board of Indian commissioners is hereby continued, with all the powers and duties conferred and imposed by existing laws. These powers and duties shall not be construed as compelling said board, or any member thereof, to examine and pass upon the accounts and vouchers of the Indian Bureau, if said board shall not deem such examination necessary. And all such examinations and duties shall hereafter be performed in the city of Washington, except that when said board shall deem it necessary, for the more prompt examination of said vouchers, they may direct their executive committee to hold its sessions for such purpose in the cities of Philadelphia or New York. But nothing herein provided shall be construed to supersede or interfere with the duty heretofore imposed upon said board of commissioners to visit Indian agencies and inspect the vouchers, books, and papers thereof.

The amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole was to strike out the following words:

These powers and duties shall not be construed as compelling said board, or any member thereof, to examine and pass upon the accounts and vouchers of the Indian Bureau, if said board shall not deem such examination necessary.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to, ayes 74, noes not counted.

The other amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union were then agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. BECK. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, only 19 members voting therefor.

The bill was then passed.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

THREE PER CENT. LOAN CERTIFICATES.

The SPEAKER. The next business in order which comes over from Monday last is the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3164) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870, and to provide for a more equitable distribution of the national-bank currency. The Chair has this moment received a dispatch from the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] who offered the bill, who telegraphs that he is in Philadelphia, too ill to return to-day; and he desires that the House will consent that the bill shall go over on the same conditions until Monday next.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. WHEELER. I desire to report back from the Committee on Appropriations the river and harbor bill, and I wish to say by way of explanation that there are several written amendments attached to the printed bill, for this reason: they provide for surveys which had been agreed upon by the Committee on Commerce, but had not been definitely defined. The Committee on Appropriations have made no change whatever in the bill, and if the House will indulge me for a moment I desire to make a statement in connection with it, and the public business generally.

Mr. O'NEILL. I wish to ask if it will be in order for me to say a few words in reply to what the gentleman from New York says. I understand he is going to follow his remarks by a motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill, which appropriates $4,500,000, without any discussion in the House.

Mr. RANDALL. And without the opportunity to offer amendments.

Mr. O'NEILL. Yes; and without the opportunity to offer amendments. I desire to have an opportunity to reply to the gentleman from New York, and unless I can have that opportunity I shall refuse to give unanimous consent for him to go on with his remarks.

Mr. WHEELER. I have no objection to the gentleman replying to what I may say. I ask permission to make a statement in relation to the bill.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. Let the gentleman from Pennsylvania be allowed the same time that the gentleman from New York occupies.

Mr. WHEELER. I am perfectly willing that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, or any other gentleman, shall have as much time as I occupy.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to that arrangement.

Mr. WHEELER. I want for a moment to call the attention of the House to the condition of the public business. Congress has now been in session about six months.

Mr. BECK. Were all points of order reserved on the bill? If not, I desire to reserve them until I can here it read.

The SPEAKER. The bill has not yet been read, and points of order will be in time.

Mr. BECK. I desire to know what the pending motion is?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has not yet stated it.

Mr. BECK. Then I object to debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is asking consent to make a statement respecting the public business.

Mr. RANDALL. Let us hear his motion first, and then perhaps his remarks will be in order,

Mr. WHEELER. I will be perfectly frank. I desire to make an explanation that will occupy about two minutes in relation to the bill, and then I shall ask that it be read, and shall test the sense of the House upon a motion for passing it under a suspension of the rules.

Mr. RANDALL. Let us have the motion first, and then we will hear the explanation.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a point of order. Was not unanimous consent given to the gentleman from New York to make a statement?

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood that no objection was interposed to allowing the gentleman from New York to occupy two minutes on condition that the gentleman from Pennsylvania should have the same time.

Mr. HOLMAN. The Chair so announced.

Mr. RANDALL. But there is nothing before the House.

The SPEAKER. Unanimous consent was given that the gentleman might make his statement.

Mr. WHEELER. What is the decision of the Chair?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has liberty to make a statement.

Mr. WHEELER. I said that Congress had now been in session about six months, and during that time one only of the twelve regular appropriation bills has become a law, the fortification bill. The Army and Navy appropriation bills, upon amendments made by the Senate, are still pending between the two Houses. The legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, upon which the House spent some three weeks, is now in the Senate, as yet without action by that body. The Indian appropriation bill we have finished this morning. There remain for our consideration yet seven of the regular appropriation bills, to wit: the Military Academy bill, the deficiency bill, the post-office bill, the consular and diplomatic bill, the pensions bills, the sundry civil bill, and the river and harbor bill. In the mean time we are in the sweltering heat of summer, so fraught with discomfort, debility, and sickness.

Mr. BECK. Would it not be in order to move to suspend the rules and put them all through at once?

Mr. WHEELER. I believe a motion to suspend the rules is not amendable. I thought that under the circumstances the House might take a short cut with the river and harbor bill. This bill has been most carefully prepared by the Committee on Commerce, and has been as carefully revised by the Committee on Appropriations. Last year a corresponding bill appropriated $6,102,900. This bill appropriates $4,500,000. In its preparation both of your committees have kept carefully in mind the economy which was initiated by the House in its resolution asking the Secretary of the Treasury to revise his estimates, and which has so far characterized the action of the House upon every appropriation bill which it has so far passed.

While the Committee on Commerce would gladly have given more to the improvement and development of the revenues of the commerce of the country, they have been controlled in all cases by the condition of the Treasury, recognizing its straitened circumstances. This bill makes provision for no single new work. We have not thought that the condition of the Treasury would warrant any new undertaking. Not in a single instance have the revised estimates of the Engineer-in-Chief been exceeded; we have kept below his estimates in the majority of cases.

Now, with this statement, and reminding the House that this bill as originally estimated for called for $15,000,000, that last year $6,000,000 was appropriated for this purpose, and that this year we propose to give but $4,500,000, which we have distributed as equitably as we know how to do, and asking the House to legislate in the spirit of economy which has so far governed it, I move that the bill be read, and the rules suspended, so that it be now passed.

Mr. O'NEILL. I will detain the House but a few moments. I do not recollect, in the course of some years' experience here, when a bill of this magnitude, proposing to appropriate so large a sum of money, was attempted to be hurried through in this way, excepting on one occasion. I recollect that occasion very well; it was toward the end of a session. I fear we are not even now within six weeks of the end of this session. That was within three or four days of the time of the final adjournment, and then the river and harbor bill was brought before the House and put through by what the gentleman calls a short cut. It was then absolutely necessary or the bill would have failed.

I stand here in favor of proper economy, desiring the Committee on Appropriations, of which I have the honor to be a member, to stand up in the same interest and not to act hastily, but to let the country see and examine this bill. Let it be thoroughly discussed so that we may know whether we are appropriating too much or too little for certain works in certain localities. I am not of the opinion that we will be doing justice to the country by hurrying through at this time a bill of this magnitude. I have always been in favor of proper appropriations for rivers and harbors, and will always vote for such sums as may be necessary for the improvement of the channels of trade and commerce, but I am opposed to this manner of proceeding. I want time for proper consideration and discussion.

The Committee on Appropriations have examined with great care every money bill that has been referred to them. I have no doubt the Committee on Commerce have examined this bill thoroughly. But neither the Committee on Commerce nor the Committee on Appropriations constitute the House of Representatives. Neither of those committees, nor both of them, can take the place of the people. We are here to represent the people and to guard their interests. I, for one, am anxious to have this bill considered line by line and paragraph by paragraph. It is all very nice for the convenience of some gentlemen to hurry through a bill of this kind in this way; but it is very unpleasant for those from localities that may not have been heard, or if heard before the Committee on Appropriations may want to move an amendment in the House, either to cut down or to increase an appropriation for some river or harbor. I am speaking for all localities and for the opportunity that should be given to each member, should he see fit to do so, to amend and discuss and not to be forced to vote in such suddenness for the many sections in this bill. Every one should be heard, and we should go into Committee of the Whole, where so many millions are involved as we find in this legislation now presented by the chairman of the Committee on Commerce.

From the beginning of the session until now I have stood by the Committee on Appropriations endeavoring, if I could in any way, to economize expenditures. I am utterly amazed to-day to find what is advised by that committee and the Committee on Commerce. We are certainly not within six weeks of the end of the session, and yet those committees come in here and press upon you, upon the plea of hurry, want of time, warm weather, perhaps an unhealthy season approaching, to pass this large money bill without consideration. I can say to these gentlemen that for one I never felt better in my life, and I hope to continue so during the warm weather. I never felt more able to consider the legislation of the country; and I am willing to sit here until we can consider it properly. But I cannot see this bill proceeded with without protesting against this action of the Committee on Appropriations, backed up by the Committee on Commerce. It is a new thing to urge so important a bill through in such haste. I hope the House will not sustain the motion to pass it by a suspension of the rules. Harm may come if that is done, but no harm can come if we digest the bill, carefully examine it, and vote upon it section by section and item by item, as has always been done, I believe, except in one instance.

We have heard a great deal of economy all the winter past from the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, [Mr. GARFIELD,] and the chairman of the Committee on Commerce [Mr. WHEELER] has joined with him in that. But I say to-day it is no evidence of economy if this House is called upon in half an hour to pass a bill appropriating $4,500,000. I care not whether the estimates called for $13,000,000 or $15,000,000, or whether these committees have cut them down more than half. That is not the question. There is a principle involved here, whether the people shall be heard upon this floor, through their Representatives, as to the propriety of appropriating this much or less to any given points in the country. I hope the motion to suspend the rules will be voted down.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The Clerk read the bill.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WHEELER] is that the rules be suspended and that the bill, as just read, be passed.

The motion was seconded.

Mr. RANDALL and Mr. BECK called for the yeas and nays on suspending the rules.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, there were ayes 32, noes not counted.

Mr. WHEELER called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WHEELER and Mr. RANDALL were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported ayes 42, noes not counted.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 167, nays 58, not voting 65; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Albert, Arthur, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Bass, Bell, Bradley, Bromberg, Buckner, Buffinton, Bundy, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Cason, John B. Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Clements, Stephen A. Robinson, Scofield, Sessions, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloss, Smart, H. Boardman Smith, William A. Smith, Snyder, Standiford, Stephens, St. John, Storm, Stowell, Strawbridge, Sypher, Charles R. Thomas, Tremain, Tyner, Wallace, Jasper D. Ward, Whitehouse, Wilber, John M. S. Williams, and Wilshire—65.

So (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the bill was passed.

CLERICAL FORCE OF GENERAL LAND OFFICE.

Mr. TOWNSEND. In pursuance of the notice which I gave on Monday last, I move to suspend the rules to enable me to report from the Committee on Public Lands, and the House to pass at this time, the bill (H. R. No. 1060) to reorganize the clerical force of the General Land Office.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That from and after the 1st day of July, 1874, the clerical force of the General Land Office shall be as follows: One chief clerk, at an annual salary of $2,600; nine clerks in charge of divisions, at an annual salary of $2,400 each; eleven clerks of class five, as assistants to such heads of divisions, at an annual salary of $2,000 each; ten clerks of class four, at an annual salary of $1,800 each; forty clerks of class three, at an annual salary of $1,600 each; forty clerks of class two, at an annual salary of $1,400 each; fifty clerks of class one, at an annual salary of $1,200 each. In addition to the foregoing there shall be appointed one chief messenger, at an annual salary of $1,000; five messengers at an annual salary of $840 each; eight laborers at an annual salary of $720 each; and two packers, at an annual salary of $840 each.

SEC. 2. That the offices of principal clerk of public lands, principal clerk of private land claims, and principal clerk of surveys be, and the same are hereby, abolished; and that sections 2, 3, and 8 of the act approved July 4, 1836, entitled "An act to reorganize the General Land Office," are hereby repealed.

SEC. 3. That during any temporary vacancy in the office of recorder of the General Land Office, or in case of the sickness or absence of the recorder, the duties of his office shall be performed by a clerk of the said Bureau, to be designated by the President of the United States.

SEC. 4. That from and after the 1st day of July, 1874, the recorder of the General Land Office shall receive a salary of $2,400 per annum.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I understand that this is the same bill which was reported on a former occasion, and which increases salaries in the Land Office to the extent of $30,000. It appears to me that such a bill ought not to pass without some consideration.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The business of the General Land Office has doubled within the last ten years, and——

Mr. BECK. I object to debate.

Mr. HOLMAN. As the bill proposes a large increase of salaries, I trust that some discussion will be had upon it.

Mr. BECK. I object to taking up and passing important bills in this way; the river and harbor bill, and all others.

The question being taken on seconding the motion to suspend the rules, there were—ayes 69, noes 79.

So the motion to suspend the rules was not seconded.

JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS IN UTAH.

Mr. POLAND. I ask that the bill of the Judiciary Committee in regard to judicial proceedings in Utah may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COX. I object.

Mr. POLAND. I move, then, to suspend the rules to make the order I have stated.

The question being on seconding the motion to suspend the rules,

The SPEAKER ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. POLAND and Mr. COX.

Mr. POLAND. I think there is some misapprehension in relation to my motion. Some gentlemen understand that I want to bring the bill up for consideration now; that is not so.

The SPEAKER. As the Chair understands, the proposition is that the bill when reported shall be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GARFIELD. Has the committee the right to report at any time?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. COX. I make objection to the motion because I am informed there ought to be allowed at least ten days or two weeks for certain proceedings to reach here before the bill is taken up.

Mr. POLAND. I shall not be in a hurry about bringing the bill forward.

Mr. COX. If this motion be agreed to, the gentleman will have the power to bring it forward at any time.

Mr. POLAND. I shall not press the matter unduly.

The House divided on seconding the motion to suspend the rules; and there were—ayes 109, noes 40.

So the motion was seconded.

The question being then taken on the motion to suspend the rules, there were—ayes 91; noes 46.

Mr. POLAND. I call for tellers.

The SPEAKER. Tellers will be ordered. The gentleman from Vermont, Mr. POLAND, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. SPEER, are appointed. The Chair will remark that he thinks the country is entitled to have one-half of the House vote on an important question. The difficulty has been this morning to get one-half the House to vote.

The House divided; and the tellers reported ayes 101, noes not counted.

So (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the motion was agreed to; and the order was accordingly made.

TAXATION OF LANDS GRANTED TO RAILROADS.

Mr. CROUNSE. I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of passing the bill (H. R. No. 3281) to amend the act entitled "An act to amend an act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 2, 1864. I will say, while the title does not convey the purpose of the bill clearly, that it is to provide for the taxation of lands given in aid of the Union Pacific Railroad the same as other lands in Nebraska and other States and Territories.

The bill, which was read, provides that section 21 of the act to amend the act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 2, 1864, be amended by adding thereto the following:

Provided, however, That the neglect of any such company or parties in interest to pay the costs of such survey, selecting, and conveying, as herein provided, and take the patents therefor, shall not prevent the legal title vesting in said company or party in interest, subject to the payment of such costs; and all lands so earned, and to which said company or party in interest shall be entitled, in accordance with the provisions of this act, or of the act of which this is amendatory, shall be subject to all legal taxes imposed under authority of any State or Territory in which such lands are located, from the time such company or party in interest shall have been or may be entitled to a conveyance thereof, the same as though no costs or fees had been imposed by the provisions of this section; and upon the sale of any of such lands for taxes so assessed which may be found delinquent, the purchaser thereof shall pay to the proper officer all costs due thereon as herein provided, and thereupon letters-patent shall issue to such company conveying said lands, subject to the legal rights and title of the tax-sale purchaser; and that it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of the General Land Office to prepare and deliver, without delay, patents for all lands applied for by any company, as aforesaid, where the same are clearly within the grant and free from conflicting claims, and all legal fees and charges have been paid by said company; that if any company shall fail to pay the proper costs or fees required by law, and to select for patent the lands pertaining to its grant within such period as to enable the local authorities to assess said lands, lists of the same shall be furnished to the governor of any State or Territory, upon application to the Commissioner of the General Land Office and payment of the cost of preparing the same; said lists to be duly certified by the Commissioner and approved by the Secretary of the Interior, under seal of their respective offices.

Mr. CROUNSE. I will say further, Mr. Speaker, that this bill comes unanimously reported from the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. BRADLEY. The Committee on the Public Lands instructed me unanimously to report this bill back with the recommendation that it do pass.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House second the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let me ask a question, whether the effect of the passage of this bill may not be to confirm to these companies grants heretofore made and which may have been forfeited by failure to comply with the terms of the grant?

Mr. CROUNSE. The committee were solicitous to guard that point, and I think it is carefully guarded. It leaves the parties with their rights just as they are excepted, subjecting these lands to taxation.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the gentleman will allow me I will move an amendment. I move to add the following:

Provided, however, That nothing in this act shall be construed to relieve any railroad from the effect of any forfeiture heretofore suffered or incurred.

Mr. BRADLEY. I do not see any objection to that amendment.

Mr. CROUNSE. I am willing to modify my motion to suspend the rules, and include also the gentleman's amendment.

The motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

The rules were suspended; and the bill, with Mr. HOLMAN's amendment, was passed.

CIVIL WAR IN ARKANSAS.

Mr. NUNN, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 99) for the suppression of civil war in the State of Arkansas; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. NUNN. I ask that the resolution be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the civil authority of the State of Arkansas is annulled by the acts of persons claiming to be governor of that State and their adherents; and whereas it is the duty of the United States Government to protect each one of the States against domestic violence and civil war: Therefore,

Be it resolved, &c., That the President of the United States be authorized to appoint a provisional governor of the State of Arkansas, who shall forthwith proceed to assume the duties of governor of said State, and shall discharge such duties until the questions of fact and law can be decided by the proper judicial tribunal as to who is the legal governor of said State.

The joint resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

LAKE SUPERIOR AND PUGET SOUND RAILROAD.

Mr. AVERILL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3333) amendatory of and supplementary to an act entitled "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Lake Superior to Puget Sound, on the Pacific Coast, by the northern route," approved July 2, 1864, and acts and resolutions additional thereto and amendatory thereof; which was read a first and second time and, with the memorial, referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and ordered to be printed.

"THE DYING INDIAN."

Mr. COX, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Library, and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library be requested to introduce a joint resolution requiring the removal of the statue known as "The Dying Indian" to the Statuary Hall of the House of Representatives; the change to be made under the direction of Preston Powers, sculptor, and at his request without expense.

INUNDATION IN ALABAMA.

Mr. WHITE, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 100) authorizing the President of the United States to cause to be issued Army rations, forage, and disused Army clothing to the suffering people in danger of starvation in the inundated districts of the Alabama, Tombigbee, and Tennessee Rivers, in the State of Alabama; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WHITE. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Appropriations have leave to report at any time.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

COMMITTEE INVESTIGATION.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, referred to the Committee on the Rules, and ordered to be printed.

Whereas the best interests of the country require that the standing committees of the House that are in such great measure responsible for legislation have the clearest light possible, the greatest facilities practicable, and the amplest authority over all matters referred to them; that the rapidly growing interests of the Government in all its departments may be admonished of the power to investigate without the notice consequent upon a debate in the House; and that committees may exercise the power in matters necessary to them, but not justifying the excitement resulting from an order to investigate: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Rules be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending our standing rules that each standing committee of the House have the power to send for persons and papers without an order of the House.

SARAH E. PORTER.

Mr. FIELD, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3334) granting a pension to Sarah E. Porter, of Detroit, Michigan; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

TAX ON INCOMES.

Mr. FORT. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the following resolution be adopted:

Resolved, That if it shall be found to be necessary to increase taxation for any purpose, such increase should commence by taxing persons and corporations upon their annual incomes, dividends, and salaries.

The question being taken on seconding the motion to suspend the rules, there were—ayes 53, noes 61; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered under the rule; and Mr. WOOD and Mr. FORT were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 81, noes 70.

So the motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

The question recurred on suspending the rules and adopting the resolution.

Mr. FORT, and Mr. BUTLER of Massachusetts, called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 137, nays 64, not voting 89; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albright, Ashe, Atkins, Bell, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bradley, Bright, Brown, Buckner, Bundy, Burchard, Burrows, Roderick R. Butler, Caldwell, Cannon, Cason, John B. Clark, jr., Clements, Clymer, Clinton L. Cobb, Stephen A. Cobb, Comingo, Conger, Corwin, Crittenden, Crooke, Crossland, Crutchfield, Darrall, Donnan, Dunnell, Eden, Eldredge, Field, Fort, Foster, Freeman, Frye, Garfield, Giddings, Glover, Hagans, Eugene Hale, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hatcher, Havens, John B. Hawley, Hays, Gerry W. Hazelton, Hendee, Hereford, Hodges, Holman, Hunter, Hurlbut, Hyde, Knapp, Lawrence, Leach, Loughridge, Lowe, Luttrell, McCrary, Alexander S. McDill, James W. McDill, McJunkin, McKee, McLean, McNulta, Merriam, Milliken, Mills, Monroe, Moore, Morrison, Neal, Nesmith, Niblack, Nunn, Orr, Orth, Packard, Page, Hosea W. Parker, Isaac C. Parker, Pelham, Perry, Phelps, Phillips, Pike, James H. Platt, jr., Pratt, Purman, Rapier, Ray, Read, Robbins, James W. Robinson, Rusk, Henry B. Sayler, Sener, Shanks, Sheats, Sheldon, Sherwood, Sloan, Small, George L. Smith, J. Ambler Smith, John Q. Smith, Southard, Sprague, Stanard, Stone, Strait, Christopher Y. Thomas, Thornburgh, Tyner, Vance, White, Whitehead, Whiteley, Whitthorne, Charles W. Willard, Charles G. Williams, William Williams, William B. Williams, Willie, James Wilson, Wolfe, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—137.

NAYS—Messrs. Albert, Arthur, Barber, Bass, Bromberg, Buffinton, Burleigh, Cessna, Freeman Clarke, Cook, Cotton, Cox, Davis, DeWitt, Duell, Eames, Farwell, Gooch, Gunckel, Robert S. Hale, Harrison, Joseph R. Hawley, John W. Hazelton, E. Rockwood Hoar, Hooper, Hoskins, Houghton, Kellogg, Lamport, Lansing, Lawson, Lowndes, Lynch, MacDougall, Mitchell, O'Brien, O'Neill, Packer, Parsons, Pendleton, Pierce, Thomas C. Platt, Poland, Potter, Rice, Richmond, Ellis H. Roberts, Sawyer, Scofield, Henry J. Scudder, Isaac W. Scudder, A. Herr Smith, Speer, Starkweather, Taylor, Townsend, Waldron, Walls, Marcus L. Ward, Wheeler, George Willard, Wood, and Woodworth—64.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Averill, Banning, Barnum, Barrere, Barry, Beck, Begole, Biery, Benjamin F. Butler, Cain, Amos Clark, jr., Clayton, Coburn, Creamer, Crocker, Crounse, Curtis, Danford, Dawes, Dobbins, Durham, Elliott, Hamilton, Harmer, Benjamin W. Harris, Hathorn, Herndon, Hersey, George F. Hoar, Howe, Hubbell, Hunton, Hynes, Jewett, Kasson, Kelley, Kendall, Killinger, Lamar, Lamison, Lewis, Lofland, Magee, Marshall, Martin, Maynard, Mellish, Morey, Myers, Negley, Niles, Rainey, Randall, Ransier, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Ross, Milton Sayler, John G. Schumaker, Sessions, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloss, Smart, H. Boardman Smith, William A. Smith, Snyder, Standiford, Stephens, St. John, Storm, Stowell, Strawbridge, Swann, Sypher, Charles R. Thomas, Todd, Tremain, Waddell, Wallace, Jasper D. Ward, Wells, Whitehouse, Wilber, John M. S. Williams, Wilshire, Ephraim K. Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, and Woodford—89.

So the rules were suspended, (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof,) and the resolution was adopted.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. ORR] to move a suspension of the rules.

Mr. GARFIELD. Pending that, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question being taken on the motion that the House adjourn, there were—ayes 94, noes 73.

Mr. ORR and Mr. RANDALL called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. RANDALL. Let us see where the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations is. Why does he not go on with his deficiency bill?

Mr. GARFIELD. I have been trying to have an appropriation bill brought up all morning.

The SPEAKER. The Chair told the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] that he was under promise to the gentlemen from Iowa [Mr. ORR] to recognize him for a motion to suspend the rules, and that the Chair would recognize the gentleman from Ohio next. If the gentleman from Ohio, when the Chair has intimated that he will recognize him immediately afterward, considers it a proper dispatch of the public business to move that the House shall adjourn, the Chair cannot agree with him. The Chair distinctly told the gentleman that he had promised the gentleman from Iowa that he would recognize him and that he would then recognize the gentleman from Ohio on the appropriation bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. I beg the Speaker's pardon. I was informed by the Chair that there were three gentlemen whom he would recognize to-day for motions to suspend the rules, after which I should be recognized.

The SPEAKER. In the judgment of the Chair the gentleman from Ohio had no justification for moving the adjournment unless the motion was made in good faith.

Mr. GARFIELD. It was made in good faith.

The SPEAKER. Very well; the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am quite willing to withdraw the motion.

Mr. POTTER. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has no right to object.

Mr. POTTER. I object to the Speaker stating that any gentleman in this House has no right to move an adjournment. I repeat that I object to the Speaker telling any gentleman in this House, and especially the chairman of an important committee, that it is not proper for him to move an adjournment. I entirely agree with the gentleman from Ohio in his action, and I do not consider there was any justification for the remark which the Speaker made to the gentleman from Ohio.

The SPEAKER. What remark does the gentleman speak of?

Mr. POTTER. That it was not proper conduct on the part of the gentleman from Ohio to move an adjournment.

The SPEAKER. Unless moved in good faith.

Mr. POTTER. I do not understand that there is any question of good faith. My objection is to the reflection by the Speaker on the conduct of a member of the House who moves to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair repeats the remark and stands by that remark, the gentleman from New York to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to say in the hearing of the Chair that I do not permit any person in this House, not even the Chair, to question my good faith in my action here.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was not questioning the good faith of the gentleman from Ohio, nor does he permit his own good faith to be questioned by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. POTTER.]

Mr. POTTER. The gentleman from New York did not question the good faith of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman assumed the right to criticise the conduct of the Chair.

Mr. POTTER. The gentleman from New York begs leave to ask the Chair by what authority the Chair assumes to say that a gentleman ought not to move to adjourn?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York had no issue with the Chair, and the gentleman from Ohio was perfectly competent to settle the matter without the interposition of the gentleman from New York. The gentleman from New York thrust himself in in order to criticise the action of the Chair.

Mr. POTTER. The gentleman from New York objected to a remark made by the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. And the Chair repeats that remark.

Mr. POTTER. The Chair may repeat it, and the gentleman from New York objects to it. It is the province of every member of this House to move an adjournment according to his conscience and his sense of duty.

The SPEAKER. Did the Chair refuse to submit the motion or object to the gentleman making the motion?

Mr. POTTER. O! but the Speaker criticised the action of the gentleman from Ohio in making the motion when he submitted it. I have never before known a presiding officer in submitting a motion to adjourn criticise the circumstances under which it was made.

Mr. RANDALL. Now we will go ahead with the public business.

The SPEAKER. The Chair considers that he was vindicated in his remark and it was the judgment of the House that it was not a proper time to adjourn.

Mr. GARFIELD. I should say that the judgment of the House was just the other way.

Mr. POTTER. I thought a majority of the House voted in favor of adjourning.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio withdrew the motion to adjourn. Does the gentleman from New York propose to renew it?

Mr. POTTER. No; the gentleman from New York did not make the motion; it was the gentleman from Ohio who made it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have withdrawn it only in the hope that we may be able to go on with an appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that no one except the person in the chair knows the pressure of business on Mondays? The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. ORR] states that he represents the wishes of a whole cordon of Western States in this bill. If the Chair deliberately gives Monday to the regular transaction of the business of the Committee on Appropriations, there is no time for miscellaneous business, no time in which the sense of the House can be tested upon other business. It is in the discretion of the Chair to recognize members when they have important business to bring before the House. The gentleman from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, came and asked the Chair if he could have the floor. The Chair stated that he was under obligations to give the floor to gentlemen for the purpose of moving matters which they could not get in on the regular call and could only have acted on in this way. That is a discretion which the rules vest in the Chair. The rules place that distinctly in the discretion of the Speaker.

Mr. GARFIELD. The Chair will not forget, I hope, to state that early in the day the Chair told the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that there were three gentlemen to whom he had promised the floor, and that after he had given it to those gentlemen there would be nothing to come in the way of the appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. As the gentleman from Ohio has gone thus far the Chair thinks that he should state candidly the reason why he asked the Chair to recognize him. It was not to promote the public business, but to excuse the gentleman's absence to-morrow.

Mr. GARFIELD. Not at all.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understood.

Mr. GARFIELD. An appropriation bill is ready for to-morrow. It is arranged that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. SWANN] shall bring forward the consular and diplomatic bill, of which he has charge, to-morrow. I desire to get through to-day the Military Academy bill, and the gentleman who has it in charge is absent, and has requested me to attend to it.

It does not make the slightest personal difference to me whether business goes on to-day or to-morrow. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. SWANN] has charge of the consular and diplomatic bill, and has agreed to call it up to-morrow, whether I am here or not.

Mr. BECK. I renew the call for the yeas and nays, so that gentlemen may have time to recover their good humor.

The SPEAKER. The motion to adjourn has been withdrawn. There is no gentleman who can possibly be placed in so trying a position on Monday as is the occupant of the chair. Every gentleman who has a bill which he desires to have passed sees none of the other two hundred and ninety members, while the Chair has to see them all, and has in some way to so apportion the time for public business that each member and each section may have a hearing in the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to say a word.

Mr. RANDALL. I object to any further debate.

PRE-EMPTION AND HOMESTEAD ENTRIES.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. ORR] to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. No. 3250) to confirm pre-emption and homestead entries of public lands within the limits of railroad grants in cases where such entries have been made under the regulations of the land department. The bill will be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That all pre-emption and homestead entries of the public lands made in good faith upon tracts of land within the limits of any land grant prior to the time when notice of the withdrawal of the lands embraced in such grant was received at the local land office of the district in which such lands are situated, or after their restoration to market by order of the General Land Office, and where the pre-emption and homestead laws have been complied with and proper proofs thereof have been made by the parties holding such tracts or parcels, they shall be confirmed, and patents for the same shall issue to the parties entitled thereto.

SEC. 2. That when at the time of such withdrawal as aforesaid valid pre-emption or homestead claims existed upon any lands within the limits of any such grants which afterward were abandoned, and, under the decisions and rulings of the land department, were re-entered by pre-emption or homestead claimants who have complied with the laws governing pre-emption or homestead entries, or shall make the proper proof required under such laws, such entries shall be deemed valid, and patents shall issue therefor to the person entitled thereto.

SEC. 3. That all such pre-emption and homestead entries which may have been made by permission of the land department, or in pursuance of the rules and instructions thereof, within the limits of any land grant at a time subsequent to expiration of such grant, or when the grantee was in default in the performance of any of the conditions imposed by such grant, shall be deemed valid, and a compliance with the laws, and the making of the proofs required shall entitle the holder of such claim to a patent therefor.

Mr. KELLOGG. Is this reported from any committee?

Mr. ORR. It is recommended by the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. LOWE. I have the consent of the mover of this proposition to submit an amendment to the first section of the bill; to insert after the words "pre-emption and homstead entries" the words "or entries in compliance with any law of the United States."

Mr. ORR. I accept that, and include it in my motion.

The motion to suspend the rules was then seconded, and (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and the bill was passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had concurred in the resolution of the House for printing three thousand copies of the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury of January 21, 1874, with accompanying reports, concerning the immigration service and the better protection of immigrants to the United States.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 420) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to discharge certain obligations of the United States to the creditors of the Upper and Lower bands of Sioux Indians.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed the bill (H. R. No. 2095) granting a pension to Charles McCarty, with an amendment; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

MILITARY ACADEMY BILL.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now move that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Military Academy appropriation bill. Pending that motion I move that all general debate be limited to five minutes.

Mr. BECK. Would it be in order to move to suspend the rules and pass the bill? That seems to be the style now.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is not what I want.

The motion to limit general debate was agreed to.

The motion to go into Committee of the Whole was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. NIBLACK in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2545) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875.

The CHAIRMAN. All general debate upon this bill by order of the House is limited to five minutes.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that we proceed at once to consider the bill by paragraphs.

Mr. HOLMAN. As there is to be no general debate, I hope the bill may be read at length.

Mr. GARFIELD. Very well; let it be read.

The bill was then read.

Mr. GARFIELD. I greatly regret that the gentleman in charge of this bill, [Mr. MARSHALL,] who for three years has had charge of similar bills, is not now here. He is absent from the city, and will be gone ten days. He requested me to take charge of the bill in his place.

The story of this bill is very soon told; and if gentlemen will give me their attention for the five minutes allowed for general debate I will state what there is peculiar about it. The corresponding bill of last year appropriated $344,373.56. This bill appropriates $8,482.56 less than the bill of last year, and $46,000 less than the estimates for this year. We could have made a reduction even of the amount in this bill but for the fact that the number of pupils in the Military Academy has been increased by fifty, in consequence of the increase of the number of members of this House. There being one from each congressional district, there has been an increase to that extent. We have cut down the estimates by $46,000, believing that the incidental expenses, the amount to be paid for building a hospital, and for other matters connected with the general expenses there, could be somewhat reduced. A few of the items have been increased; but on the whole the aggregate is $8,500 less than the bill of last year.

Before general debate is closed I desire to take this occasion to say, in the hearing of the Committee of the Whole, what I tried to say here in the House, but to which objection was made. It is that in the remark I made, and in the motion to adjourn which I submitted, I had not the slightest intention to reflect upon the Speaker of the House. I am aware how the Speaker is pressed by members of the House who want to put measures through on Monday. But members are not aware how much I, as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, am pressed on Monday to go into Committee of the Whole to proceed with the consideration of appropriation bills, instead of allowing the time of the House to be taken up by propositions which the House in general do not care much about. I suppose that not less than twenty-five members have upbraided me this morning for not moving to go into Committee of the Whole on this bill. I felt obliged, therefore, by some method to call the attention of the House to the question whether members desired to get on with the appropriation bills or not; and having attempted to make the motion I did, I followed it by a motion to adjourn in order that the sense of the House might be tested as to whether we would rather adjourn or get on with these bills. That was my whole motive. I had not the slightest unkind feeling with reference to the Speaker. He must know that I can have no personal disrespect for him.

Mr. RANDALL. How would an adjournment help on the appropriation bills?

Mr. GARFIELD. That was merely to test the question; that is all. If any gentlemen desire to ask any questions with regard to this bill I shall be glad to hear them. If not, I ask that the bill be read by paragraphs for amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to ask from the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] an explanation of the paragraph in lines 7, 8, and 9, with reference to "additional pay of officers."

Mr. GARFIELD. That is the same as in all our bills from year to year. According to law a captain, for instance, when detailed for duty at West Point as an officer of the academy receives a fixed rate of pay in addition to his regular pay as an officer of the Army. For a lieutenant there is another rate of additional pay. Thus the grade of the officer determines the amount of additional pay to which he is entitled. It is always necessary, therefore, to include in this bill an appropriation for additional pay to cover that particular element of the pay of officers of the academy.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is it additional pay?

Mr. GARFIELD. The regular pay is appropriated for in the Army bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Has the appropriation for this purpose ever been so much heretofore as $237,000?

Mr. GARFIELD. Last year the appropriation for this item—"additional pay of officers and for pay of instructors, professors, cadets, and musicians"—was $220,379.50. This year the amount is somewhat increased because there are fifty more cadets.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill by paragraphs for amendment.

No amendment was offered.

The bill having been read through,

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the Committee of the Whole now proceed to the consideration of the next bill on the Calendar, being the bill (H. R. No. 3030) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1873 and 1874, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. That members may fully understand this bill, I ask them to send for two documents—Executive Document No. 150, being the regular deficiency estimates, and Committee Report No. 476. The latter is the report made by the Committee on Appropriations upon this deficiency bill, in which we have thrown together all the vouchers referred to, except those found in the first report. In those two documents members will find the grounds on which the Committee on Appropriations proceeded in reporting this bill to the House.

While gentlemen are sending for these documents, I will make a brief explanation. The total deficiencies last year for the current and former years amounted to a little more than $11,000,000. I am glad to say that this bill is the smallest deficiency bill in amount that has been reported to the House since the war. We have delayed it to so late a period in the session in order to include in it all items of this description. I believe we have acted on every deficiency that has been presented to the committee, though I ought to add that for the War Department, for the Army proper, the deficiencies for this year, if there be any, have not come in. We include in the bill War Department deficiencies for last year; but whatever deficiencies may occur in the year now passing have not yet been sufficiently developed. The accounts have to be obtained from such distant points, and it takes so long for the War Department to know how the year is coming out, that it cannot as yet be stated whether there will be deficiencies in that Department for this year, or if so, to what extent.

The deficiencies reported in this bill amount to $3,341,175.52. Of these the deficiency for the Department of State is $50,072.92; for the Treasury Department, $588,422.52; and for the War Department, $611,490.50. Much the largest item of this deficiency is, however, in the Indian service. For the Interior Department the deficiency is $1,465,176.76, and most of this amount is made up of Indian deficiencies. Under the Post-Office Department the deficency is $201,604.06, growing mainly out of the increase in the railroad mail service during the last year, and the increase in the money-order system. Three hundred and seventy-five thousand four hundred and four dollars and forty-six cents comes under the head of the Attorney-General's Department, most of it being expenses of courts, or what is known as the judicial department. Thirty thousand six hundred and seventeen dollars and seventy-two cents of the deficiency relate to the House of Representatives, Capitol grounds, and Botanical Garden; and $18,386.58 is for the Reform school of the District of Columbia, growing out of the failure of Jay Cooke & Co., and the consequent loss of funds that were deposited with that firm.

I will yield for ten minutes to the gentleman from Arizona, [Mr. MCCORMICK,] who desires to make some remarks on the Indian deficiencies. I will then resume the floor and yield to any other gentleman who may desire it.

Mr. BECK. How does this bill get before the committee?

Mr. GARFIELD. By voting to take it up, as it is the next bill on the Calendar. I yield now to the gentleman from Arizona, [Mr. MCCORMICK.]

[Mr. MCCORMICK addressed the committee. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] and I shall then ask the committee to proceed to the consideration of the bill by paragraphs for amendment.

Mr. BECK. I do not propose to occupy the whole ten minutes allowed me. The events of to-day have made it perfectly apparent that there is going to be no serious opposition made in this House to anything that the dominant party may see fit to do in appropriating the money of the people. When a party can pass a river and harbor bill of $4,500,000, and can proclaim to the country that it is so perfect that there cannot be even an amendment suggested to a single paragraph of it, and when by a two-thirds majority the gag is put on this House, so that no member shall be allowed to say a word in regard to the appropriations contained in that bill, no matter how wrong he may know them to be, it is of little use to attempt opposition to anything the majority may choose to do. I assert that many of the appropriations of $5,000 and $10,000 to the creeks of Michigan, Wisconsin, and New England, instead of being spent for any beneficial purpose, are to be spent for the purpose of keeping employés there who are the pets of the men in power. Yet that bill has been crowded through this House, and the Representatives of the people have been denied the right even to call attention to the wrongs in it, or to move to strike out any of the appropriations which they know to be unjust and useless. And then on the heels of that we have another appropriation bill taken up, the Military Academy bill, and all debate upon it limited to five minutes. We have had that bill pushed through without any man having an opportunity to know anything about it. Next, following close on the heel of that—indeed before it is reported to the House—the deficiency bill is taken up, and that is to be crowded through, I suppose, in five minutes more. I have been expecting all day to hear a motion made to suspend the rules and pass all the appropriation bills—the post-office appropriation bill, the sundry civil appropriation bill, and all of them—under the gag law. We might as well do that at once if we are not to be allowed to criticise the action of the committee, nor to tell what we know as to the wasteful or extravagant items contained in the bills. This House has ceased to be a body of free representative men.

Only the other day, when the Indian appropriation bill was up, the Committee on Appropriations struck out and refused even to allow the House to consider all the safeguards for the rightful expenditure of the people's money, and insisted upon keeping repealed the only laws that allowed an examination of an Indian voucher so as to furnish proof that it was fraudulent. It is so arranged at last that the contractors, the agents, the thieves that surround that department, can run riot without any sort of restriction, and the great dominant party of this country say it is all right; they shall not be looked at nor their villainies exposed. The deficiency bill is a fitting sequel to the others. Three hundred and twenty-three million dollars have been appropriated already for the service of this fiscal year; a larger amount than ever was appropriated in one year during the last five years. One hundred and seventy-two million five hundred thousand dollars of that amount was for the ordinary expenditures outside of interest on the debt, the sinking fund, and every extraordinary or permanent expenditure. And now the Committee on Appropriations bring in a deficiency bill, one item of which, under the head of the Interior Department, is $1,465,000, most of it to go to the Indian Bureau, this same department in which all these robberies are going on which have been licensed by the Indian bill. I have already shown that the charges I make are certified officially; yet these wrongs are supported by the action of the dominant majority in this House in refusing to put checks upon the expenditures in that department, and by giving them all the money they want in the face of the exhibits which have been made, struggling now to give nearly $1,500,000 more without examination, explanation, or debate.

Sir, all the pretenses of economy in Indian affairs which were made last year when the Indian bill was up, appropriating $6,000,000, and which were made when the bill was presented this year appropriating about $5,000,000, have proven to be just what I and others said they were, utterly false. The amounts paid out for Indians, as shown by the Secretary himself for the last fiscal year, were $7,950,000, as will be seen by looking at page 4 of the last report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the expenditures and estimates for the current fiscal year are given thus: $2,008,000 which had been spent before the 1st day of September, and $6,500,000 estimated as being necessary before the year closes, and here you have a deficiency of $1,465,000 asked for, most of which, they say, is to go to this same Indian Bureau. And yet men get up here and prate about honesty and economy, and remove restrictions on fraud, suspend rules, and pass bills involving millions without debate. I know debate does no good here, but it will be heard by the people from whose pockets the money is taken. Perhaps that is the reason it is so much dreaded.

I desire to say a word on another subject in this connection. I made an effort some time ago to prevent the Secretary from permitting money to be drawn out of the old balances of appropriations made for the year 1871 which by law were required to be covered into the Treasury two years after the fiscal year for which they were appropriated expired. I showed some months ago that in violation of the law he had drawn, or allowed to be drawn, up to the 1st of September last, over $1,000,000, and gentlemen laughed at me and seemed to think it was impossible. I succeeded in having a resolution passed, after all sorts of resistance, requiring him to give us the facts; and I hold his answer to it in my hand. It shows that out of that old fund, appropriated expressly for the service of the year 1871, limited by law to that year and which by the sixth section of the act of July 12, 1870, was required to be put into the Treasury, he had drawn on the 1st of April $4,282,000 out of that old fund and spent it all since this Congress met. This is the recapitulation:

Foreign intercourse	214,516 38
Treasury Department	124,945 69
War Department	1,740,918 48
Navy Department	541,984 77
Interior Department	103,451 00
Post-Office Department	1,510,986 33

Where are you going to stop expenditures? At what point are you going to stop executive usurpation? If you are going to give $323,000,000, as you have done by the appropriations for the current year, and allow the Secretary to draw from balances which belong to the Treasury, as he certifies that he has done, $4,282,000, and follow this up with any amount asked for deficiencies, largely over $1,000,000 of which is for Indian service, it will be hard to make the country believe that the Indian department is being carried on for less than $6,000,000 annually, as the committee pretend it is. The report of the Secretary of the Treasury shows that it cost last year $7,900,000 and will cost this year $8,500,000. The Committee on Appropriations come in now and ask for $1,465,000 deficiency in the face of all these appropriations, and their bills are crowded through here, and Members are said to be taking time, delaying the adjournment of Congress, and interfering with the public business, who dare to rise and open their mouth to protest against these robberies, extravagances, and extortions.

Sir, I do not know that I shall rise any more to protest against these things. I have protested and done and said all that one man can do or say against them; you can now pass just what you please; but I hope and trust that very few of the men that stand by and indorse such appropriations will be here in the next Congress. The poverty of the country will, I hope, cause matters here to be investigated as they have never been before.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now ask that the bill be read by paragraphs for amendment.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill by paragraphs for amendment, and read the following:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

Foreign intercourse:

For rent of court-house and jail, with grounds appurtenant, in Jeddo, Japan, being a deficiency for the fiscal year 1874, $5,000.

Mr. POTTER. I move to reduce this appropriation $1,000. I do this that I may say I have listened with great attention to what has been said by the gentleman from Kentucky. I certainly recognize the right and duty of every member of this House to fully criticise any appropriation bill which comes before the House for consideration. I happen, however, to be one of the persons who voted to suspend the rules this morning and pass the river and harbor bill, and I was one of those—if there be anybody else in the House in the same situation—who did so although they had no appropriation for their districts in the bill, all the appropriations for mine having been disallowed by the committee.

Now I desire to state to the House why it was that I took the exceptional action that I did take in regard to this bill.

I served, Mr. Chairman, during the Forty-first Congress on the Committee on Commerce, and was a member of the sub-committee on rivers and harbors during that Congress, and my experience taught me then that no body could act intelligently on the subject of rivers and harbors unless it acted on the whole subject. Since the amount to be appropriated in the aggregate is necessarily limited, it is important to consider what that amount is, and then distribute it among the works of the greatest general public utility. This duty a committee having the whole subject in charge would be competent to do; while on the other hand the whole House, being obliged to decide on each proposed increase of the bill separately and without reference to other applications, would be likely to decide erroneously. I always, therefore, insisted, while a member of that committee, that after a river and harbor bill was reported to the House, the House ought not to let in any amendments increasing the appropriations, for if they did they would be apt to make appropriations for places that did not deserve them, and besides would weigh down the bill until the aggregate sum appropriated was so swollen the bill might not pass at all. In the Fortieth and Forty-first Congresses there were indeed sessions when there was no river and harbor appropriation bill agreed upon at all. All that was done in those sessions was to appropriate a gross sum, and let the War Department dispose of it according to its discretion in the prosecution of existing works.

Mr. GARFIELD. Is not the gentleman confident that if that bill had been considered and debated in Committee of the Whole it would have grown at the rate of at least $1,000,000 a day?

Mr. POTTER. As the gentleman well suggests, I am satisfied that if the river and harbor appropriation bill had been once allowed to be considered and amended in the Committee of the Whole House it would have been loaded down with amendments increasing the appropriations. I do not think a case has been known in twenty years when the river and harbor appropriation bill, considered in a Committee of the Whole House, has not been greatly increased by amendments which were put upon it; amendments too often put on by what may be called the log-rolling process. Uniformly the result has been to pile on amendment after amendment, never reducing the amounts or items recommended, but by adding to them greatly increasing the appropriations. So well settled had the action of the Committee of the Whole House in that regard become that years ago the House passed a rule, applicable to the river and harbor appropriation bill alone, authorizing any member of the House to call for a separate vote in the House on any item of the bill, no matter what may have been the action in Committee of the Whole on that item. It had been found that the action of the Committee of the Whole upon the river and harbor appropriation bills so invariably resulted in log-rolling additions upon it that this exceptional rule for that bill was deemed necessary. I repeat, therefore, I voted as I did this morning because my experience and what I had learned of the experience of others have satisfied me that the consideration of this measure in the House or in Committee of the Whole would inevitably result in increasing and not decreasing the amount appropriated by the bill. I do not myself think the bill, as reported, was as small as it ought to have been. I agree now with my friend from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] in thinking that there were items in it that should not have been passed; still I thought it better to take that exceptional bill as it was reported as the least evil practicable, rather than run the risk of opening it by debate, believing that if the bill once got into Committee of the Whole for consideration the country would not get off even with what was recommended by the committee.

Mr. BECK. I rise to oppose the amendment. I do not want to impugn the motives of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. POTTER.] He had a right to vote as he pleased. I did criticise his action, since he admits that it was his action, in depriving me or any Representative on this floor who might desire to amend the river and harbor bill, or to show the wrongs that were in it, from having an opportunity to do so. I criticise the action of any gentleman, especially if he calls himself a member of the opposition, who will so vote as to deprive any member on this floor, by a suspension of the rules, under the gag putting through a bill in that way, of an opportunity to be heard, and to make his objections known.

Fortunately I am not one of those who have any complaint to make about that appropriation bill. There are no harbors in my district, there are no rivers there for which appropriations are asked. There never was a dollar of public money spent in the district which I represent from the foundation of this Government to the present time, and I hope there never will be. There never has been a human being that I know of from that district asking office during the seven years I have been here. Therefore I am asking for no favors. My district, as the record will show, has paid into the Treasury more revenue annually for the last six years than four States I can name.

But I insist that whenever we so legislate that a Representative cannot be heard, and when the party in power, in the face of all the appropriations they are making, can do what they please, can pass what they please, can put the gag upon us whenever they choose, then if the gentleman from New York thinks it right to gag me and his fellow-democrats who may have objections to such legislation, he has a right to do so and I have the right to protest against his act.

Mr. POTTER. One word and one only. My district is exactly like the district of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.] Everything he says about his district I can say about mine. It never has had a dollar of the public money; it never has had anybody here in my time asking for office. Besides, sir, I do not desire to gag anybody. But in legislating upon matters of this kind one must legislate in what to him appears the best way to secure practical results. The gentleman from Kentucky and myself, I take it, want the same result: the least possible appropriations for rivers and harbors. Appropriations for works of general utility and those only——

Mr. GARFIELD. It was by unanimous consent that these remarks were made on both sides.

Mr. POTTER. I desire only to conclude the sentence, and I would have been through by this time had I not been interrupted. As I was saying, in this legislation we must act according to the best light we have; and I am very confident that in passing the bill as it did the House prevented the appropriation from being increased rather than from being reduced. I regret very much if my friend from Kentucky was thereby cut off from making any speech which would have had the effect of diminishing the appropriations in that bill, though I confess that I fear even he could not have done that; that the only result of debating the bill would have been to increase the aggregate amounts appropriated by it. I now withdraw my amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. One word. Although there were appropriations in the river and harbor bill to improve the river which runs along the side of my district, yet I felt bound to vote here against the suspension of the rules for the passage of that bill. According to my judgment that is not the way in which an intelligent representative body of men should act on behalf of an extended country.

Now, sir, when we examine the figures of that bill we find that of the $4,500,000 appropriated, $1,500,000 is given to rivers and harbors in three States in this Union—Wisconsin, Michigan, and New York. Whether it be the fact or not that none of this money goes into the particular district of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. POTTER,] it is certain that throughout that State, from its westernmost part to the shores of the Hudson, on the lakes and on the rivers, $500,000 is to be expended under that bill. This was the reason I voted in favor of a free discussion, so that gentlemen who had not the access that some seemed to have had to the Committee on Commerce and the Committee on Appropriations could at least come into this House and propose on behalf of their constituencies amendments looking to the improvement of rivers and harbors in their respective districts. What we complain of is that we have not had an opportunity in reference to this bill to show the good faith existing between the Representative and those whom he represents. This was the main complaint I urged against the course adopted. I deprecated (although I had no opportunity to express myself except by my vote) that a bill involving appropriations approaching $5,000,000 should be passed under a motion to suspend the rules. I hope this example will never be followed in an intelligent Congress acting for the American people.

Mr. BROMBERG. I wish to ask the gentleman what he means when he speaks of members "having access to committees?"

Mr. RANDALL. I mean just what I say. Some members go around committee-rooms and obtain what they want; others do not.

The Clerk read as follows:

For amount due by the United States to the District of Columbia, for one-third of the entire cost of maintaining the fire department from January 31, 1873, to June 30, 1874, $34,291.66.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I wish to inquire whether the paragraph just read is to supply a deficiency in an appropriation heretofore made, or whether there has been no appropriation at all?

Mr. GARFIELD. There has been no appropriation at all heretofore. This expenditure is in pursuance of a new law which was passed last year after the appropriation bill was acted on. We simply comply with the law and make an appropriation in accordance with the terms of the statute.

Mr. COX. Does that law make it obligatory on the District of Columbia to raise its proportion of the expenditure for this purpose?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

The Clerk read as follows:

For furniture and carpets for the Treasury Department:
For carpets, desks, tables, chairs, shelving for file-room, boxes, repairs of furniture, cases, oil-cloth, matting, rugs, chair-covers and cushions, repairs and laying of carpets, and other miscellaneous items of a like character, $10,000.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to have some explanation of this item. It is a character of expenditure for which I do not think there is justification. No Department should make expenditures for furniture, &c., unless the money has been previously appropriated. I do not believe it right for the Departments to run in debt for such expenses.

Mr. GARFIELD. Last year we cut down this appropriation to nearly one-third of the amount the Department asked for. This year the officers come to us and say that they have not expended money beyond the amount appropriated, but that the necessities of the Treasury Department and of the buildings under the Department require more of this kind of expenditure than we have provided for. They have asked us for $20,000. We give them $10,000. The committee were satisfied that there ought to be a larger supply of furniture. Furniture is constantly giving out, and although we do not propose to appropriate what was asked for last year, we allow $10,000, which brings the amount within about $10,000 of what was asked last year.

Mr. RANDALL. Then, as I understand, this covers expenditures of the current year.

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly; but the year is not yet out.

Mr. RANDALL. Congress gives so much money to the Departments for furniture, carpeting, &c., that I think they should confine their expenditures to the amount appropriated.

Mr. GARFIELD. They can do so; but the gentleman will remember that we are constantly having new buildings in different parts of the country, and hence an increased amount of expenditure is necessary in the way of furniture. Even with this appropriation of $10,000 the aggregate will be $10,000 less than the Department had the year before.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman speaks of public buildings in different parts of the country; but the item to which I particularly refer, although it has not yet been read, appropriates $30,000 apparently for furniture and repairs of the Treasury Department alone.

Mr. GARFIELD. Where there are several thousand persons employed the mere breakage of furniture is a very large item.

The Clerk read as follows:

For furniture and repairs of same, carpets, and similar necessaries for public buildings under control of the Treasury Department, $30,000.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to this and the following item, the latter appropriating $40,000 for repairs and preservation of all public buildings under the control of the Treasury Department. I find that the only excuse given by the Secretary of the Treasury for these expenditures, especially the item next to be read, is that last year $200,000 was estimated for and only $50,000 was appropriated; and so far as regards the particular items now under consideration, no reason is given for the expenditure except a general statement that the appropriation heretofore made was insufficient. I wish to know whether the committee had before them any details as to where this expenditure was made, what was its character, or why there should have happened to be this expenditure in excess of the appropriation?

Mr. GARFIELD. As to these three items—the one last under consideration, this one, and the next one—we called before the committee the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, who was specially examined in regard to these items. As the gentleman from Vermont is aware, that officer has charge of all the buildings under the control of the Treasury Department. He satisfied the committee that we ought to give not all that is asked, but some part of it, in view of the fact that we cut down the Department last year in this respect lower than the ordinary figure, and that the natural wear and tear of furniture and carpets, the natural necessity of keeping them in order, had probably been underestimated. Therefore, instead of giving $50,000, we gave $30,000; and one item of the estimate we struck out entirely.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I wish to inquire whether the appropriation in the pending paragraph is for a deficiency occurring in appropriations for any public building in this District, or whether it refers to buildings in another part of the country?

Mr. GARFIELD. It is for all public buildings under the control of the Supervising Architect. He has charge of the Treasury building proper and of all public buildings here in the city of Washington; he has charge of all the custom-houses and all the post-offices, and also to provide the furniture and for the repair of them all. He has under his control—I forget the precise number as he gave it to the committee—over fifty public buildings, and when we come to distribute that amount over the United States among fifty public buildings, some of them being very large, like the building now being erected in the city of New York, like the post-office building in Boston, like the various court-house buildings throughout the United States, it will be seen that $100,000 would go only a little way in keeping up repairs and for supplies and furniture and carpets in so many public buildings.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. It is true, as the gentleman from Ohio has said, that under the present management of our public buildings $100,000 does go but a little way. In all our attempts to retrench this is what comes of it. The only reason given in asking for this appropriation is that more was estimated for last year, but it was not given. Last year we cut down the estimates and flattered ourselves we had saved money to the Treasury. Now we are told while we did cut down the estimates we did not save anything by doing so, as the officer who had that appropriation in charge did not pay any attention to it, but spent the money just as though we had made the appropriation. We come here now and graciously, without any apparent objection, make an appropriation to cover the consequent deficiency! If that is what has come of all our efforts it certainly cannot be considered wise economy. If those officers cannot make any more careful estimates as to these ordinary expenses—they are not extraordinary in any case—if they cannot make any more careful estimates of the ordinary expenses of their Departments, and if the Committee on Appropriations do not more intelligently cut down estimates than appears in this case, I do not see how we can congratulate ourselves when we get through with a bill we save the tax-payers anything at all. We can only congratulate ourselves we have a smaller appropriation for the time being, and comfort ourselves with the consolation when the next year comes round and the exigencies of the canvass are over we are to have all these deficiencies made up in a deficiency appropriation bill, without anything to show in what particular the estimates for last year gave rise to the deficiency, except the general one—that for furniture and repair of public buildings under the charge of the architect of the Treasury Department, Mr. Mullett, there is a deficiency of $100,000.

If that is sufficient in the opinion of the Department and in the opinion of the House, go on, then, and make appropriations. I only suggest that we are not saving anything to the Treasury by the practice of any such economy.

Mr. COX. I move to strike out from line 243 to line 245 inclusive, as follows:

For furniture and repairs of same, carpets, and similar necessaries for public buildings under control of the Treasury Department, $30,000.

I do not see, Mr. Chairman, and I do not know where the authority is in the Treasury to pay out money not appropriated, or to contract indebtedness and then come in and ask us to pay it.

Mr. GARFIELD. They have not paid it out, and will not unless we appropriate it.

Mr RANDALL. Then we can save it by not appropriating it.

Mr. COX. It is for that purpose I move to strike it out. I never believed in these deficiency bills. They not only imply a political and moral, but a pecuniary deficiency. These deficiency bills ought always to be scrutinized, and we ought to have bills of particulars for each item.

We are told that there are new buildings going up where this furniture is to be put. Give us a detailed statement of the items. We are told that the Supervising Architect of the Treasury has to supply for these public buildings in the United States carpets, desks, tables, chairs, shelving for file-room, boxes, repairs of furniture, cases, oil-cloth, matting, rugs, chair-covers and cushions, repairs and laying of carpets, and other miscellaneous items of a like character. How does he buy them? What kind of contracts does he make? Is it done under advertisement or is it done to favorites? How do we know this money is honestly appropriated by the Supervising Architect of the Treasury or anybody else? We ought to have a detailed statement of all these items. Here is $30,000 in one, and $10,000 in another, and so on.

I wish to make no factious opposition to the bill; but there ought to be at the end of each one of the appropriation bills a proviso that the man who makes contracts for money in advance, and pays money not authorized, should go to the penitentiary, or at least should be debarred forever from holding civil office in this country. It has got to be the nuisance of our administration—these deficiency bills. I do not say the gentleman from Ohio has not properly razeed these bills. I know he has improved on the various years heretofore in cutting down from year to year, but every year, by cutting down, he confesses there was before too much appropriated.

I do not now complain especially of this item; but I do hope the House will, for once, by cutting off this $30,000, teach these people at the Treasury and other places not to be too forward in spending the people's money, at least in advance of appropriations.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.] I do it for the purpose of giving the gentleman from New York and the members of the committee an answer to some questions propounded by that gentleman while he was on the floor. He asks how these deficiencies occur, how these carpets are purchased, and how this furniture was supplied, whether by contract or otherwise.

I wish to say in justice to the officers having this matter in charge that the carpets purchased by the Treasury Department of the United States for the public buildings under its supervision are purchased from A. T. Stewart, under a regulation by which it gets them at as low a wholesale price as any wholesale merchant in the United States can purchase them. I will state an incident to show how carefully the Treasury Department of the United States supervises this business, and how thoroughly it protects the interests of the Government in those purchases. We had occasion in the past year in fitting up the custom-house at Norfolk, Virginia, on which nothing had been done since some years before the war, to purchase new furniture for the building. Supposing there was some profit in furnishing it, a very reputable firm in Norfolk requested me to go to the Treasury Department to obtain for them if possible the privilege of furnishing the carpets for the building. I complied with their request, and was told by the officers of the Treasury Department that if these gentlemen would do the work as cheaply as anybody else they might have it. The Supervising Architect of the Treasury presented a statement of the prices the Department was paying, and said that if this firm could furnish carpets at these prices they might have the job. But they declined, saying that the Treasury Department was getting the carpets 5 per cent. cheaper from Stewart than they could purchase them themselves.

And so it is with the furniture. I would like any gentleman to examine the furniture in the Treasury Department and the prices paid for it, and compare them with the purchases of furniture made under the old system for the public buildings, when the job was given to some favorite selected by politicians on the ground where the furnishing was to be done. I would like them to do this and compare the old pine tables and miserable chairs furnished then at higher prices than are paid to-day for the very best quality of furniture. Gentlemen who will make such an investigation will come back from it thoroughly convinced that the system we now have in operation is carefully devised and carried out in the interests of economy.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no doubt that what the gentleman from Virginia states may be true, as to the purchases now being made at prices lower perhaps than heretofore. But I have nothing to do with that. I strike deeper and closer to the root of the evil. There are here three items of appropriation, involving an expenditure of $30,000, which are not in the nature of deficiencies, for I understand the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to say distinctly that this money has not yet been expended. Nor did I understand him to say that any contract for the expenditure has been made.

Mr. GARFIELD. I said that that was true in regard to the main amount of it. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania will allow me to call his attention to the vast increase of the money-order business, which has required the Department to put up cases for assorting money orders in the office of the Sixth Auditor of the Treasury. They have had to spend on that alone, on the furniture for the enlarged force in that office, some five or six thousand dollars. The delivery system, also, at the post-office, under the new codified law, has required a considerable change in the post-offices throughout the whole country. Some of this they have had to do under the provisions of the new law, and some of the expenditures have actually been made and must be met.

Mr. RANDALL. Now I wish to attract the attention of the chairman of the committee to the fact that we have but fifty days of the current year to run, and the probability is that when this bill passes there will not be more than twenty days of it to run. There is really no excuse whatever for the insertion here of these amounts.

They should be in the regular appropriation bill, for the year which commences July 1, or else they should not be in any appropriation bill. These are not properly deficiencies. The money has not been expended, nor have contracts for the expenditure of some of the amounts been entered into. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from New York to strike out these items will prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York to strike out from the pending paragraph the following words:

For furniture and repairs of same, carpets, and similar necessaries for public buildings under control of the Treasury Department, $30,000.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 37, noes 48; no quorum voting.

Mr. GARFIELD. Pending the division on the question by tellers, I move that the committee rise. Some gentlemen have some matters to present to the House, for which some little time may be necessary, and I wish to say that I hope it will be agreeable to the Committee of the Whole to allow the consular and diplomatic bill to be taken up to-morrow and let this lie over for a day.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to have some explanation, particularly in regard to the revival of certain appropriations provided for in the next paragraph of the bill, now remaining on the books of the Treasury Department and unavailable under the provisions of the fifth, sixth, and seventh sections of the act of July 12, 1870.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will explain that when the committee resumes the consideration of the bill. I now move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. NIBLACK reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 2545) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and had directed him to report the same to the House without amendment. Also, that the committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 3030) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1873 and 1874, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MILITARY ACADEMY BILL.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move the previous question upon the Military Academy bill, which has been reported from the committee without amendment.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask leave of absence for to-morrow.

There was no objection, and the leave was granted.

CONGRESSIONAL ELECTION IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. CESSNA. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on the Judiciary the bill (H. R. No. 2846) repealing the act entitled "An act fixing the time for the election of Representatives from the State of California to the Forty-fourth Congress."

I ask leave to make a brief statement in connection with this bill, which is the unanimous report of the committee. At the last session of Congress an act was passed directing members of the Forty-fourth Congress from the State of California to be elected in the fall of 1874. There is no other election in California this year, and the Legislature of California has unanimously petitioned Congress asking that that law should be repealed, so that the election of members of the Forty-fourth Congress shall go over until the next general election, in August, 1875. I have here the memorial of the Legislature of California. It was unanimous, and none of the members from California in this House antagonize the bill. I hope there will be no objection to its passage.

Mr. RANDALL. What is the effect of the bill?

Mr. CESSNA. The ground on which the application of the Legislature of California is based is, that it will cost the State about $250,000 to hold this election at the time fixed at present, whereas if the law is repealed members of the Forty-fourth Congress will be elected at the general election next year, as is desired by everybody there.

Mr. RANDALL. Would not the passage of this bill make an exception in the case of California from the general law?

Mr. CESSNA. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The general law which passed Congress does not go into effect for the Forty-fourth Congress, but the Forty-fifth.

There being no objection, the report was received.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CESSNA moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAYMENT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the bill (H. R. No. 2797) making appropriations for the payment of claims allowed by the commissioners of claims be made the special order for Friday next, taking precedence of other business.

Mr. RANDALL. That is wrong, because we have limited the time allowed for private bills.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that he had better ask to have the bill recommitted to the Committee on War Claims, with leave to report at any time. He can then bring it before the House whenever the condition of business will permit.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I will adopt that suggestion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman then asks that the bill be taken from the Private Calendar and recommitted to the Committee on War Claims, with leave to the committee to report the same for action in the House at any time.

Mr. SENER. On any private-bill day or on any day?

The SPEAKER. On any day when business will admit of its consideration. The bill had better be recommitted to the committee and then the chairman will have control of it and can bring it up at any time.

There was no objection, and the order was made.

COMMISSIONERS OF CLAIMS.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I also move that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of House bill No. 1565, relating to the commissioners of claims, and for other purposes, and that it be made a special order in the House for next Thursday evening, and from evening to evening thereafter until disposed of.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope not. If we meet here at eleven o'clock and sit until five o'clock, that is as much as human endurance should be called upon to bear.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The bill should be disposed of at an early day. It provides for the appointment of agents and the providing means to detect frauds in claims presented. It is necessary to protect the interests of the Government and to do justice to claimants.

The SPEAKER. Had not the gentleman better have an order made similar to the one adopted in reference to the other bill?

Mr. LAWRENCE. I will not object to that.

Mr. COBURN. What is the extent of the bill?

Mr. LAWRENCE. It will take some time to explain the bill. It authorizes the appointment of additional agents for commissioners of claims necessary to take proof, to detect frauds in the presentation of claims, and it contains a variety of other provisions. It has the unanimous approval of the Committee on War Claims, and I do not believe there will be any objection to any provision of the bill, except, perhaps, the provision extending the time for the presentation of claims.

Mr. RANDALL. Can we have the bill read?

The SPEAKER. It is quite a lengthy bill.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The bill does not appropriate any money. I move that the rules be so suspended that the Committee of the Whole shall be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be recommitted to the Committee on War Claims, with leave to report at any time.

The motion was seconded; and (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and the order made.

PATENTS IN PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS.

Mr. DONNAN. I move to suspend the rules so as to discharge the Committee on the Judiciary from the further consideration of House bill No. 2950, to authorize the issue of patents to lands in cases of private lands. Before the bill is read I desire to say that this bill was passed unanimously by the Committee of the Whole. In the absence of the gentleman reporting it to the House, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] stated that it was an important bill, and in his opinion it should be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; which was done. I understand that the Committee on the Judiciary will make no objection to the bill being passed now under a suspension of the rules.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not see any reason why the Government should be at the expense of furnishing patents in private land claims.

Mr. DONNAN. This bill was agreed to unanimously by the Committee on Private Land Claims and the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. POLAND. The Committee on the Judiciary now have a bill before them, which I have been authorized to report whenever that committee shall be called, providing that these surveys, where a title has been established, shall be returned to the court, and that the survey shall be by a court instead of being sent here to the Land Office. I think that is much the preferable mode to that proposed by this bill. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to to report that bill whenever we have an opportunity to report.

Mr. DONNAN. I understand that the Committee on the Judiciary have no objection to the passage of this bill.

Mr. RANDALL. The two bills would come in conflict.

Mr. POLAND. The very object of the bill of the Committee on the Judiciary is that these surveys, where the title has been admitted and there is no question except in regard to the boundaries, shall go into the court at home.

Mr. DONNAN. Where the title has been confirmed to a party, he ought to have his boundaries separated and agreed upon by the authority of a Government agent.

Mr. POLAND. Of course there should be some way to determine the boundary; but we thought it altogether preferable for the survey to be returned into the court at home, to be established where the parties are, rather than to be sent off to a land office.

Mr. RANDALL. This controversy, it seems to me, establishes the fact that we ought not to suspend the rules and pass this bill without consideration.

Mr. DONNAN. If the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] will say that the Committee on the Judiciary object to this bill I will withdraw my proposition. I was informed that they did not object.

Mr. POLAND. The Committee on the Judiciary have not examined this bill. I do not know that it has been before them at all.

Mr. DONNAN. It has been before them for three weeks.

Mr. POLAND. They certainly have not examined it; I do not think it has been referred to any member of the committee for examination. The Committee on the Judiciary have decided upon another bill, to the effect that these surveys should be returned into court and be determined where the parties live, where the witnesses are, where both parties can be heard. That is altogether a preferable mode to sending them off, a thousand miles perhaps, to a land office to be determined by some clerk.

Mr. DONNAN. Does the gentleman, as a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, object to this bill?

Mr. POLAND. I do.

Mr. DONNAN. Then I withdraw my proposition.

FORT GRATIOT MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. CONGER. I again ask unanimous consent to have passed the bill for which I asked consent this morning, authorizing the Secretary of War to grant the right of way across a corner of the Fort Gratiot military reservation to the city railroad company. After the bill is read I ask that a letter from the Secretary of War on this subject be also read.

The bill was read.

The letter of the Secretary of War was read, as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, May 4, 1874.

SIR: Referring to the application left by you, of the president (John P. Sanborn) and secretary (W. H. Vandenburgh) of the city railroad, of the city of Port Huron, for permission to lay the street-car track of said railroad around the northwest angle of the Fort Gratiot military reservation, in a curve having a radius of fifty-four feet, and for that purpose to encroach upon the said military reserve from the angle inward to the inner line of the track, (about fifteen feet,) I have the honor to inform you that this application has been carefully considered and no objection is found to granting to the company in question a right of way over the ground indicated, but that the Department has no authority to grant the right. Congress should pass a bill giving it.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War.

Hon. O. D. CONGER,
House of Representatives.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 3335) was introduced, read three times, and passed.

Mr. CONGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DIPLOMATIC REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the rules be so suspended that it shall be in order in the consideration of the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill to change the title of representatives of the United States to Portugal, Switzerland, Greece, Belgium, the Netherlands, Denmark, Sweden, Norway, and Turkey to be envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary, without increase of pay.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope this resolution will not be adopted, because it looks to an increase of salaries, if not in this Congress in the next.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. There is a special provision that it shall not involve any increase of pay.

Mr. HOLMAN. Instead of increasing the rank of these officers, we might as well have consuls at those points instead of ministers.

The question being taken on seconding the motion to suspend the rules and agree to the resolution, there were—ayes 38, noes 49; no quorum voting.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS and Mr. HOLMAN were appointed.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. Let me state that the proposition is simply to make this provision in order in Committee of the Whole, not to adopt it now.

The House divided; and the tellers reported ayes 36, noes not counted.

So the motion to suspend the rules was not seconded.

REDUCTION OF THE ARMY.

Mr. COBURN. I ask unanimous consent that the bill for the reduction of the Army may be made a special order in the House for next Saturday after the morning hour, to continue from day to day until concluded, to the exclusion of all other orders. This bill has been a special order for more than a month, but has been dragged behind appropriation bills. As it will make a very considerable reduction in the expenses of the Government, it certainly ought to be considered now in preference to appropriations.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COBURN?]

Mr. HALE, of New York. I object.

Mr. COBURN. I move to suspend the rules to make the order.

Mr. BECK. Would that exclude prior orders of the Committee on Ways and Means?

The SPEAKER. Orders of a prior date would not be affected. The House gave the Committee on Ways and Means authority to report back at any time for consideration in the House the bill in relation to moieties.

Mr. COBURN. I do not expect, of course, to exclude that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggests to the gentleman from Indiana that probably the best position in which he could put his bill would be to recommit it to the Committee on Military Affairs with authority to report it back at any time.

Mr. COBURN. The bill has already been recommitted. I ask unanimous consent that the committee have the right to report at any time.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Under that order, will the bill always be subject to the control of the majority of the House?

The SPEAKER. It will be; and prior orders will not be affected. By consultation with the chairman of the committee the Speaker can indicate the time when the bill may be brought in with the least detriment to other business of the House. At this stage of the session that is the best position in which any bill can be put. If there be no objection the Committee on Military Affairs will be authorized to report back at any time the bill for the reduction of the Army.

There was no objection; and leave was accordingly granted.

RAILROAD THROUGH PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. PURMAN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3336) granting the right of way through the public lands to construct and maintain a railroad; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

CHINA MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. PAGE, by unanimous consent, presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco, California, remonstrating against the cancellation of the contract of the Post-Office Department for the China mail service; which was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

STOCKTON AND COPPEROPOLIS RAILROAD.

Mr. BRADLEY. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on the Public Lands and have passed the bill (H. R. No. 2019) to forfeit certain public lands granted to the Stockton and Copperopolis Railroad, in the State of California.

The bill was read. It provides that all lands which were granted by Congress in the year 1867 to the Stockton and Copperopolis Railroad, to aid in the construction of a railroad from the city of Stockton to the town of Copperopolis, in the State of California, and which have not been patented by the United States to said company under said grant, which has expired by limitation, are hereby declared forfeited to the United States, and these lands shall hereafter be disposed of as other public land of the United States.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BRADLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. McDILL, of Iowa, obtained leave to print remarks on the bill reported to-day by Mr. ORR in regard to pre-emptions.—(See Appendix.)

EXTENSION OF TIME FOR PENSION APPLICATIONS.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. By instruction of the Committee on Invalid Pensions I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. No. 3338) to amend section 1 of an act entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the Army and Navy pension laws," approved March 3, 1873.

The bill was read. It provides that the first proviso in section 1 of the act named in the title be so amended as to permit State militiamen, whether in the regular volunteer service of the Government during the late rebellion or co-operating with the forces of the Government in suppressing such rebellion, until July 4, 1876, to prosecute their claims for a pension to a successful issue.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Has this bill been considered by any committee?

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Yes, sir; it is reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. SPEER. How many persons not covered by the present law are embraced by this bill?

Mr. CRITTENDEN. The bill merely extends until July 4, 1876, the time allowed for the prosecution of these claims to a successful issue. Under the present law the time expires in July of the present year.

Mr. SPEER. Then the bill only extends the time as to persons entitled under existing law?

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Yes, sir; they are entitled to prosecute their claims under existing law; but the time is about to expire.

The motion to suspend the rules, being seconded, was agreed to; two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. BECK. I move to reconsider all references made to-day, in order that they may not be brought back upon us without notice.

The SPEAKER. The rules prevent the bringing back of all bills referred on Monday. They are introduced not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. HEREFORD, for ten days; to Mr. DAVIS, for two weeks from and after Monday next; to Mr. WHEELER, for fifteen days from the 12th instant; to Mr. BIERY, for five days; and to Mr. HOOPER, for one week.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. KENDALL, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to print in the RECORD some remarks on bill (H. R. No. 3281) to amend the act entitled "An act to amend an act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 2, 1864.—(See Appendix.)

DRAINING OF A MARSH, SHEBOYGAN, WISCONSIN.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I move to suspend the rules and pass a bill (H. R. No. 3339) relating to the disposition of certain lands to be reclaimed in sections 14, 23, and 26, in township 16 north, of range 20, in the county of Sheboygan, in the State of Wisconsin. It has been considered by the Committee on the Public Lands, and that committee has ordered me to report it favorably to the House.

The bill, which was read, provides that so much of the bed of the marsh or pond in sections 14, 23, and 26, in township 16 north, of range 20 east of the fourth principal meridian, in the county of Sheboygan, in the State of Wisconsin, as shall or may be reclaimed by draining the water from the same, shall be owned and held, so far as any rights or interests of the United States are concerned, by the owners of the lands abutting upon said marsh or pond and draining the same, to the center or thread thereof, and divided among the several owners adjoining and abutting said marsh or pond, according to the rule of law, upon payment by said adjoining owners into the Treasury of the United States of $1.25 per acre for the amount of lands that has been or may be so reclaimed.

Mr. TOWNSEND. It allows the owners of the adjoining property after the marsh has been drained to secure titles to the bed of the marsh on the payment of $1.25 per acre, and it will put $1,200 into the Treasury of the United States.

The rules were suspended (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) and the bill was passed.

STOCKTON AND COPPEROPOLIS RAILROAD.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. A few moments ago House bill No. 2019, to forfeit certain public lands granted to the Stockton and Copperopolis Railroad Company in the State of California, was passed under a suspension of the rules. Would it be in order to move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed?

The SPEAKER. The motion to reconsider has been laid upon the table.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I did not hear any motion to reconsider made.

The SPEAKER. The motion to reconsider and lay upon the table is generally indicated by a nod upon the part of the member having the bill in charge.

Mr. BRADLEY. The bill was put through all the forms, and was of course reconsidered and laid upon the table.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. That being the case, I beg to be allowed to state my reason for wanting to make the motion to reconsider. The bill declares that certain lands which have been heretofore granted to certain railroads shall be forfeited and shall be hereafter open to entry and settlement. Congress ought to be careful in making such an enactment, because it is apparent a mere legislative declaration that lands are forfeit cannot defeat any title the railroad may have acquired in that land, and it may turn out, if the lands are open to entry and settlement, years hence upon some decision of the court, the lands belong to the railroad company, and the persons who have entered upon them will come here and ask to be indemnified for the loss they have thus suffered by the lands being taken from them by the decision of the court and for which lands they have already paid their money into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. BRADLEY. I will say it has been considered by the Committee on the Public Lands and recommended by that committee.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I have had my attention called to the fact that there is now a bill pending here appropriating over $400,000 to indemnify certain settlers for lands that had been held to be open for settlement by the Interior Department and had afterward been held by the Supreme Court to have been granted to the State of Iowa by prior act of Congress. Thus the title of the settlers had been defeated and Congress is called upon to indemnify them. We ought to be careful how we indulge in that species of legislation.

Mr. BRADLEY. As I have already stated, the bill has been acted on by the Committee on the Public Lands. They directed me to report it to the House, and I have done so and it was passed under a suspension of the rules. If, however, it should turn out to be true that any such result will follow as that suggested by the gentleman from Vermont, I will have no objection to the bills being reconsidered.

DUTY ON FOREIGN HOPS.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a petition with one name.

There was no objection.

The petition is as follows:

We, the undersigned, believing that the agriculturist as well as the manufacturer should be protected, respectfully petition Congress to levy a duty of fifteen cents per pound on all hops of foreign growth imported into this country.

F. LAKEY and others.

And then, on motion of Mr. HALE, of New York, the House (at twenty minutes to five o'clock p. m.) adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BASS: The petition of Metcalf & Cushing and others, of Buffalo, New York, for the exemption of swine from certain provisions of the law regulating the transportation of live stock, to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. BURCHARD: Resolutions of the board of supervisors of Whiteside County, Illinois, in relation to unsurveyed swamp lands in said county, to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. NIBLACK: The petition of the widow and heirs at law of John C. Clarke, late of Vincennes, Indiana, for compensation for services of said Clarke in carrying the mails, to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. PARSONS: The petition of C. J. Comstock & Burgess and others, pork-packers of Cleveland, Ohio, for the exemption of swine from certain provisions of law in regard to the transportation of live stock, to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. PERRY: The petition of Bridge & Davis, and others, for the exemption of swine from certain provisions of the law regulating the transportation of live stock, to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. SCHUMAKER, of New York: The petition of Weston & Gray, for drawback on certain exports, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. SCUDDER, of New York: The memorial of the Purchace Quarterly Meeting of Friends, in favor of arbitration for the settlement of international difficulties, to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, the petition of James V. Murray, for compensation for use by the United States of his patent for improved port-hole closer, to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. SLOAN: The petition of Bernard Rice, of Augusta, Georgia, for compensation for property destroyed by United States troops, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. SMALL: The petition of John P. Davis, of Laconia, New Hampshire, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, the petition of Ruth Ellen Greland, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, the petition of N. Coffin, for additional compensation for services in the arctic expedition, to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. SPRAGUE: The petition of A. B. Battelle and George D. Evans, for payment of certain moneys due from the United States under contract to furnish beef to the Army, to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, the petition of Hiram B. Riddle, late of Company C, Second North Carolina Veteran Infantry, for relief, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. WALDRON: The petition of Mary A. Allen, widow of George B. Allen, late private Fourth Michigan Cavalry, for her husband's share of reward for capture of Jefferson Davis, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. WILLIE: The petition of Lewis Parker, for relief, to the Committee on War Claims.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, May 12, 1874.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

On motion of Mr. CHANDLER, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday's proceedings was dispensed with.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 3166) to correct the date of commission of certain officers of the Army, received yesterday from the House of Representatives, was taken from the table, and, on motion of Mr. LOGAN, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

BISHOP & CO.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 272) for the relief of Bishop & Co., bankers of Honolulu, Hawaiian Islands, which was passed over informally some days since at the request of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] who told me yesterday that he was satisfied he was in the wrong, and asked that it might be taken up.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I wish to present a petition.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Secretary of State deems it very important that the bill should pass.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DAVIS. I should like to have an explanation of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LOGAN. I object until morning business is through.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will give way to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the present consideration of the bill, which will be laid aside informally to receive morning business.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in pursuance of law, the report of the surveyor-general of New Mexico on the land grant to Gaspar Ortiz, being private land claim reported as No. 87, dated October 20, 1806, Santa Fé County, New Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I am requested by the Universal Peace Union to present a petition, signed by about 900 citizens of the United States, setting forth that they respectfully petition Congress to take immediate measures to second the movement inaugurated by the House of Commons of the Parliament of Great Britain and promulgated by the Queen for conferring with the various governments of the world on the subject of international arbitration, believing that the successful carrying out of this measure will tend to the security of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, and a more perfect international union; will promote economy, commercial intercourse, universal justice, and the general welfare, and while it will be the most potent common defense, it will tend to insure national and international tranquillity, and establish "Peace an earth and good will to all mankind." I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WEST presented the petition of Susan Smith, praying compensation for the value of one horse taken by the United States Army in May, 1863; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MITCHELL presented a petition of citizens of Oregon, praying that a mail-route be established from Linkville, via Lost River Gap, Langell Valley, to Clear Lake in California, thence returning via Tule Lake and Lost River Ford to Linkville; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented the petition of citizens of Yamhill, Oregon, asking the passage of the bill amendatory of the act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Portland to Astoria and McMinnville, in the State of Oregon, approved May 4, 1870; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the petition of Colonel S. A. Moore, of Iowa, praying to be allowed an additional pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of William F. Winshall, of Jasper County, Iowa, praying to be granted an additional pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BOGY presented the memorial of representatives of the Great and Little Osage tribes of Indians, remonstrating against the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 3088) providing for an extension of the time for the completion of entries of Osage Indian lands in Kansas; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. LEWIS presented a petition of citizens of Pennsylvania, praying for the establishment of a military and marine hospital at Massanetta Springs, Rockingham County, Virginia; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SCHURZ presented a petition of 60 citizens of Wheaton, Illinois; a petition of 17 citizens of Dunreith, Indiana; a petition of 92 citizens of Holden and other towns of Illinois; a petition of 28 citizens of Spiceland, Illinois; and petitions of citizens of Portland, Michigan; Galveston, Texas; Fitzwilliam, New Hampshire; Mudlick, North Carolina; West Liberty, Iowa; North Truro, Massachusetts; and Muscatine, Illinois, praying the settlement of international differnces by arbitration instead of by war; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 653) for the relief of E. Boyd Pendleton, late collector of internal revenue, fifth district of Virginia, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. SCOTT, from the Committee on Finance, reported an amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 1572) to amend the several acts providing a national currency, and to establish free banking, and for other purposes; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SCOTT, from the Committee on Railroads, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 732) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Texas Pacific Railroad Company, and to aid in the construction of its road, and for other purposes," reported it with an amendment.

Mr. KELLY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1590) to provide for the better protection of the frontier settlements of Texas against Indian and Mexican depredations, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of M. B. C. True, late commissary-sergeant Company H, Second Iowa Cavalry, praying that a commission be issued to him as captain of Company F, First Mississippi Volunteers, and that he may be paid the difference between the salary of a commissary-sergeant and that of a captain of mounted infantry, reported adversely thereon; and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred a letter of the Secretary of War, transmitting a petition of officers of the Sixth Infantry asking that troops serving on the frontier be placed on a better footing with regard to leave of absence, reported a bill (S. No. 800) to amend an act entitled "An act to increase the pay of soldiers in the United States Army, and for other purposes," approved June 20, 1864; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3001) for the relief of Peter J. Knapp, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2207) for the relief of James M. True, late colonel of the Sixty-second Illinois Volunteer Infantry, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 94) for the relief of Isaac H. Allen, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. WADLEIGH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2091) for the relief of the heirs and next of kin of Colonel William Northedge, deceased, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a letter of the Secretary of War, recommending the passage of a law investing general courts-martial with jurisdiction concurrent with that of the courts of the proper State or Territory in the trial of military persons charged with certain crimes alleged to have been committed therein, reported a bill (S. No. 801) in regard to crimes committed by military persons; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Robert McDonald and other soldiers of Company G, Forty-eighth Regiment Illinois Volunteers, praying for the removal of the charge of desertion against them, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, no legislation being necessary; which was agreed to.

IMPORTATION OF WORKS OF ART.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2989) to authorize the trustees of the Massachusetts Museum of Fine Arts to import and retain for two years certain works of art free of duty, to report it back. I presume there can be no objection to the bill. We have a general law now that permits societies to import articles for their own use, and we also have a general law that permits societies to import articles provided they give bond for their re-exportation within six months. This is to allow a large collection of paintings of the Duke of Montpensier to be imported for exhibition for the term of two years. That is all there is in the bill. There can be no possible objection to it. I therefore ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the trustees of the Museum of Fine Arts, an institution established under the laws of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts for the promotion of the fine arts, to import free of duty a collection of pictures belonging to the Duke of Montpensier, and not intended for sale, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe. A bond is to be given for the payment to the United States of such duties as are now imposed by law upon any and all of such pictures as shall not be re-exported within two years after such importation.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MITCHELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 802) establishing certain mail-routes in the State of Oregon; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. SCOTT. I present the petition of William Wheeler Hubbell, praying for the passage of an act of incorporation of the Columbia Metallurgical Company, with a bill annexed to his petition. I present the petition and ask to have it, with the bill, referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining. I do not know the character of the bill.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 803) to incorporate the Columbia Metallurgical Company, to develop and utilize gold, silver, and improved iron by a new patent process; which was read twice by its title, and, with the petition, referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

Mr. FENTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 804) equalizing pensions of certain officers; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RANSOM asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 805) to provide for the erection of a public building at Asheville, North Carolina; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

EQUESTRIAN STATUE OF GENERAL GREENE.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, I have a concurrent resolution which requires a few words of explanation. Several timely and appropriate resolutions which have been offered by my friend on my right, the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and the interest which the Senate has manifested in the embellishment of the Capitol grounds, have brought freshly to my mind a duty, long neglected, toward one of the most illustrious names in American history.

Mr. President, it is well on toward a hundred years since the Continental Congress decreed a statue to Nathanael Greene, whose sudden and premature death, in the fullness of his fame and in the early prime of his manhood, had impressed his countrymen with a sense of national bereavement to which Congress hastened to give expression. I say a statue. The words of the resolution are:

Resolved, That a monument be erected to the memory of Nathanael Greene, esq., at the seat of the Federal Government, with the following inscription: "Sacred to the memory of Nathanael Greene, esq., a native of the State of Rhode Island, who died on the 19th of June, 1786, late major-general in the service of the United States, and commander of their Army in the southern department."

"The United States in Congress assembled, in honor of his patriotism, valor, and ability, have erected this monument."

Resolved, That the Board of Treasury take order for the execution of the foregoing resolution.

It is manifest that a statue, an equestrian statue, is so much the most suitable form of a monument, in such case, that it may be said to be the only suitable one. I presume that no other would be thought of.

Doubtless a main reason why this resolution of Congress was not promptly carried out was that the seat of the Federal Government had not been established.

This has long since been done, and Washington is fast assuming the proportions, adopting the conveniences, and putting on the adornments that befit the capital city of a Government of forty millions of people.

Architecture, the most useful of the fine arts, naturally led the way. The public buildings of Washington, completed and in process of construction, are among the finest in the world. The capitals of Europe offer nothing to surpass them; and Athens, in the age of her purest taste, would not have disdained the Corinthian beauty of yonder eastern front, or the Doric majesty of the Patent Office. Sculpture and painting follow in natural order. Already in the public squares and in the circles and spaces where the great avenues that bear the names of the States intersect the rectangular streets, the forms of heroes and statesmen rise like sentinels, overlooking the city and keeping perpetual watch, in marble and in bronze, over the Government which they had founded or defended.

This edifice in which we hold our deliberations is one of the most splendid structures that the hands of man have piled upon the solid earth. Its adornment has hardly begun. As the years roll on the statues of the mighty dead will not only crowd the hall dedicated to them, but will meet the eye in the corridors and passages and wherever there is appropriate space. The walls will be covered with pictures representing the great events in American history; and the sister arts will preserve the lineaments of the men who have made that history illustrious, and will thus hold them up, silent monitors, before the eyes of those who have succeeded to their responsibilities.

The grounds of the Capitol have just been enlarged, and measures have been taken for their proper embellishment. To this embellishment sculpture will largely contribute. There must be numerous statues at the entrances and in the grounds. Taking the long roll of those whose immortal memory will claim this distinction, and but a moderate number of whom can be accommodated, no one would omit the name of the Second General of the Revolution, even if the place had not been dedicated to him, first of all, by resolution of Congress. To keep in mind that pledge to preserve to him the place already assigned to him, and to designate its exact location is the purpose of the resolution.

The concurrent resolution was read and agreed to, as follows:

Whereas the Continental Congress resolved, on the 8th of August, 1786, that a monument be erected at the seat of the Federal Government bearing the inscription, "Sacred to the memory of Nathanael Greene, esq., a native of the State of Rhode Island, who died on the 19th of June, 1786, late major-general in the service of the United States and commander of their Army in the southern department. The United States, in Congress assembled, in honor of his patriotism, valor, and ability, have erected this monument:" Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be instructed to designate upon the Capitol grounds a site for an equestrian statue of Nathanael Greene, in conformity with the foregoing resolution.

BISHOP & CO.

Mr. CHANDLER. Now let us proceed with Senate bill No. 272.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 272) for the relief of Bishop & Co., bankers, of Honolulu, Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not want to object to the bill, but I want to know what it means.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will explain the bill. Bishop & Co. were a banking house in Honolulu, and discounted a draft of our consul for the relief of distressed seamen. In 1872 a very large number of our vessels were wrecked on the Pacific Ocean, clear up to Behring's Straits, and the draft on the fund was larger than the amount appropriated. When this particular draft was presented at the Treasury Department the fund itself was exhausted, and that was the only reason it was not paid; and it went back protested to Honolulu through the Bank of California. The Secretary of State informs me that the honor of the Government is at stake for the payment of this small sum, which was advanced in good faith to protect the honor of this Government by this banking house in Honolulu.

Mr. DAVIS. I notice that the bill requires interest to be paid. That is very unusual for the Government.

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly it provides for interest. Bankers as a general rule obtain interest when they loan money for two or three years.

Mr. DAVIS. But the Government does not often pay it.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Government does not often refuse to pay its obligations at maturity; but when the Government is in default, I ask the Senator whether he would not make good to the party who has suffered the actual loss on account of laches on the part of the Government? These bankers advanced the money to the Government. It was advanced to a consul to relieve our seamen who had been wrecked. These drafts are drawn all over the world where we have seamen, drawn every day upon our Treasury, and drawn in accordance with law; and yet because this fund was exhausted at the time they allowed it to go back protested.

Mr. DAVIS. When was it?

Mr. CHANDLER. In 1872, at a time when there was a vast number of wrecks on the Pacific Ocean.

Mr. DAVIS. Was the full amount paid by the banking house?

Mr. CHANDLER. None of it was paid. The draft was protested and went back to Honolulu. It was discounted for the bank in Honolulu by the Bank of California, and from there came on to the Government of the United States and was protested, and went back through the Bank of California to the bankers in Honolulu.

Mr. DAVIS. It is suggested by two Senators on this side that I should ask what shave there was. [Laughter.]

Mr. CHANDLER. That I do not know; I was not there.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SITE FOR A SCHOOL AT SAINT AUGUSTINE.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I ask the Senate to take up a little bill which will not take a minute; and I make the application at the instance of the Senator from Florida, [Mr. GILBERT,] who does not often trouble the Senate. It is merely to set aside a small lot of ground at Saint Augustine, Florida, for a public school. The bill has been reported favorably. It has been submitted to the Secretary of the Treasury, and I have his letter here approving of it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If this bill takes any time I must insist on the understanding yesterday, and after this bill anyhow.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. This will not take time.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 782) to grant a site for the Peabody school in Saint Augustine, Florida.

By the bill the western part of the lot of land in Saint Augustine, Florida, lying at the corner of Tolamato and King streets, and now the property of the United States, that part having a south front upon King street of two hundred feet and a west end upon Tolamato street of one hundred and sixty-seven and three-tenths feet, a rear upon the north of two hundred feet, and an east end of one hundred and sixty-seven and three-tenths feet, is ceded, given, and granted to the board of trustees of the Peabody school of Saint Augustine, Florida, and to their successors; and the trustees are authorized to erect thereon such a building as in their judgment shall be for the best advantage of the school.

The amendments reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds were, in line 11, to strike out the words "trustees of the Peabody school," and insert "education of the State of Florida, for the use of a public free school in the city;" and also in line 13 to strike out the word "trustees" and insert "board of education of;" so as to read:

Granted to the board of education of the State of Florida for the use of a public free school in the city of Saint Augustine, Florida, and to their successors; and the said board of education are hereby fully authorized to erect thereon such a building as in their judgment shall be for the best advantage of the school.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suggest to the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds that, as the United States are furnishing a foundation for this school, we ought to provide that no distinction of race or color should be made in any school that is to be kept there. This is a school to be in the center of a city, a public school; and if we are to contribute, as I am perfectly willing to do, property in aid of it, we ought to provide that discrimination founded upon race and color shall never be made in respect to the admission of pupils there.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I believe the fact is that there is no discrimination now made. The Senator from Florida can answer that. I think there is no discrimination now made in the school.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendments reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to add, that if at any time any discrimination shall be made in the admission of pupils to the school on the ground of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, then this grant shall determine, and the property shall revert to the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reduced to writing, and reported from the desk.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Provided, That if at any time in the admissions to the school hereby established there shall be any exclusion on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, the grant hereby made shall determine, and the property revert to the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to this amendment?

Mr. SPRAGUE. I object.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I understand that there is no discrimination made there; but this school is largely supported by private contributions of citizens of the place. I do not know what effect this proviso might have. I do not object to it if the Senator from Florida does not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

Mr. ALCORN. I trust the amendment may be adopted. It is time now that we should begin to legislate here in the direction of breaking down these distinctions. In the Southern States we have forgotten these distinctions, and the legislation there bears the characteristic marks of no distinction on account of race, color, or previous condition. While I am here, I propose to make that order of things which is established so firmly in the Southern States extend its beneficent influences throughout the nation. Equal rights to-day prevail throughout the borders of the Southern States—I mean the States like Mississippi, where the republicans dominate. The theory is now sectional; I propose to make it national; and I come very cheerfully to the support of the amendment of the honorable Senator from Vermont. Let us have equal rights in all the schools, and let us have civil rights as the law of the land, and then we shall not hear any more of these distinctions on account of race or color. I support the amendment with great pleasure.

Mr. CONOVER. I ask to have the amendment read again. I think my colleague did not hear it. He introduced the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read again.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment proposed by Mr. EDMUNDS.

Mr. STOCKTON. I trust——

Mr. SCHURZ. Will the Senator from New Jersey permit me a moment?

Mr. STOCKTON. Certainly.

Mr. SCHURZ. I see that there is going to be a long discussion on this subject which will reduce the time which we expected to have for the discussion of the bill which is the unfinished business for to-day to such an extent that it will in all probability prevent the full exchange of opinions, and, as the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] suggests to me, this is in direct violation of the agreement that the Geneva award bill should be taken up immediately after the legitimate morning business had been disposed of. I shall therefore insist that we now proceed with the consideration of that bill. I should have insisted upon it before had I not expected that other gentlemen would take the floor and I preferred not to be in their way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the Senator has correctly stated the understanding of the Senate; but it was a mere understanding which it is not for the Chair to enforce, but for the Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. I object, then, to the further consideration of this bill at the present time.

Mr. SCHURZ. I shall take the floor if the understanding is to be adhered to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey has the floor on the pending bill unless he waives it.

Mr. STOCKTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair cannot enforce the understandings of the Senate.

Mr. STOCKTON. I rose simply to make a remark on the bill that was before the Senate as it came from a committee of which I am a member as a simple bill to cede a little piece of ground that the United States does not want to a school in Florida. On that a gentleman in the Senate proposes to add a question which has been debated here very earnestly, a question which every Senator knows cannot be determined without a long debate. The object of my rising was simply to state that fact, and to suggest that the bill had better go over if the Senator from Vermont insists on his amendment. I yielded the floor to the Senator from Missouri supposing he had the same object in view. That is all I have to say. But if the matter is pressed, and the Senate chooses to consider the question, no Senator will suppose that, coming from the committee that reported this bill, I can sit silent and see such an amendment fastened on the bill without explaining it to the Senate. I think the proper course is the one suggested by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. SCHURZ. I insist on the agreement which we arrived at yesterday that immediately after the close of the regular morning business the Geneva award bill should come up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can make the motion to lay this bill on the table. It is before the Senate and must be disposed of in some way.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I called up the bill at the instance of the Senator from Florida. I have no idea that he wishes in any way to interfere with the understanding. If it is to lead to debate I will withdraw it.

Mr. SCHURZ. The Senator from New Jersey must have understood so from his colleague.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the pending bill being laid aside informally? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 2019) to forfeit certain public lands granted to the Stockton and Copperopolis Railroad, in the State of California;

A bill (H. R. No. 2545) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875;

A bill (H. R. No. 2846) repealing the act entitled "An act fixing the time for the election of Representatives from the State of California to the Forty-fourth Congress;"

A bill (H. R. No. 3281) to amend the act entitled "An act to amend an act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 2, 1864;

A bill (H. R. No. 3335) authorizing the Secretary of War to grant a right of way across a corner of the Fort Gratiot military reservation to the city railroad company, Port Huron, Michigan;

A bill (H. R. No. 3338) to amend section 1 of an act entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the Army and Navy pension laws," approved March 3, 1873;

A bill (H. R. No. 3339) relating to the disposition of certain lands to be reclaimed in sections 14, 23, and 26 in township 16 north, of range 20, in the county of Sheboygan, in the State of Wisconsin; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3250) to confirm pre-emption and homestead entries of public lands within the limits of railroad grants in cases where such entries have been made under the regulations of the Land Department.

THE GENEVA AWARD.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 7) for the creation of a court for the adjudication and disposition of certain moneys received into the Treasury under an award made by the tribunal of arbitration constituted by virtue of the first article of the treaty concluded at Washington the 8th of May, A. D. 1871, between the United States of America and the Queen of Great Britain, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. THURMAN, which was to strike out in section 12, commencing on line 13, the following words:

> And no claim shall be admissible or allowed by said court by or in behalf of any insurance company or insurer, either in its or his own right or as assignee, or otherwise, in the right of a person or party insured as aforesaid, unless such claimant shall show, to the satisfaction of said court, that during the late rebellion the sum of its or his losses, in respect to its or his war risks, exceeded the sum of its or his premiums or other gains upon or in respect to such war risks; and in case of any such allowance, the same shall not be greater than such excess of loss.

Mr. SCHURZ. Mr. President, the debate on the so-called Geneva award bill has so far mainly turned on the point whether the insurance companies, as such, should be entitled to any share of the money awarded to us by the Geneva tribunal and paid us by Great Britain.

It seems to me that the question before us is not exclusively a question between the Government of the United States and its citizens. It is a question resulting from a great international transaction, one of the most important of our times. The settlement of our differences with Great Britain by arbitration was a most solemn proceeding, which was hailed the world over as an epoch of progress, and is to stand as an example to mankind. That is the light in which we held it up ourselves.

The distribution of the money awarded to us by the tribunal of arbitration is to be the final consummation of that solemn proceeding, and it is therefore a matter of the highest interest not only to ourselves, but in a certain sense to all the parties concerned in that arbitration and to civilized mankind generally. Our dealings with the money paid to us should be marked not only with the utmost fairness to our own fellow-citizens, but by the strictest regard to our obligation in the spirit of the decision made by the international tribunal at Geneva. Only in this way can we secure the full fruit of the arbitration policy to mankind, maintain our national honor, and serve our true interests.

Now I desire the Senate to mark one important feature of this business. There is a certain relation between the treaty of Washington and the proceedings and decision of the Geneva tribunal, which in the performance of the last act closing up the whole transaction we ought never to lose sight of. It is of the highest importance. The treaty of Washington laid down certain rules governing the duties of neutrals, rules not until then generally recognized. The decision of the Geneva tribunal was the first authoritative construction of the meaning of those rules, and that decision defines what acts or omissions shall be specifically considered as establishing the liability of a neutral, violating those rules, for damages, and also what classes and items of losses incurred by a belligerent nation itself or suffered by the subjects of a belligerent government in consequence of the violation of those rules shall enter into the computation of and in the award for such damages. Thus these two things, the rules laid down in the treaty of Washington and the decision of the Geneva tribunal, together constitute the great precedent, the rule, or the law, as far as rule and law can be established by precedent, which may be expected to govern the settlement of future international differences of a similar kind.

Now the question for us to decide is this: shall we recognize the precedent as established by the treaty of Washington and by the Geneva decision combined by a strict adherence to the spirit of the latter? Is it our interest, is it our duty to do so?

First. Let me say a few words upon the question of interest.

The situation and the natural policy of the United States are such that we may expect to remain neutral in the great international conflicts of the world. The United States are emphatically the great neutral power of the earth, and the interests of the United States therefore are emphatically the interests of a neutral power. Now, the treaty of Washington has enlarged, or more strictly defined, the duties of neutrals compared with formerly recognized rules. That is not to the advantage of neutrals. But the Geneva decision in construing those rules has restricted the specific liability of neutrals for non-fulfillment of neutral duties by act or omission to certain narrow and well-defined limits. And that is for the advantage of neutrals. It is therefore the manifest interest of the United States that those limitations be confirmed and sanctioned as clearly and strictly as possible, and in every way that we can confirm and sanction them. We should, having our interests as neutrals in view, by our own acts, especially by the disposition of the money awarded to us, testify that we consider those limitations strictly binding, that we know exactly and confirm what the indemnity was paid for, because our own acts will certainly be used as precedents in future cases in which we may be a party as neutrals and other powers may be parties as belligerents.

Now, the question arises, what are those limitations of the liability of neutrals in similar cases, as fixed by the decision of the Geneva tribunal, and for what was the award of money made to us? The representatives of the United States presented before that tribunal a long list of claims, partly of a national and partly of a private character. The national claims were composed of the following: First, claims for the prolongation of the war and the addition of a large sum to the cost of the war; second, claims for the losses incurred by the transfer of a large portion of the American commercial marine to the British flag; and, third, claims for the national expenditure in the pursuit of cruisers. These claims were thrown out by the arbitrators; in fact the United States themselves declared that they had submitted those claims only for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of the tribunal of arbitration upon them. The tribunal therefore decided that for such losses a neutral shall not be liable in a similar case.

But certain classes of private claims were also thrown out: First, claims for the enhanced payment of insurances, that is to say for the war premiums generally; secondly, for prospective earnings of vessels destroyed; and, thirdly, for gross freights. The tribunal therefore decided that for losses of a private nature belonging to these three classes a neutral shall not be liable in a similar case.

What claims then were decided by the tribunal to be valid as against a neutral for violation of the rules laid down in the treaty of Washington? They were the following: Those for the value of vessels captured or destroyed by cruisers circumstanced like the Alabama, the Shenandoah, and the Florida; those made for cargoes of vessels so captured and destroyed; those made for net freights, and for personal losses, and wages of officers and seamen within certain limitations. These were all of the nature of private losses, losses suffered by private individuals, with the exception of two or three transports chartered by the Government, which, however, fall also under the same head of "property destroyed." For these losses money was awarded to us, and for nothing else in the world. That is the record of the Geneva tribunal. Such losses, then, as decided by the Geneva tribunal, constitute in similar cases the liability, and the whole liability, of a neutral violating his duties under the three rules of neutral obligation laid down in the treaty of Washington.

Now, sir, I ask shall we recognize that decision with all its strict limitations, and sanction it as a precedent to rule in future in similar cases? I submit that it is our interest, our manifest interest as the great neutral power of the world, to do so. But we can do so only by adhering in the distribution of the money awarded to us distinctly in consideration of such private losses with the utmost strictness to the spirit of the Geneva decision, and above all things by guarding very carefully against the slipping in of any vague notion of national loss and national indemnity, as is claimed by a nation from its conquered enemy, in construing for ourselves the decision of the Geneva tribunal. If we permit the idea of national loss and a national indemnity in that sense to slip into our own construction of the Geneva decision, we shall establish a precedent for ourselves which, upsetting the limitations decided upon at Geneva, will become, nay is certain to become, very troublesome to us if we ever as a neutral become in future involved in a similar difficulty.

It is demanded of us by the committee that the insurance companies who by the United States were brought forward as legitimate claimants before the Geneva tribunal, and whose claims entered into the computation of losses upon which the award was made to us, shall be excluded from the distribution of the money so to us awarded and paid. It is claimed that the Government of the United States, having received the money awarded by the Geneva tribunal, may distribute that money as it pleases, without respect to the claims upon the computation of which the money was awarded, or that the Government may keep the money altogether in the Treasury as if it were a national indemnity obtained by war. Indeed the exclusion of the underwriters can scarce be defended upon any other theory. To make it clear, let me use this illustration There were before the Geneva tribunal double claims, so called, mostly arising in this way: An insurance company claimed for a vessel lost, and the original owner of the vessel claimed for the same vessel lost. The double claims were of course as such rejected, but the single claims were allowed. That is to say, the amount claimed for the value of the vessel was once, but not twice allowed in the computation of damages. Now we are asked to say that the original owners cannot claim for that vessel because they were compensated by the insurance company, which is true, and the insurance company cannot claim for that vessel because they were compensated by the war premiums which they received. But the vessel was lost; it entered into the computation on which the award was made; upon that award the money was paid to us. For the vessel so lost we received the money. What shall we do with that money? We are not to pay the owner, because he was paid by the insurance company. We are not to pay the insurance company, according to the theory of the committee, because that insurance company was paid by the war premiums. Whom are we to pay? Are we to keep the money in our own Treasury? That certainly is not what it was given for. But who are the losers, who are to be compensated, according to the theory of the committee? Those who paid the war premiums. And yet the Geneva tribunal expressly decided that for war premiums no damages could be claimed. Upon what theory in the world, then, can we throw out these claims? Upon no other, but that we received the indemnity as a national indemnity, just as we would have extorted from a conquered enemy, which we can dispose of just as we please; that the Government may keep or expend the money, not as a trust fund awarded to it upon a special ground and for a special purpose, but as national property obtained, not for private losses, but for a national grievance. That is the theory of the committee. You need only to look at the proceedings and at the decision of the Geneva tribunal to arrive at once at the conclusion that this upsets the whole theory of the Geneva decision itself, with all its limitations as to the principles on which the liability of neutrals in similar cases is defined and determined. We may not care about the legal rights of the insurance companies, but we ought to care about the position the Government of the United States takes in this transaction, and the important precedent it establishes by its construction of the Geneva decision, which is much more important than all the private interests involved in this case.

I insist, therefore, that it is the evident, the manifest, and the imperative interest of the United States, as a neutral power, strictly to regard in the distribution of the award the claims and the rights of the claimants upon the computation of which the award was made by the Geneva tribunal and the money was paid to us; and it is equally evident that it cannot be done if the claims of insurance companies or any other class of claims which were not excluded by the Geneva tribunal, but distinctly recognized in the basis of computation, are arbitrarily thrown out by ourselves upon the vague theory of a national indemnity in place of a fund received in trust for private claimants.

Mr. HOWE. I do not mean to say anything by way of controverting the argument of the Senator from Missouri; but I wish to suggest to him one difficulty that occurs to my mind in the way of our protecting ourselves as a neutral power against the future operation of the three celebrated rules, by any possible distribution we can make of the fund now in our hands; and that difficulty is this: It is true, as the Senator says, that the tribunal decided against what were called indirect claims and measured our damages under the three rules by the estimated value of the property destroyed by the cruisers, with some little additions for other circumstances. But, if I remember aright, the tribunal made that decision throwing out the indirect claims, when one of the parties to the arbitration was insisting that no such claim was before the arbitrators, had not been submitted, and that they never had agreed in the treaty to submit any such claims. Now if it should turn out that the treaty did not submit to the arbitrators what were called the indirect claims, will any future power that may call us to account under the three rules hereafter be precluded from saying, "I will not go into arbitration unless you do allow indirect claims to be considered by the tribunal?"

Mr. SCHURZ. I do not think that contingency will arise. If I remember correctly, and I think I do, the tribunal did not decide that the indirect claims had never been before it. It is true that the agents of the British government insisted that they were not before the tribunal, but the tribunal passed an opinion upon the indirect claims as if they had been before it, throwing them out as not being entitled to consideration under the rules laid down in the treaty of Washington.

Mr. HOWE. The difference being this: it was the decision of a tribunal without jurisdiction if these claims had not been submitted. They had jurisdiction of whatever claims were submitted under the treaty; but one party insisted that these claims were not submitted under the treaty. They decided, to be sure, that if they had been submitted, they could not be allowed. If they had been submitted, it would be the decision of a court having jurisdiction; if they were not submitted, it was the decision of a court without jurisdiction.

Mr. SCHURZ. I think I could satisfy the Senator from Wisconsin by reading the opinion of the tribunal on this head. It was this:

Count Sclopis then, on behalf of all the arbitrators, made the following statement:

"The application of the agent of Her Britannic Majesty's government being now before the arbitrators, the president of the tribunal (Count Sclopis) proposes to make the following communication on the part of the arbitrators to the parties interested:

"'The arbitrators wish it to be understoodthat in the observations which they are about to make they have in view solely the application of the agent of Her Britannic Majesty's government, which is now before them, for an adjournment, which might be prolonged till the month of February in next year; and the motives for that application, namely, the difference of opinion which exists between Her Britannic Majesty's government and the Government of the United States as to the competency of the tribunal, under the treaty of Washington, to deal with the claims advanced in the case of the United States in respect of losses under the several heads of—1. "The losses in the transfer of the American commercial marine to the British flag;" 2. "The enhanced payments of insurance;" and, 3. "The prolongation of the war, and the addition of a large sum to the cost of the war and the suppression of the rebellion;" and the hope which Her Britannic Majesty's government does not abandon, that if sufficient time were given for that purpose, a solution of the difficulty which has thus arisen, by the negotiation of a supplementary convention between the two governments, might be found practicable.

"'The arbitrators do not propose to express or imply any opinion upon the point thus in difference between the two governments as to the interpretation or effect of the treaty; but it seems to them obvious that the substantial object of the adjournment must be to give the two governments an opportunity of determining whether the claims in question shall or shall not be submitted to the decision of the arbitrators, and that any difference between the two governments on this point may make the adjournment unproductive of any useful effect, and, after a delay of many months, during which both nations may be kept in a state of painful suspense, may end in a result which, it is to be presumed, both governments would equally deplore, that of making this arbitration wholly abortive. This being so, the arbitrators think it right to state that, after the most careful perusal of all that has been urged on the part of the Government of the United States in respect to these claims, they have arrived, individually and collectively, at the conclusion that these claims do not constitute, upon the principles of international law applicable to such cases, good foundation for an award of compensation or computation of damages between nations, and should, upon such principles, be wholly excluded from the consideration of the tribunal in making its award, even if there were no disagreement between the two governments as to the competency of the tribunal to decide thereon.'"

So it appears that not upon the difficulty which had arisen between Great Britain and the United States, but upon principles of international law, including the rules laid down in the treaty of Washington, they came to the conclusion to rule out these claims. But I think that even if the Senator from Wisconsin were right in his apprehension, it would not militate against my argument; it would still be our interest, when there is a limitation of the liability of neutrals, authoritatively and expressly defined, to accept it and to abstain from doing anything to invalidate it.

Having discussed the question of interest, I now approach the question of duty; and I affirm that to distribute the money awarded to us by the tribunal and paid to us by Great Britain among the legitimate claimants whose claims were presented before the tribunal and upon a computation of which the award was made without arbitrarily excluding any class of claims, is on our part a duty of good faith generally; it is a duty of the Government of the United States to its own citizens; it is a duty to the arbitrators; and it is a duty to England.

Why is it a duty of good faith on our part? Because the Government of the United States, after all national claims had been thrown out, still brought forward the private claims of its citizens, and among them the claims of the insurance companies, representing that it wanted payment for them, in order to indemnify them out of the gross sum thus awarded. That the Government of the United States made that distinct representation appears from the language of its own agent before the Geneva tribunal; and here I wish to call the attention of the Senate to some declarations of Mr. Davis, the agent of the United States Government, which so far have not been quoted, and which I consider of the utmost significance and importance. Mr. Davis in his report to Mr. Fish, page 4 of the pamphlet edition of the protocol, said:

A circular was issued under the immediate direction of the Secretary of State informing claimants that all claims growing out of the acts of cruisers would be presented to the tribunal, leaving that body to determine as to their merits.

Mr. Davis in his last statement to the arbitrators accompanying certain revised and amended tables of claims, which had been criticised by the British agent, said:

The United States make a claim for all the separate parts of a ship, whether the owner of some smaller part appears or not, because the United States will have to answer to all the owners in case the tribunal shall award a gross sum to the United States.

Thus speaks the agent of the United States before the Geneva tribunal:

Because the United States will have to answer to all the owners in case the tribunal shall award a gross sum to the United States. Not to allow such a claim would be manifest injustice. The object of the treaty is to indemnify the United States for all the losses suffered by their citizens, and not to impose a part of that indemnification upon the United States themselves.

What does that mean? It implies, as the agent of the United States declared before the Geneva tribunal, that the United States would have to make up for the deficiency to the claimants if the award made by the Geneva tribunal should not prove sufficient for the purpose.

Again, the British agent had complained that the agent of the United States had prosecuted certain claims for injury to sailors who had not themselves made any claims, and in replying to this Mr. Davis said to the tribunal, and I wish the Senate to mark these words:

But if the tribunal shall send these claims to the assessors, England will be held by the stipulations of the treaty to pay to the United States the amount fixed by the assessors without restriction either of affirmative or negative proofs. In such a case not sailors alone, but also owners, insurers, and others who have not yet presented their claims will have the right to do so before the assessors. Such is the clear meaning of the treaty.

Thus the agent of the United States before the Geneva tribunal solemnly asserted that, among other claimants, the insurers would have the right to appear before the assessors and that their claims could not be denied even if they had so far neglected to file them.

Now, the tribunal did award a gross sum, and in his letter to the Secretary of State, Mr. Davis, after relating that the neutral arbitrators and Mr. Adams were convinced of the policy of awarding a sum in gross, thus reports:

We therefore devoted our energies to securing such a sum as should be practically an indemnity to the sufferers. Whether we have or have not been successful can be determined only by the final division of the award.

Thus the agent of the United States repeatedly declared before the tribunal that the money to be awarded was wanted not for the United States to be distributed by the Government in its discretion, arbitrarily, but for the satisfaction of private claims, inclusive of those of insurers. To repudiate such a declaration by our mode of distribution would be an act of bad faith of which no government which has self-respect ought to render itself guilty.

Why is it a duty of the Government to its own citizens? The Government of the United States called upon its citizens to present their claims. They did so, beginning in 1863. The insurance claims were among the first presented. They were among the very claims that the President had proposed in his message the Government should acquire by purchase, thus exercising an indirect pressure upon the Government of Great Britain, which had some effect in bringing on a renewal of negotiations. Upon the ground of these claims we demanded indemnity from Great Britain. Had there been no private claims there would have been no indemnity, for all the national claims had been thrown out. Had there been no insurance claims, there would not have been so large an indemnity, for the insurance claims constituted a very important part of the list of claims upon which a computation for the award was made. Having received indemnity for the satisfaction of private claims, how can the Government now appropriate a single farthing of that money to itself or to any arbitrary use, as long as any legal private claim so preferred, so urged, so used in the computation upon which the award was made and for which the money was paid, remains unpaid? It cannot unless the Government repudiates its duty to its citizens.

Why is it a duty of the Government to the arbitrators? The Government of the United States presented these claims, and among them the insurance claims, before the arbitrators as true and valid claims, leading the arbitrators to believe that they were presented in perfect good faith. We maintained them against the adverse criticism of England, and our agent insisted that the gross sum to be awarded should be large, because otherwise the United States might be called upon to make up to the private claimants what the arbitrators failed to give. Now, how in the world can the Government throw out and refuse to pay a class of claims upon the justice of which the United States insisted before the arbitrators, and for the satisfaction of which the arbitrators thereupon awarded a gross sum? Certainly we cannot do so without an insult to the arbitrators themselves.

Lastly, I say it is our duty to England, and why is it so? There has been so strong a feeling against England on account of the losses suffered by the depredations of the confederate cruisers that those very vessels were often called "English pirates." England paid fifteen and a half millions, all that was awarded by the tribunal, to satisfy the amount of private damages suffered by the citizens of the United States in consequence of her negligence in fulfilling her duties as a neutral; and England has a right to expect that by the distribution of the money paid the private claimants shall be satisfied and their feelings of private injury removed. She might have insisted upon a board of assessors if she had desired to do so; and in that board of assessors she herself would have been represented and exercised an influence and made sure that every legitimate private claim would be paid. Now, mark you, it was at the desire of the United States that the award of a gross sum was made, to which England consented. Can we now in distributing that sum in gross, without having England represented here, as she would have been in a board of assessors, refuse to pay any private claimant that England would have been obliged to pay had the distribution been remitted to a board of assessors? Certainly we cannot if we want to be just to England. Our moral obligation to distribute this money among the private claimants, for the satisfaction of whose claims it was distinctly awarded by the tribunal and paid by Great Britain, is at least equal to the obligation of England to pay that gross sum when it was awarded by the Geneva tribunal.

These, sir, are the reasons which induce me to insist that the money paid to us by Great Britain should be used in satisfying the legal private claims for the satisfaction of which that money was awarded by the tribunal of arbitration and paid by Great Britain without any arbitrary distinction between the claims. I have not discussed whether the insurance companies or any owners of vessels who insured themselves have made or lost money during or in consequence of the war, simply because that has nothing at all to do with the merits of the case before us. I have shown that our obligation rests upon a basis quite different from that.

To distribute the indemnity among the claimants for whose satisfaction the money was awarded and paid to us, we are bound by every consideration of good faith, of national honor, of national interest, and of sound policy. We cannot refuse to do so; we cannot set up for ourselves rules and theories adverse to the representations advanced by our own agents at Geneva in support of the private claims upon which the award was made, and adverse to the theory upon which the arbitrators made their decision—we cannot do that I say without striking a fatal blow at the beneficent results of the system of international arbitration so auspiciously inaugurated. Do you know what is going on at the present moment in England? The treaty of Washington and the arbitration is being bitterly assailed there on the ground that too much was yielded to the United States. Let it now be understood that the Government of the United States arbitrarily puts a construction upon the Geneva decision different from the obvious intention of the tribunal itself; that we presented and urged private claims upon one theory before the tribunal and then disposed of the money awarded in consideration thereof upon another theory, thus laying ourselves open to the suspicion of sharp practice, and we shall have furnished a most dangerous weapon to the enemies of this method of settling international difficulties. We may thus give the system of arbitration the finishing blow for a long time to come. And I would entreat Senators to consider well what they are doing in this case, for it is impossible to overestimate the importance of the question before us.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, the agreement under which we now proceed leaves so little time for further debate, that I feel at liberty to take for myself only a brief space.

The measure before us deserves more attention than it seems likely to receive. It involves the disposition of $17,000,000, and the rights of all in this great sum—it may involve more money than $17,000,000. Should the fund be so distributed or applied that the future shall find fault with the work, yet other moneys may be needed when we are gone to fulfill the obligations on which we are about to pronounce. But our action affects much beside money. The affair has become noticeable and memorable throughout the world. It involves the dignity, the character, the discretion, and the reputation of the American people. The disposition of the award made at Geneva, is the closing act in a great transaction, in which the part borne by our Government thus far has redounded to the renown of the country, and to the advancement of reason and civilization. It will be lamentable if from inattention or error anything shall occur now or hereafter to mar one of the greatest achievements of diplomacy and peace.

The bill in all its parts, I have never believed as wise as amendment could make it. I do not believe it needful or wise to create a special court, of five judges and other officers, for the sole purpose of deciding questions touching this fund. A court to exist for eighteen months, with rules and practice to be invented by itself, and with no appeal to the regular judicial tribunals, seems to me not needed and not so convenient, so economical, or so satisfactory at last, as would be the action of the regular courts of the nation, with the right of review in the Supreme Court. In this respect I prefer a plan of the House of Representatives, but I will not dwell upon it.

Again, if Congress deems itself free to distribute or devote the money as it pleases, or as it deems just as a new and original question, I think the same rule proposed in respect of insurance companies, should be applied to other persons also. So, too, in the same view, it seems to me a doubtful distinction is made against owners of vessels and cargoes which fell a prey to corsairs other than those named in the judgment given at Geneva. If the judgment of the arbitrators does not bind us and govern the use to be made of the money, and we are to find equities for ourselves, it seems to me we should listen to the petition of him whose vessel was burned or sunk by the Shenandoah whether before or after her recruitment at Melbourne.

This brings me to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio. The bill excludes underwriters—excludes them by providing that none of them shall receive anything unless upon their gross transactions during the whole period of the rebellion, counting all profits and losses, they were losers.

The amendment is to strike out this exclusion, and to give them a day in court. The amendment does not require anything to be paid to underwriters, but only to remit them to the so-called court, with such rights as the treaty, the award, and the law give them.

Upon this amendment we must face the whole question of the nature of the fund, and the relations and duty of the Government in regard to it.

If the seventeen million, be the money of the United States as its own, to do with it what it pleases, there is an end of the question of claims. No underwriter, or vessel-owner, or sufferers, or citizen whatever has any claim, or right. There can be no claim—there is no right in any one to demand a penny. Petitions may come, but like the cry for aid from the deluged fields of Mississippi, they must be addressed to the discretion of Congress fettered by nothing but the Constitution.

If the money is only part of the money in the public Treasury, it may be used to build light-houses, or life-saving stations—it may appropriately be given to sufferers by war and by sea, all of whom are by no means included in the bill.

If, however, the money be in whole or in part a trust fund recovered or obtained by reason of losses suffered by citizens, it is subject to the rights of those on whose losses it rests.

Whatever the law would exact of a custodian having no shield of sovereignty to ward off the law, the United States is bound to do—and for a refusal to do it the Government and the nation must answer at the bar of the nations.

This has not been denied. The dispute is in regard to the nature and ownership of the fund. The bill affirms that the money is the money of the nation, subject absolutely to the will of Congress—thus of course denying that the Government is in any sense a trustee, and denying that any individual or class has a right to claim any part of it.

With this argument I cannot agree. It seems to me that however the case may be wanting in some of the technical features of a naked trust, the fund is a special one, acquired in satisfaction of certain claims, and that the owners of those claims are in right and in equity, as well as in law, the owners also of the money with which the claims were answered.

Our claims against Great Britain were, from the first, of two classes, national and individual—so they continued until the Geneva tribunal pronounced against one class almost wholly, and from thence onward the claims were for direct destruction of vessels and cargoes. The award made was for, if not in terms upon, these claims, and only a small proportion of the award was for anything but losses of American citizens inflicted by rebel cruisers—from this it follows in law and in reason that the fund in question in large part represents such claims. The recognition, even the rightful existence of such claims, is denied by the honorable Senator from New Jersey, and he grounds his denial on a statute, with which I begin as the first step to prove their right to be heard and to be satisfied. In 1799 Congress enacted the statute to which the Senator referred. I read it:

If any person, being a citizen of the United States, whether he be actually resident, or abiding within the United States, or in any foreign country, shall, without the permission or authority of the Government of the United States, directly or indirectly, commence, or carry on, any verbal or written correspondence or intercourse with any foreign government, or any officer or agent thereof, with an intent to influence the measures or conduct of any foreign government, or of any officer or agent thereof, in relation to any disputes or controversies with the United States, or defeat the measures of the Government of the United States; or if any person, being a citizen of or resident within the United States, and not duly authorized, shall counsel, advise, aid, or assist in any such correspondence, with intent, as aforesaid, he or they shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and on conviction before any court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, and by imprisonment during a term not less than six months, nor exceeding three years.

In passing I call the attention of my friend to the fact that here is a case where a maximum and minimum punishment is found in a penal statute of the United States, although this fact relates to another matter as he will understand.

Provided always, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to abridge the right of individual citizens of the United States to apply by themselves, or their lawful agents, to any foreign government, or the agents thereof, for the redress of any injuries in relation to person or property which such individuals may have sustained from such government, or any of its agents, citizens, or subjects.

Upon this statute I make two comments: First, it has nothing to do with such claims as we are now considering—nothing even in the body of the statute touches them; second, by the proviso is reserved, even supposing the act to cover the point to which it was cited, to every citizen the right by his own direct action to apply for to foreign states, and to pursue redress in respect of injuries to his interests, whether of property or otherwise. With or without such a statute, the Government of the United States, like other civilized governments, has ever accepted a doctrine which I think may be stated thus: That every citizen has the right of the intercession with foreign powers, at all times, and carried to all reasonable lengths, of the government to which he pays allegiance; and that by as much as it is the custom of governments to repress private transactions and negotiations by their citizens with foreign governments, by so much it is their duty and their habit to represent their citizens in respect of their claims upon other nationalities. As often as we hear of French spoliations, we hear confirmation of this rule. Analyze the complaint upon which the memorialists in respect of French spoliations rest their claims and the argument is, first, that the Government of the United States did not actually go to war, although it went to the verge of war to maintain their rights; and, second, that after exhausting the resources of diplomacy it gave up, and as they say virtually, canceled hopeless claims. The argument in such cases always proceeds on the idea that it is the bounden duty of a government to undertake, and having undertaken to faithfully pursue, the ends of justice whenever meritorious claims are presented by its citizens.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Shall I disturb my friend if I ask him a question?

Mr. CONKLING. Not at all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to ask the Senator from New York if in the case of the French spoliations, to which he refers, the treaty with France on the subject does not provide entirely for illegal spoliations, illegal seizures, and does not also provide that the United States will give indemnity to its citizens, taking a gross sum from France therefor? That is the claim of the French spoliations, as I understand it.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, the French spoliation case is distinguishable from this in some respects, if not in those to which the Senator from Vermont alludes. It is distinguishable among other things in the fact that the Government never did in that instance receive a penny belonging to the holders of the claims. That is the great distinction. I refer to the French spoliations merely to show that its foundation in argument is the relation subsisting between the citizen and his Government and the always understood duty of the Government to promote and aid its citizen in obtaining his rights.

Coming to the history of the claims now in hand, let me traverse briefly that history in part. From the beginning, from the time when the American ear became accustomed to the phrase "Alabama claims," the most certain, the most specific, the most tangible of them all were losses inflicted upon citizens whose vessels were burned on the high seas.

Look at the correspondence between Mr. Seward and Mr. Adams from the beginning, between Mr. Seward and Mr. Johnson, between these ministers and Lords Clarendon and Stanley; look at the two conventions, the Johnson-Stanley convention and the Johnson-Clarendon convention, and you see the record bristling with claims made on behalf of American citizens, individual sufferers, put always into the forefront of the controversy. Look at the President's message of the 5th of December, 1870, and you find a recommendation that Congress make provision for the purchase of these individual claims. "Settlement with individual claimants" was the expression, I think. To what end? "So that"—I now quote the language—"the Government shall have the ownership of the private claims, as well as the responsible control of all the demands against Great Britain." As a staff in our hands, as an instrument of national action, the President recommended that we should take to ourselves beside that we had already, beside that nebulous demand, which was found to dizzy arithmetic when put into figures, also that definite, tangible, specific, visible thing consisting of the total losses inflicted by pirates upon private owners, and which the nation could acquire as owner only by purchase from the original holders.

On the 8th of May, 1871, the treaty was concluded. It referred, in terms somewhat general, all claims, national and individual alike, to peaceful arbitration. It used words appropriate to the generality of the subject. The American case was made up. It made claims not only for individual losses, but for damages resulting from the prolongation of the war, caused by the transfer of the American commercial marine to Great Britain, consisting of the cost of maintaining a sea police, and suffered at large from enhanced rates of insurance. England objected; England refused to go to trial because she said she thought the treaty should not mean that; and in this Chamber it is an open secret now that a supplemental article, which lies before me, was adopted to smooth the way to the completion of the arbitration which was arrested for the moment on the threshold by the refusal of one party to proceed. Pending the refusal of Great Britain, the tribunal cut the knot by a preliminary decision against the so-called national claims of the United States. Referring to the national claims, the tribunal said:

> That after most careful perusal of all that has been urged on the part of the Government of the United States in respect of these claims, they have arrived, individually and collectively, at the conclusion that these claims did not constitute, upon principles of international law applicable to such cases, good foundation for an award of compensation or computation of damages between nations, and should, upon such principles, be wholly excluded from the consideration of the tribunal in making its award, even if there was no disagreement between the two governments as to the competency of the tribunal to decide thereon.

As part of the action resulting in this decision, the tribunal ruled against England the question of our right under the treaty to present our case as we chose, and also the question of the jurisdiction of the tribunal, and pro hoc vice at least assumed jurisdiction of the whole question, and pronounced judgment upon it as matter of public law. What did the agent of the United States say to the action of the arbitrators?

Mr. Davis presented this communication to the tribunal:

> The declaration made by the tribunal, individually and collectively, respecting the claims presented by the United States for the award of the tribunal for, first, "the losses in the transfer of the American commercial marine to the British flag;" second, "the enhanced payments of insurance;" and third, "the prolongation of the war and the addition of a large sum to the cost of the war and the suppression of the rebellion," is accepted by the President of the United States as determinative of their judgment upon the important question of public law involved.
> The agent of the United States is authorized to say that, consequently, the abovementioned claims will not be further insisted upon before the tribunal by the United States, and may be excluded from all consideration in any award that may be made.

After this, what was left as matter of difference, and subject to litigation and judgment? The record, I think, plainly shows. The insurance companies were there represented as claimants, with their schedules of losses; so were the vessel-owners; and the Government of the United States presented and vouched for their claims. When the examination of items of loss and damage was reached, prospective profits, unearned freights, and the like were excluded, not upon principles of public law, but upon principles of common law and rules of evidence applicable to ordinary trials in court. In short, it was held that prospective profits and unearned freights were remote, consequential, and contingent damages, within the rules settled by familiar cases, and that for them no recovery could be had. With national claims, and these remote and consequential private damages excluded, we find the record standing thus: Mr. Davis presented to the tribunal a paper, from which I read to show the very matter to which the litigation was then addressed.

> The claims presented by the United States are supported by sworn statements, presented by those who possess the necessary information, and they exhibit, in detail, the items which go to form the sum total, and the names of all who have made reclamation, whatever may be the sum which the tribunal may see fit to award. The claims on the part of private individuals thus computed, verified, and submitted, are supported by all the guarantees of their good faith and their validity, as well for their general amount as for the other facts concerning them which governments are in the habit of requiring in such cases from their own citizens.

I ask special attention to these words, found in the same paper:

> It thus appears that these computations show the entire extent of all private losses, which the results of the adjudication of this tribunal ought to enable the United States to make compensation for.

There is the fact in a nutshell. The United States contested before the tribunal the private claims of citizens, insisting upon money enough to make the claimants whole, item by item.

In this contest the United States won, and won $15,500,000, with a protestation on its lips that the money was to be devoted as "compensation" for "private losses." And yet we are asked to believe that the United States recovered in its own right, for itself, and that the money is its own as part of its treasure.

Let me recapitulate. The tribunal first shut out national damages so called—a small amount of claims belonging to the United States was allowed, but the decision was against the bulk of the claims presented by our Government sui juris, as distinguished from the claims of its citizens. The tribunals having shut out the national claims as matters for which no damages could be awarded, next pruned down private claims by cutting off consequential, remote, and contingent damages, which they said were excluded by the general principles of municipal law. Thenceforward, the counsel and agent of the United States treated the case as it was, and tried the issue as a question of damages inflicted on vessel-owners by three cruisers. When it was decided for what cruisers Great Britain was responsible, nothing remained to be established except the aggregate losses of individual American citizens, with a slight matter of loss besides which was sustained by our Government itself, and which fell within the rule of liability laid down. Upon this issue a gross sum was awarded. For what was it awarded? Let me read again from Mr. Davis, the agent of our Government. He is communicating now with his own Government. He says:

> The neutral arbitrators, and Mr. Adams, from the beginning of the proceedings, were convinced of the policy of awarding a sum in gross. For some weeks before the decision was given, I felt sure that the arbitrators would not consent to send the case to assessors until they should have exhausted all efforts to agree themselves upon the sum to be paid.

Now, observe—

> We, therefore, devoted our energies toward securing such a sum as should be practically an indemnity to the sufferers.

Here again the claims of "the sufferers" stand out in bold relief—and "the sufferers" were citizens upon whom losses had fallen, and they were nobody else.

The American counsel presented a verified list of individual losses to the tribunal, and then, as they informed their home Government, they devoted their energies to securing such a sum as would be practically an indemnity to those sufferers.

Mr. President, could we have recovered fifteen million dollars and a half without these individual claims? That is the question. Did we recover fifteen million dollars and a half without these individual claims, or for anything except these claims? Look at the revised and reduced table of losses made by one of the arbitrators himself, and you find that the list of losses by citizens, losses which came from destructions by the Alabama, Florida, or the Shenandoah after her recruitment at Melbourne, amounts according to the calculations of the arbitrator to $12,000,000. Then you find that interest was allowed at 6 per cent. for a period which substantially appears in the protocols, although not in the final judgment. Thus we have in substance the whole of the award explained, accounted for, supported, and covered by private claims—the total, item by item, made up the $12,000,000, leaving interest and other things to explain the difference between twelve million dollars and fifteen million and a half.

If these facts establish the title of the sufferers, in equity, to the money recovered, it is a trust fund—the Government is a trustee, and the law must govern and fix the execution of the trust.

If such be the case, we have nothing to do with underwriters except to leave them with all others to the law and the right.

As a lucid and vigorous statement of this doctrine, I read the words of Mr. Webster, uttered in 1835. He said:

> There is no more universal maxim of law and justice throughout the civilized and commercial world than that an underwriter who has paid any losses on a ship or merchandise to the owner is entitled to whatever may be received from the property. His right accrues by the very act of payment, and if the property or its proceeds be afterward recovered in whole or in part, or whether the recovery be from the sea, from the captors, or from the justice of foreign states, such recovery is for the benefit of the underwriter.

I think no case can be found to dispute or disparage that position.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator be kind enough to inform me in what connection Mr. Webster said that?

Mr. CONKLING. He said it in a speech in the Senate of the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In what connection?

Mr. CONKLING. I have only the extract before me, not the context showing the particular connection in which he said it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I guess it was on the French spoliation bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It was on the French spoliation bill.

Mr. CONKLING. Then when my honorable friend asks me in what connection Mr. Webster said it, he wishes me merely to answer in respect of what bill he said it?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator says it was in respect of the French spoliation bill, and that is true. When he asked me in what connection it was said, I did not, it seems, apprehend the point of his question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I was unfortunate in the language of my inquiry.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, if it be true that this sum of money stands upon the claims of individuals, it cannot be denied that the law and the principles adopted by the tribunal must govern our action. In that view, I suppose no Senator would feel at liberty to refuse to allow all claimants of this trust-money (for trust-money then it must be) to seek before the appropriate tribunal their rights as the law gives them. But the bill, turning to the opposite idea, seems to me inconsistent with itself, and a contradictory attempt to do absolute original equity. The bill argues that private claims are to be ignored for all purposes explanatory of the recovery or ownership of the money; that the money is in the Treasury belonging absolutely to the United States, to be by Congress distributed and dispensed according to the judgment of Congress.

I should like to inquire, then, why a mutual insurance company should not be treated like a man who insured himself? If a group of merchants twelve in number, who by a mutual arrangement insured each other, are to receive nothing, unless taking their balance-sheet for the whole period of the rebellion they lost more than they made, why should a merchant who felt strong enough to be his own solitary insurer, whose vessel went and came in safety season after season, made untold profits, perhaps as was said yesterday paying for herself over and over again, when at last his vessel was lost, be paid her entire value, albeit the payment may make his profits 500 per cent. when they were already 400 upon his investment? Why is that, if we as a new and original question are to establish equities for ourselves? If bounty is to be bestowed, how can we thus pick and choose between its objects?

Such distinctions speak louder of favoritism and caprice than of equity and sound discretion.

Again, why is it that the fisherman or sailor from Maine whose vessel was overtaken and sunk by the Shenandoah a week or a day before she entered the harbor of Melbourne, is to be turned away? The bill turns him away. If we may judge, is he not meritorious? But the bill knows him not. Upon what does such an exclusion rest? If upon the award of the Geneva tribunal, the foundation is ample. If that be the explanation it takes the ground that the fund is a trust-fund, and belongs to those in whose behalf the Government recovered it; the man who suffered from the Shenandoah before her recruitment at Melbourne is not one of those for whom it was recovered, and there is an end of his case.

But when you dismiss the judgment at Geneva as a rule for our action, and say "this is money to be distributed by us in accordance with our appreciation of those who suffered, and who are most deserving," why do you pay in full the ship-owner who perhaps reaped golden harvests during the rebellion, and whose vessel at last went down before the guns of the Shenandoah after she was strengthened at Melbourne, and turn away the man whose vessel went down only a month before under the guns of the same corsair, and who, perhaps, if you inquire of his case, will turn out to be a loser always and never a gainer during the rebellion.

One ground or the other must be true; both cannot be true. If indeed we have an unbridled discretion, if we may parcel this money out as prize-money to seamen or bounties to soldiers, if we may give it to the widows, the orphans, or the cripples of the war, if we may give it to those who suffered whether on land or on sea, the schedule contained in the bill is too narrow to satisfy the judgment or the conscience of the American Senate. If, on the contrary, we be so hampered that we are bound to keep within the limits of the bill, then I insist that our obligation is plainly fixed by settled rules of law which we are bound to obey and which we have no right to change.

So, Mr. President, I shall vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio; and I shall vote also, should the amendment be offered, for a plan like that proposed by the House, allowing the regular judicial tribunals of the country to decide the questions touching this fund. I see no reason for creating a special court, with special machinery, for such a purpose; and I see objection to denying upon all the questions which may arise the right of appeal to the Supreme Court. Select some circuit court, name one if you please or leave the President to choose one; allow the parties to come in under familiar forms and established practice. But few cases will travel further than the court of first instance. Contests will classify themselves, and the classes will be few. A half-dozen questions may go to the Supreme Court, and all cases will abide the event. No multiplicity of litigation need be feared, I think. The plan proposed by the House strikes me as more simple, more economical, and more satisfactory at last than ours, and I would leave the whole matter to the courts to be decided for all upon the principles found applicable.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, having voted in committee to report this bill, I propose in the course of a few minutes to state the reasons which induced me so to vote.

The claim of the United States against Great Britain was national. It was not for individual injury. Robust debaters can go to great lengths in putting forward propositions, but I do not think that any one with this treaty before him can deny that the claim made by the United States was in its character national. The treaty says: "The United States of America and Her Britannic Majesty being desirous to provide for an amicable settlement of all causes of difference between the countries." Again it says: "Whereas differences have arisen between the Government of the United States and the government of Her Britannic Majesty;" and again: "Now in order to remove and adjust all complaints and claims on the part of the United States."

These expressions clearly prove the claim to have been that of the nation.

It might be said that there was no treaty, or that there was no award; but with that language of the treaty before us, we cannot say that the claim was individual and not national. I have taken the pains to look at a number of treaties made by the United States from 1794 down to 1848, some ten in number, I think, in which the provision for claims are not those of the United States but those of citizens of the United States. So the language of this treaty was selected in contradistinction to the ten others which the United States had entered into with different nations, and which no doubt were referred to when this was drawn. And in this treaty where in the eleventh article it provides for what are known as the mixed commission, it distinctly speaks of the claims that were to be submitted as those of "corporations, individuals, and citizens." It cannot therefore be argued that the claims as presented to that tribunal at Geneva and the award made thereon and the fund resulting therefrom are individual and not national.

But, from the very nature of the claim of the ship-owner who lost his vessel, it cannot be individual or personal in its character. His loss was by an act of war. He had no claim against the confederacy, and still more remote would be any claim against Great Britain, the allies, or the abettors of the confederacy. If General Lee at Gettysburgh had burned down one's barn, the owner surely had no claim against the confederacy; and if Lee's army had been supplied with provisions by Canada, still less would he have had any claim against Canada. Therefore, from the very nature of the claim, as well as from the repeated declarations of the treaty, the claim made by the United States was national.

And here it seems to me is the point of this case. Far be it from me to deny that there was any liability for these acts on the part of Great Britain. The liability was great, and was to this government for having violated her treaties and the laws of neutrality. For what amount was she liable? How are you to get at the amount of the liability? Only by ascertaining what was the direct and not the indirect loss of national wealth. And how do you find what was the direct loss of national wealth? By finding the value of the vessels and cargoes the Alabama, the Florida, and the Shenandoah had destroyed. And how do you find the value of those cargoes and vessels? Simply by finding what the owner lost and what the insurance companies paid. The arbitrators resorted to that mode of estimating the loss of national wealth, and to that end the claims of the insurance companies came before that tribunal, and such claims being there produced of themselves create no right whatever in their behalf against the fund. Those claims were a mere measure of damages. Whether the insurance companies are to be paid rests upon other and further considerations than that they were presented before the tribunal, for we must remember the treaty and award both state that the claim and the fund were national and not individual or private; the sole purpose of allowing those losses, whether of ship-owner or of insurance company, before the tribunal, was to liquidate the amount of national loss.

I go further. If instead of finding a sum in gross the tribunal had referred it to a board of assessors and these claims had been laid before that board it would not, it could not, while the treaty existed, change the character of the claim or the character of the award from national to individual. Such a reference would only have been a more accurate and precise mode of estimating the amount of the national loss.

Mr. President, we have been told that the view taken by the committee on this bill is contrary to justice and national honor and illegal. Sir, I will not say that no case can be found in which an insurance company has been subrogated to a national fund; but I will say that I do not believe any such case can be produced. I have looked carefully at the cases that have been referred to. One case is the case of Comegys vs. Vasse, (1 Peters, 193.) In that case reclamation was made under the provision of the ninth article of the treaty of 1819 with Spain, which provided "for all claims of citizens of the United States upon Spain arising from the unlawful seizures at sea and in the ports or territories of Spain or the Spanish colonies." The treaty is found in the Treaties of United States, page 791. There the insured by the very terms of the treaty had a vested interest in the fund, and of course the insurance company could be subrogated to that vested right of the insured.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And the United States by the terms of the treaty agreed to make distribution.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Yes; that was the stipulation. The case of Gracie vs. The New York Insurance Company, (8 Johnson, 237,) is like it. There reclamation was under the treaty with France of 1831, and the language there was that France made it "in order to liberate itself completely from all reclamation preferred against it by citizens of the United States." (Treaties of United States, 190.) Here the citizen had a vested interest in the fund which was subject to subrogation. And again in the case of Campbell vs. Mulick, (2 Swanton's Reports, page 551,) reclamation was made under a treaty with Great Britain, "which relates to complaints by divers merchants and other citizens of the United States," found in the Treaties of United States, page

328. These cases all relate to individual claims, and of course the citizen had a vested right in the fund to which the insurance company could make claim.

Mr. CONKLING. Would it interrupt the Senator if I asked him a question there merely for information?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. No, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I wish my friend would explain to me what is the distinction in principle—I mean now as between the vessel-owner and the underwriter—between a case like this affirmed by the bill, where the obligation of the Government to pay private citizens is recognized, and the case where the treaty itself says that private citizens are to be paid. Let me transpose my question, as I am conscious that it is not very clear. The Senator cites us cases of treaties recognizing the duty of the Government to make over funds recovered to private citizens. I ask him a test of the rights of underwriters, what the distinction is between that case and the case as the committee or a majority of it make this of an obligation existing and affirmed in the bill to make over the money to private citizens? How does the one case any more than the other test the right between the vessel-owner and the underwriter who has paid a loss?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I probably shall answer the Senator's question as I proceed. I am now speaking of the right of the insurance company, and have endeavored to show that the fund we are administering was national, and that no one excepting the Government had any vested interest in it, and that consequently the insurance company cannot be subrogated; while in all the cases referred to the citizen had a vested interest by the very terms of both the treaty and the award. I confess I do not entirely understand the point made by the Senator from New York.

This case differs from all the cases cited, in that the claim here is a national one and so is the fund, and the counsel of the United States were instructed so to present it. In further illustration of the fact that the claims of insurance companies were used as a mere measure of damages, please observe that the tribunal at Geneva made no allowance whatever for war premiums which had been paid. It is said that there were $25,000,000 of extra premiums paid in consequence of this war.

Mr. SCHURZ. They were thrown out.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Of course they were thrown out. Why? Because they did not tend to measure the damages that this country had suffered; the payment of money from one citizen to another afforded no rule to measure the national loss; but when you come to the claim which the ship-owner made and also to prove the amount that the insurance company had paid, that was under the treaty the measure of the national damage.

Mr. President, one word more. In the distribution of this relief fund I submit that the money should only go to indemnify those who lost by the war. If the insurance companies lost by the war, let them be indemnified. This bill in express terms prohibits the merchant from making profit out of this award. It says, he shall only have indemnity. All the United States ever claimed was indemnity. Why should the insurance company have more than indemnity? And here we are met by the argument which has been so frequently repeated.

We are told that the merchant may have made ten voyages, nine of them profitable, and on the last voyage his vessel coming under the guns of some rebel cruiser was destroyed, and we are asked why he should be paid. The merchant, we are told, made a profit on his voyages, and if you will not pay the insurance company that made a profit, why pay the merchant who did the same thing? I state the argument fairly, and it is susceptible of an answer.

We are dealing with the results of the war, and not with commerce. The merchant made his profit out of commerce. It is true that the profits may have been larger in consequence of the war. So his profits would have been larger if having an importation of silk the stock of silks in market had been suddenly burned, but in that case the merchant would have made a profit not out of that misfortune, but by means of commerce; and so the profits of the merchants here are the profits of commerce. On the other hand, the profits realized by the insurance companies are the profits from the war alone. The bill provides for striking the balance of insurance companies' profits as to war risks only. You might as well go into an inquiry to find out what were the agricultural profits of a citizen who had sustained a loss, as to go into the question of what were his commercial profits. We are dealing with an award which is made to compensate for losses occasioned by war alone. In striking the balance we adhere to the war account. This bill properly provides that the insurance company shall receive no part of the award where it has, considering all its war risks, made a profit.

Mr. President, let us take another view of this matter. Now dispense with the consideration that the fund in question is national and not private. Suppose that the insurance company brings Great Britain with her consent into the Supreme Court of the United States; even then it will appear that the insurance company has no claim. Great Britain would put in three defenses against the claim. Great Britain would first say, "As a matter of fact it was not a part of the consideration of the insurance company's making the war policy that it should be subrogated to any such fund. You did not expect anything from the damaged vessel, much less did it expect anything from a fund to pay for the vessel in the event of its loss. The consideration of spes recuperandi did not enter into the contract." When an insurer insures a vessel in time of peace, there is a possibility that in the event of the vessel being stranded some gain in rem may accrue to the insurance company; but the very nature of these war policies was that if there was a loss at all it would be a total loss. The peril was a capture, a destruction, and there was in fact no hope of a future recovery in the transaction.

Great Britain would say in the second place, "We are not liable to the insurance company; if we have been guilty of any wrongful act, our liability is to the nation; if we did any wrong, it was a national wrong. The insured ship-owner had no claim against us, and there is nothing to which the insurance company can be subrogated." And Great Britain would in the third place ask, and most successfully, too, "Supposing we are liable, what is the amount of our liability; what amount is the insurance company entitled to recover?" The insurance company would answer, "We are entitled to recover for the injury we have sustained by reason of the violation of the neutrality laws by Great Britain." What is the injury the insurance company sustained? Fifty thousand dollars for a vessel destroyed by the Alabama; $50,000 for a vessel destroyed by the Florida; $50,000 for a vessel destroyed by the Shenandoah—$150,000. Great Britain still asks, "What is the amount of injury you have sustained?" It is not now when dealing with a private company a question of violation of national rights; it is not a question of law. The issue is simply one of pecuniary damage resulting from the violation by Great Britain of the public law. Referring to the ledger, it is shown that that insurance company, by reason of the violation of the neutrality laws by Great Britain, had increased and multiplied its premiums and had made a profit of half a million dollars. The court is now to determine whether that company did in any mere money sense sustain a loss by virtue of the violation of the neutrality laws. The decision must be that no loss was sustained, but on the contrary that a profit was made. This idea that we are to pay insurance companies who have made money out of the war, while we leave without any indemnity those who have lost everything, does not commend itself either to my feelings or to my judgment.

Mr. STOCKTON. Mr. President, I stated yesterday that I had an amendment to offer at the proper time, after the vote should be taken on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio. As that amendment refers directly to the position taken by my colleague yesterday and to-day, I should like to have it read now, and also the section where it comes in, and I propose to say a word or two explanatory of it. I send the amendment to the desk to be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MCCREERY in the chair.) The proposed amendment will be read for information, though it is not now in order.

The CHIEF CLERK. After line 12, section 12, it is proposed to insert:

> And no claim shall be allowed in behalf of any claimant unless said claimant shall show to the satisfaction of the said court that during the late rebellion the sum of his losses in business exceeded the sum of his gains during the said period.

Mr. STOCKTON. I should like to have the preceding part of the section read, so as to show the connection.

The CHIEF CLERK. If amended as proposed, the section will read:

> SEC. 12. That no claim shall be admissible or allowed by said court for any loss or damage for or in respect to which the party injured, his assignees or legal representatives, shall have received compensation or indemnity from any insurance company, insurer, or otherwise; but if such compensation or indemnity so received shall not have been equal to the loss or damage so actually suffered, allowance may be made for the difference. And in no case shall any claim be admitted or allowed for or in respect to unearned freights, gross freights, prospective profits, freights, gains, or advantages, or for wages of officers or seamen for a longer time than one year next after the breaking up of a voyage by the acts aforesaid. And no claim shall be allowed in behalf of any claimant unless said claimant shall show, to the satisfaction of the said court, that during the late rebellion the sum of his losses in business exceeded the sum of his gains during the said period.

Mr. STOCKTON. The gentlemen on the other side, and my colleague particularly, very much to my regret, have taken the position that none of this money—which some of us believe to be a trust fund in the hands of the Government of the United States to give to those persons who were claimants, and acknowledged to be such at the time of the Geneva award—should be allowed to go to a certain class of people, and those are insurers who through war premiums made profits during the war. My amendment simply says the same to other persons who made profits during the war. I see no reason why fish should be made of one set of claimants and flesh of the other. I see no crime in being an insurer. I know of no law of our country that made it a crime to run risks for the purpose of keeping our commerce on the high seas in time of peril; and until it is established that this was a criminal contract and transaction, you have no right in equity or in law to draw such an unnatural distinction. I simply ask that all other claimants be put on the same ground. If this is a national fund, as my colleague says, which I think it is not; if it is a fund acquired by war, which I humbly submit it is not; if it is a fund which you do not hold as trustee but hold to act with as you please, and in the exercise of your generosity you think fit to exclude from any share of it any person who may have had profit by the war, let it be so under the theory that has been adopted, but make not this theory inconsistent with itself by applying it only to insurers. I think the butcher, the baker, and the candlestick-maker should all stand on the same footing if they were claimants claiming in the same right and without regard to other transactions not arising at all from or connected with the one which was before the Geneva tribunal.

My colleague says that this is a national fund. He is a member of the Judiciary Committee, which reported this bill, and gives to the Senate the reasons why he is in favor of the bill. He says the money is a national fund. Has it not been shown to the Senate to-day that the claims were divided originally, from the time the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts who has since left us made his celebrated speech on the subject, into private and public, individual and national claims, and so remained until the national claims were struck from the case before the tribunal when they declined to award any damages for them? The damages were awarded, it is shown from the acts of our agents, from the case presented, to the individual claimants, the aggregate of whose claims went to make up the amount which was given by the award.

There is one thing in which I think I myself have been led into error by listening to the use of terms yesterday by some other gentlemen. These insurance companies do not come here subrogated, although I used the term myself yesterday. There is no subrogation about it. There is no substitution about it. Did not the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SCHURZ] show from the record to-day that their claims were sent in as original claims, that the tribunal received the claims for the various ships, no matter to whom the money might finally go? Were not those losses due to those insurers when they succeeded to the rights of the insured long before the claims were presented, and when claims were to be presented they were invited by our Government to bring them forward and they made them in their own name? Unless when men are personally present doing an act themselves, somebody else is doing it for them, you cannot call it a substitution; it is a claim made in their own right. The claim was in them; the claim of the insured had been given up and renounced by operation of law or else by the force of the transaction when the insurance money was paid. Therefore the claim is not a national claim, and in that I think my colleague is wrong. It is not even a case of subrogation.

Now, his other proposition is what? That it is money which came from the war, money arising out of an act of war. Mr. President, there is not one thing connected with the whole treaty, hardly a line in it, hardly an argument was made about it at the time that was not dependent entirely upon the fact that it was simply a question of how far a neutral power was responsible for negligence. When these vessels were burned in mid-ocean, they were burned by confederate ships of war under the belligerency which had been acknowledged and acknowledged by us. When we caught some of the persons engaged in these transactions we did not treat them as pirates; we treated them as belligerents; we treated them all through the war as belligerents. We exchanged prisoners. We were obliged to do it. But vessels of our citizens were burned by them. There was no claim against the confederate government for that. If the claim were made against the confederate government, then my colleague would be right; the damage might be said to arise from an act of war; but it was the case of a neutral nation permitting these vessels to evade her laws, not using all due diligence to exercise toward a friendly power such protection as she should have done in the enforcement of her neutrality laws. It was for this that the money was paid. It was for this that the claim was made. And can gentlemen now be blind to the fact that these were private claims presented by the Government of the United States, as it was its duty to do, as is always done in such cases, and presented by this Government as the agents of the private claimants? They are not allowed by the statutes, very properly, to make treaties with foreign nations, and they are not allowed to go to foreign courts and bow themselves down and seek redress for themselves. They can seek redress in no way but one. It is like the case of an individual whose life is threatened or who has received damage to his person or in his servant or his wife or his child in a foreign country. He goes to his minister and to his Government here and says, "Put in my claim; I have been damaged; I have been insulted; I want you to make them pay smart-money;" and the Government threatens or even goes to war and recovers the amount of money that the individual has lost, or recovers money to heal him as far as possible for the injury done him. This is just in that position precisely. It is that relation which has existed since the foundation of governments. It was by virtue of that relation that our Government demanded of England to satisfy the just claims of our citizens, and it also put in its own claims for the prolongation of the war; claims which were remote and were held to be so; claims which were considered inadmissible for one cause and another; but these private claims of our citizens presented by us were acknowledged and treated as valid. The award was made founded upon them. Now this bill comes in containing the proposition which I desired to amend, on no other ground in the world than that some of these parties ought to be deprived of their claims for the reason that they may have made money out of their transactions during the war. Mr. President, I think consistency will require gentlemen who take that side of the case, as my colleague has done, to vote for this amendment of mine which I shall offer at the proper time after the vote is taken on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I rise, sir, for the purpose of calling the attention of the honorable chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary to a practical difficulty which I think will be found to exist in that portion of the twelfth section which it is now proposed to strike out if the motion to amend in that particular be not adopted by the Senate. But before I state the difficulty which occurs to me in that particular, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to a few of the points made by the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN.]

He says, very truly, that these are national claims, but I think he omits to make a distinction in national claims which is not only pertinent but necessary to the proper consideration of the question before us. National claims are of two sorts. One class consists of those arising from injuries inflicted directly upon national property or upon the jurisdiction or power of the country, and which affect citizens generally through the injury done to the public, but do not affect particularly individual citizens to their injury so as to distinguish them from the mass of the people of the country. The other class of national claims consists of those which arise from injuries inflicted by another government upon citizens of the country who, upon general principles as well as by special statute, are barred from the presentation and enforcement of their claims as individuals, and can only be protected by the exercise of the sovereign power of the Government; and upon that power they have, upon general principles and under the Constitution, a right to rely.

Now, these claims with which we are dealing are of the latter class. They are national claims. But those claims which were made by the Government on its own account as injuries inflicted upon the public, as distinguished from injuries inflicted on individuals, were barred by the decision at Geneva; but those claims or portions of those claims which were presented as the claims of the Government of the United States arising from injuries growing out of the conduct of Great Britain and resting upon individual citizens were established; and for those claims an award was made; and the question before us is, what shall be done with the money which we have received?

We are referred to the treaty with Spain of 1819, by which under express stipulations injuries inflicted upon citizens were to be paid by the Government of the United States; and we are led to believe from the arguments submitted by the Senator from New Jersey that the obligation of the Government of the United States to pay those claims was derived from the nature of the treaty with Spain and had no foundation elsewhere; and the inference from all that is that the duty of the Government of the United States in reference to its own citizens, when it has collected from another government moneys awarded for injuries done to its citizens, is to be found in the nature of the treaty, and not resting either in natural right or public duty or the obligations imposed upon the Government by the Constitution of the country. To that I do not assent. There is a better and higher reason why the Government of the United States was bound to pay to the citizens the losses that were mentioned in the treaty of 1819 than the fact that we were under obligations by that treaty to pay those losses; and that obligation was to be found in the fact that we had received money or the equivalent of money for a specific purpose; it was in our hands as a trust; we were bound to perform that trust and to pay the beneficiaries the money which we had received on their account; and in that particular this case does not differ from that.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. With my friend's permission I agree to all that he says. The claim of the underwriters is purely technical——

Mr. BOUTWELL. I will deal with that. I have but a few minutes.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I will not interrupt the Senator.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The Senator from New Jersey makes a distinction between the profits of commerce and the profit of insurance; and he tells us that the profits of insurance are to be included in any estimate that may be made of the losses by insurance companies, because they are profits derived from war, while in the case of the merchant they are profits derived from commerce. They are profits derived from commerce influenced by the condition of war. The profits derived by insurance are not different in any particular. They are profits of insurance business, augmented or diminished by the condition of war; and insurance is a distinct business as well as commerce, and if in the case of insurance you may enter into an analysis of their business, and compel them to exhibit a balance-sheet of the profits or the losses of insurance, so you may upon the same principle and with equal reason, and substantially the same justice, compel the merchant to exhibit his accounts, and show how the profits of commerce have been augmented or diminished by the condition of war.

But I now come to the subject which I had in my mind when I arose, and it is this: The language which by the amendment of the Senator from Ohio it is proposed to strike from the bill is this:

> And no claim shall be admissible or allowed by said court by or in behalf of any insurance company or insurer, either in its or his own right, or as assignee, or otherwise, in the right of a person or party insured as aforesaid, unless such claimant shall show, to the satisfaction of said court, that during the late rebellion the sum of its or his losses, in respect to its or his war risks, exceeded the sum of its or his premiums or other gains upon or in respect to such war risks; and in case of any such allowance, the same shall not be greater than such excess of loss.

Imagine a court, or an auditor, or a master attempting to state the account. Is the insurance company to place upon its debit side all the war premiums that it has received? I suppose so. On the other side what is to be placed in set-off? Losses growing out of depredations of the Alabama, and the Shenandoah after it left Melbourne, and the other cruisers for which Great Britain was made responsible? Or is the account to be balanced by set-off on account of losses arising from depredations of the Georgia, or the Shenandoah before she entered Melbourne, or the eleven other cruisers for which claims were made and on account of which Great Britain was declared exempt from responsibility? If the latter, as the language of this bill implies and renders I think necessary, then you propose by this bill to allow insurance companies that have met losses by depredations committed by vessels for which Great Britain was not responsible to be paid for those losses, and if insurance companies are to be paid or to be allowed in settlement of their accounts for losses owing to the depredations of vessels for which Great Britain was not responsible, how then is the merchant who suffered in the same way to be excluded from making a valid claim on his account? And does not the Senate see that by adopting this proposition you open a door for all the vessels that were lost on the high seas by the depredations not only of those vessels for which Great Britain was held responsible, but for the Georgia, the Shenandoah before she entered Melbourne, and for eleven other cruisers for which Great Britain was declared to be not responsible.

In this connection I wish to say that I believe the position of the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from New Jersey to be faulty in this particular as a matter of morals, if not of logic and of law: that the depredations committed by the Alabama were in a proper sense an act of war by the rebels. There was an element entering into those depredations which did not exist in regard to the operations of the other vessels, and I think logically we may say with reference to the claim we made, with reference to the proceedings at Geneva, and with reference to the award made by the arbitrators at Geneva, that they have substantially said that except for the acts of Great Britain in violation of her obligations of neutrality these losses would not have occurred. They have said to Great Britain, "Because you re-enforced the Shenandoah at Melbourne, because you did not exercise due diligence in arresting the Alabama in your own ports, you have become responsible, not as a party to the war, but by giving aid contrary to your neutral obligations you have done a wrong, and these losses sustained by the citizens of the United States have arisen from your wrong-doing." It is in the nature of a tort, a trespass in morals, and I think in logic, on the part of Great Britain, rather than an act of war on the part of the rebels. Therefore these losses are distinguishable in that respect from the general operations of the rebels in the particular that the award could not have been found at Geneva except upon the theory that these losses would not have occurred but for the wrongful doing or neglect of duty by Great Britain.

Mr. CONKLING. As a moment remains before the Senator from Vermont proceeds, and no Senator claims the floor, I will occupy it for an instant in order to make plain, if I can, the point which the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] did not understand when I presented it to him. He distinguishes between this case and the authorities I cited in respect of underwriters, in this way: he says that the treaty of 1819 on its face implied an obligation by the Government to make the money over to individual citizens. I answer that by saying that the bill before us so reads and so interprets the treaty of Washington. What difference does it make whether it is found plainly set down in words in the treaty, or whether it is implied by the treaty and written in the interpretation and construction of the treaty as the bill affirms the treaty to be? The measure before us concedes and asserts the duty under the treaty of Washington to pay these sums to individual losers. How, then, I ask the Senator from New Jersey, can a distinction arise between that case and the case as it would be if the treaty said, not merely by intendment and implication, but in express words, that that duty rests upon us which we are now about to execute? I adopt what was said by the Senator from Massachusetts, that deeper down than the treaty, in the foundations of law and right, is found the obligation which rests upon us; but if the Senator from New Jersey will found it upon the treaty merely, then I say no distinction in ethics, in right, in morals, or in law exists between the case of a treaty in which it appears in so many words and the case of a treaty where it appears so plainly that we adopt the treaty as meaning that and proceed to execute it.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Mr. President, with the consent of the Senator from Vermont I will take a few minutes out of his time in order to state to the Senate the grounds upon which I propose to cast my vote against the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

The United States has in its coffers the amount of $15,500,000 received from Great Britain on account of the conduct of Great Britain during the war. That sum is to be distributed by the United States. There comes up here demanding a part of that sum the owner of some vessel which was destroyed by confederate cruisers and on account of which the award was made. It is found upon examination that he has received from an insurance company the amount of his loss. This Government refuses to pay him, and justly and properly; and why? Because under a contract existing with an insurance company he has received compensation and has suffered no loss. There comes up here at the same time an insurance company asking payment from the United States on account of some one of these losses. Ought not the same rule to apply? If the insurance company under an existing contract with reference to war risks has fully received the entire amount of that loss, does it not stand on precisely the same ground as the individual owner of a vessel? I can see no difference. Why favor the one at the expense of the other? Why pay the insurance company twice when you refuse to pay the individual twice? I can see no reason for it. They stand upon precisely the same ground, and that ground is this: that under existing contracts with reference to that kind of risks, each of them has received entire compensation from other sources for the amount of the loss, so that they practically suffered no loss and can claim no compensation.

For that reason I propose to vote against the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, which allows insurance companies, after having received entire and full compensation for these losses from other sources under contracts with reference to these very risks, after having received in many instances much beyond that, to come in here and claim under a technical rule of law an advantage which we do not give to any individual sufferer.

Mr. President, I understand that under this treaty the Government proposes to indemnify those who suffered, to indemnify those who lost. Has an insurance company lost which, under contracts with other parties, has received full compensation for the loss? Not at all. They are not losers; they are not sufferers; they have no equitable claim at all. All the claim they have is under a technical rule of law, and this amendment seeks to bring this award within that technical rule of law, so that they can receive compensation twice for losses which have been suffered by other parties.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, as the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] said the other day, it is not very encouraging to discuss an important question to empty seats, with a view of convincing the people who should sit in them that the one side or the other is right; but inasmuch as all of us have had empty seats for our audience, and as I am afraid some prejudice may have arisen in the empty seats against the bill of the committee, I will occupy a little while in endeavoring to reply to the statements that have been made in favor of this amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

But, before I do that, I wish to reply to what the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] has said last upon the subject of the inconsistency in respect of making an allowance to an insurance company if it has suffered a loss on its war risks as against making an allowance to other citizens who suffered from the depredations of vessels not included within the award of the Geneva tribunal. The Senator says that if we allow any insurance company to make a general balance of its premiums and its payments on all its war risks, we thereby pay it for the destruction of some vessels which were not embraced in the award of the tribunal at Geneva. In that the honorable Senator is mistaken. If he had been good enough in the progress of this debate to have read the bill through, he would have seen that the twelfth section, which is now under consideration, which is the negative section, which denies certain people who have already got enough out of this unfortunate business a chance of doubling their gains out of it, is a section of limitations; it is not a section which confers rights at all. The section that confers rights is the eleventh section, which provides:

> That it shall be the duty of said court to receive and examine all claims admissible under this act that may be presented to it, directly resulting from damage caused by the so-called insurgent cruisers Alabama, Florida, and their tenders, and also all claims admissible under this act directly resulting from damages caused by the so-called insurgent cruiser Shenandoah after her departure from Melbourne, &c.

Therefore when an insurance company is, by these two sections taken together, authorized to present a claim at all, it is under the eleventh section that it comes in, and its claim is for a loss directly resulting from some one of these three cruisers and within the time specified in the eleventh section. That is the loss that we allow; but we say that if, out of the whole transactions of the war, excluding all transactions of peace, excluding all commercial insurances, excluding all marine risks, but solely in a speculation entered into upon a state of war alone, and having no other element in it, the insurance company has made a profit, it shall not be entitled to receive indemnity, or whatever you may call it, for the destruction of any particular vessel by any one of these particular cruisers. The Senator from Massachusetts therefore is somewhat wide of the mark, if he will pardon me, when he says the committee have involved themselves and the Senate, if the Senate should stand by the committee in a contradiction upon this point. That is a mistake.

Now, Mr. President, if it will not be too tiresome to the Senate, I should be glad to take a calm review of this subject upon perfectly well-understood principles which nobody has yet disputed, and which the gentlemen upon the other side when they have not found it convenient to refer to them have passed by, because being skillful in history and skillful in law they knew that the history of this Government and of every other civilized government in such cases furnishes all the precedents exactly in opposition to the claim that they now make. The difficulty into which the sophisms of the arguments upon the other side would lead us arises out of the fact that they undertake to make this case in its nature, saying nothing about this treaty at the moment, like the instances that have occurred often in the history of the United States respecting the claims of our citizens upon foreign countries.

This, if Senators will not forget it, and it is the starting point of the whole consideration, is an instance in which this Government was a belligerent. She was at war with the confederates. I will not occupy your time in discussing whether it was an insurrection or what it was. There was a state of war existing. We were the warlike power upon the one side and the confederated States, so called, were the warlike power upon the other. Therefore any destruction of the property of the United States, or the property of any of its citizens, was a destruction of the property of a people at war, and not the destruction of the property of a people at peace. If Senators can make out that there is no distinction in the laws of nations between destroying the property of a nation at war or the property of its citizens, and destroying the property of a neutral nation at peace in a war between some other countries, then they will have the advantage of the argument; but that is a proposition which they have not undertaken to assert. It is the cardinal and starting point of this investigation, which Senators have industriously ignored. I do not mean by that to impute that Senators industriously intend to mislead the Senate; but I say, having assumed a particular side of a controversy, of a difference of opinion, growing out of their relations to the claims of their constituents, as it may be, or one reason or another, which is perfectly honorable to Senators, they have found it convenient to their argument, (and nobody blames them for it,) to absolutely shut up their eyes, and to ask you to shut yours, to the thing which, when you set out upon this inquiry, it is of the first importance to determine; and that is, whether in public law and in public justice there is a distinction between the destruction of the property of a nation at war by its enemies and the destruction of the property of a nation at peace by another nation who is not pretending to make war upon it, but making war upon some other belligerent.

In the first case, where the property of the people of a nation at war is destroyed, it is what the writers on public law call (and all nations agree to it) a lawful destruction; that is to say, the captain of the vessel that sinks your ship in that case cannot be sued for it; the government of the captain of the vessel that sinks your ship in that case cannot be sued for it by any citizen of the United States. The nation making war upon you may have its courts of claims, may have its courts for alien claims, all its courts may be open to all people in the world to suits against that government for wrong; but suppose a citizen of the United States in such a case as that were to sue the government of a nation with which we were at war for the destruction of his property, what would be the result? Why, the courts would instantly determine, as the courts of all the world have determined and all public writers have decided, that there was no claim at all, for the reason that the act of the enemy against your citizen or subject was an act which it was his right and his duty to perform in order to defend his own cause and to defeat yours.

Now, when you turn to the other part of the subject and find the case of the citizen of a neutral nation against whom the belligerents are not at war, and whose property, through the accident of war or the mistake of some captain of a ship, has been captured and condemned, or has been destroyed, which is the same thing, what attitude is he in? Then, in the language of the writers upon public law, then, in the language of the Supreme Court of the United States, then, in the language of the courts of every civilized country, there is an illegal capture, there is an illegal destruction, and the property of the citizen whose ship has been captured or destroyed is not changed; it is his still. In the one case the destruction in the public sense is right, and gives a right of reclamation and of action in favor of no person at all under any circumstances. In the other case the destruction by public and by municipal law is illegal and wrong, and the capture or the destruction gives no right in the captor to the property, but still leaves in the owner of the property the same right that he had before, undisturbed by the illegal capture or the illegal destruction of the belligerent who was not pretending to make war upon him.

Mr. President, if I am right about that, then I think you will find that this case is of easy solution. And yet I repeat again that although these propositions were put forward at the last session and were put forward again at this session, the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] who has made the leading oration on this subject has abstained in a very large degree from undertaking to discuss before this body the distinction which I name, and if he had referred to authority he would have found, as I have stated, that the authority is precisely what I have indicated it to be. Now let me read from Vattel, and I am reading now of course not only upon the general principles between belligerents, where every citizen of each belligerent is at war against the other, and every part of the property of each citizen of each belligerent is subject to capture, and condemnation, and destruction by the other, and a lawful capture, condemnation, and destruction, but I am reading also in respect to the associates, the assistants, because that brings it directly to this case, of the belligerent who is making war upon you. Now let us see. Vattel is speaking of the enemy's allies. Perhaps Senators may think I am assuming too much to call Great Britain an ally in this case; but let us see what the definition of ally is:

> An engagement, which may draw us into a war, is of great moment; in it the very existence of the state is at stake. He who in an alliance promises a subsidy or a body of auxiliaries, sometimes imagines that he only risks a sum of money or a certain number of soldiers, whereas he often exposes himself to war, and all its calamities. The nation against whom he furnishes assistance will look upon him as her enemy; and should her arms prove successful, she will carry the war into his country. * * * It is true, indeed, that every associate of my enemy is himself my enemy.

Not as the honorable Senator from Ohio has stated when I asked him yesterday what was the position of Great Britain at the moment when through her assistance the Alabama was destroying one of our ships, whether she was then a neutral or not, and he turned me off by a most convenient, and in fact the only answer he had, and that was that I had better go to the books.

> It is true, indeed, that every associate of my enemy is himself my enemy.

Not my friend; not my neutral, innocent, loving neighbor, but "my enemy." That is to say, to put it again to the Senator from Ohio or to his argument, if a man who is upon trial, and who is presumed to be innocent until he is proved guilty, is found to have committed the crime named against him, I take it, at that time he ceases to be an innocent man. If he claims to be a man of virtue—my friendly neighbor—and I find him assisting my enemy in furnishing him powder to blow up my granary, I take it, at the moment he furnishes the powder to my enemy for that purpose, his virtue is gone for the time being, and that he cannot shelter himself on the doctrine that after all he is my friendly neighbor who is not doing anything to my injury, and is not entitled to be styled an associate, or an ally, or an accessory of my enemy in destroying my property. That is so obvious that I need not take time to discuss it. Vattel proceeds to say:

> It is of little consequence whether any one makes war on me directly, and in his own name, or under the auspices of another. Whatever rights war gives me against my principal enemy, the like it gives me against all his associates; for I derive those rights from the right to security, from the care of my own defense; and I am equally attacked by the one and the other party. But the question is to know whom I may lawfully account my enemy's associate, united against me in war.
> First, in that class I shall rank all those who are really united in a warlike association with my enemy.

That is a public alliance, not a secret one which is still meaner.

> In the second place, I account as associates of my enemy those who assist him in his war without being obliged to it by any treaty.

Mr. President, where does Great Britain stand, before we come to this treaty of Washington, in respect to furnishing assistance to the Confederate States of America in carrying on war against us in the case of the Alabama and the Florida and the Shenandoah? Why, sir, according to our continuous demand, according to the universal judgment of the world, according to the belief of every citizen I think of the United States North and South at that time, Great Britain was, as these arbitrators determined that she was, although she denied it and attempted to disprove it, giving assistance by her acts and neglects to the enemies of the United States, and it was because she gave that assistance and not because she made war upon us directly, but aided those who were making war upon us, that she was held under the laws of nations, not as a neutral, because there can be no conflict between the rights of a neutral and a belligerent, but as a neutral who ceased to be a neutral the moment she violated her obligations of neutrality and occupied the attitude of assisting our enemy to destroy our commerce upon the high seas. There is no such thing as being neutral and not neutral at the same moment. It is just as absurd to say so as it is to say that you may be right and you may be wrong at the same moment. Great Britain cannot assist any enemy of ours to make war upon us and at the same moment be in a state of peace with us. The ideas are totally opposite. She cannot be neutral and not neutral. She cannot be right and wrong at the same moment. She cannot be peaceful and warlike at the very time she is endeavoring either by her negligence or by her act, it makes no difference which, to carry on war against this country through the agency of a public enemy with whom war publicly exists.

Now, let us look a little further upon this point.

> While "the progress of civilization has slowly but constantly tended to soften the extreme severity of the operations of war by land," says Wheaton, it still remains unrelaxed in respect to maritime warfare, in which the private property of the enemy, taken at sea or afloat in port, is indiscriminately liable to capture and confiscation. This inequality in the operation of the laws of war by land and by sea has been justified by alleging the usage of considering private property, when captured in cities taken by storm, as booty; and the well known fact that contributions are levied upon Territories occupied by a hostile army in lieu of a general confiscation of the property belonging to the inhabitants; and that the object of wars by land being conquest, or the acquisition of territory to be exchanged as an equivalent for other territory lost, the regard of the victor for those who are to be his subjects naturally restrains him from the exercise of his extreme rights in this particular; whereas the object of maritime war is the destruction of the enemy's commerce and navigation, the sources and sinews of his naval power—which object can only be attained by the capture and confiscation of private property.

And here is cited by Halleck, from whom I read, all the authorities from the beginning down on the subject of a state of war and the liability of private property to destruction by the enemy, showing that there is no right of recovery, that there is no right of redress; because there is no wrong to be redressed, inasmuch as each nation in the state of war has a right to destroy the property of the citizens of the other nation at sea. Now, how does the "neutral," as he is called, stand in the same relation? I will read a little further on that point;

> Any act of positive hostility on the part of a neutral state toward one of the belligerents in a war is deemed a breach of neutrality, and makes such a state a party in the war. The rights and duties of neutrality are correlative, and the former cannot be claimed unless the latter are faithfully performed. If the neutral state fail to fulfill the obligations of neutrality, it cannot claim the privileges and exemptions incident to that condition. The rule is equally applicable to the citizens and subjects of a neutral state.

Which is this case?

> So long as they faithfully perform the duties of neutrality, they are entitled to the rights and immunities of that condition.

Now, mark, Mr. President:

But for every violation of neutral duties they are liable to the punishment of being treated in their persons or property as public enemies of the offended belligerent.

Then again, speaking of the neutral State assisting one of the belligerents, he says:

If the neutral state assist one of the belligerents; if it grant favors to one to the detriment of the others; if it neglect or refuse to maintain the inviolability of its territory—

As excluding the Shenandoah from Melbourne—or if it fail to restrain its own citizens and subjects from overstepping the just bounds of neutrality, as defined and established by the law of nations, it violates its duties toward the belligerent who is injured by such act or neglect, and is justly chargeable—

With what? With peace? With friendship? With accident? With mistake?

No, Mr. President—is justly chargeable with hostility.

And does any Senator misunderstand what "hostility" means? I take it not. As between nations, it is merely another definition for the same act that the word "war" is.

Such conduct furnishes good cause for complaint, and, if persisted in, may become just cause of war. Sir William Scott—

Meaning, I believe, in that country to which my honorable friend from Missouri so carefully looks to see what will be thought of our disposition of this money—

Sir William Scott very justly remarked that there are no conflicting rights between nations at peace; which remark may be applied with truth to every case of a violation of neutral duty.

Will the Senator from Ohio, the Senator from Missouri, and the Senator from New York remark in the language of Sir William Scott that "there are no conflicting rights between nations at peace?" But, sir, in this instance, upon history that is not disputed, and upon the judgment of the civilized world, consolidated in this tribunal at Geneva, it was declared that here was a conflict between Great Britain and the United States; and while Great Britain denied that she had been engaged in acts of hostility against the United States by allowing her citizens to aid our enemies, they found that her denial was untrue, and that through whatever pretense or pretext of friendship during the war, when we were unable to assert by force the defense of our own rights, the truth was that at that time she was engaged in assisting the enemies of the United States in carrying on war against our commerce. So I say it is undeniable that the attitude of Great Britain in respect to the things that she allowed to be done according to the statement of every writer upon public law was an attitude of hostility to us, an attitude which put her in exactly the category that the Confederate States of America stood in, not as a belligerent herself legally capturing, through her aid and assistance or directly, the property of our citizens, we being neutral, but as a person who espoused the cause of the enemy of the country upon the other side, and through her assistance to him, just as if she had done it directly as an act of war, destroyed the property and interfered with the commerce of the country.

What then is her attitude? Has any Senator said that in such a case there is any private right of a citizen to be redressed? Does not every Senator who has spoken know that in such a case there is no private right; and that in the case of an absolute capture instead of a destruction, where the property of a citizen has been taken and condemned, if it be recaptured by force by the arms or the vessels of the country to whom it belonged, it does not go back to the original citizen; it becomes the property of the State as a lawful capture? We have a little law in this country on this subject which gentlemen have industriously—and I do not use the term in any injurious sense by any means, for no man is bound to bring forward more than his side of an argument, especially if he is committed to it in advance—industriously ignored. Here is the act of Congress of the 3d of March, 1800, which merely enacts what the law of nations is as to what shall be the duty of the United States toward the citizens of the United States in respect to property of theirs which has been recaptured by a public enemy and recaptured by the forces of the United States. That act provides—I will only, because my time is short, read that part of it which relates to that precise point:

That when any vessel other than a vessel of war or privateer, or when any goods which shall hereafter be taken as prize by any vessel, acting under authority from the Government of the United States, shall appear to have before belonged to any person or persons, resident within or under the protection of the United States, and to have been taken by an enemy of the United States, or under authority, or pretense of authority, from any prince, government, or state, against which the United States have authorized, or shall authorize defense or reprisals, such vessel or goods not having been condemned as prize by competent authority before the recapture thereof, the same shall be restored to the former owner or owners thereof, he or they paying for and in lieu of salvage, if retaken by a public vessel of the United States, one-eighth part.

There you observe this when in providing for recaptures provides that if the recapture take place before there is a condemnation of the vessel captured of your own citizen in a prize court of the other country or of a neutral power, if the neutral will allow the prize to be taken there to be condemned, the citizen of the United States shall be entitled to have it back upon payment of one-eighth part to the United States for the trouble and expense incurred by the United States in recapturing; but if the vessel has been condemned by the judgment of a court of competent authority as prize of war, then the citizen of the United States has lost his spes recuperandi precisely as he does lose it in the case where there is a destruction of his property and there is nothing to be recovered. Now, to show you that I am right in this construction, and that we ourselves for seventy years and more have settled the very principle upon which this bill stands, I ask you to consider the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the vessel Star decided in 1818.

Mr. THURMAN. In none of those cases was there a condemnation of the vessel.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly not one of those vessels was condemned, because it is not very easy to condemn a vessel that has been destroyed on the high seas and gone to the bottom. If the Senator can show me any authority in any writer on public law which declares that a vessel that is destroyed stands in a better condition as respects the owner than a vessel condemned by a belligerent, I shall be glad to have him do it, and I will allow him to do it out of my time and now.

Mr. THURMAN. I did not hear what the Senator just said.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator having said that these vessels were not condemned but were destroyed, I say that if he can point out to me any writer on public law who makes a distinction as it respects the rights of the original owner between a vessel destroyed by a belligerent and one condemned in a prize court, I will pause to hear him now.

Mr. THURMAN. I should not suppose really a question as to the return of a vessel in specie could ever arise if she was destroyed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is precisely what I say, and therefore if in a case when the question can arise and she is therefore capable of being restored the courts of the country declare that she ought not to be restored, and that the right of the citizen in her is gone completely, then, I take it, it follows a multo fortiori that if the vessel be destroyed and gone there can be no right remaining in the original proprietor. I hope the Senator sees the force of that. Mr. Justice Story, in delivering the opinion in the Star case, said:

This is the case of an American ship, captured by the enemy during the late war, and after condemnation and sale to an enemy merchant, recaptured by the American private-armed ship Surprise. And the question is, whether, under these circumstances, the ship is to be restored on salvage to the former American owner or condemned as good prize of war. If the case were to stand on the general salvage act of 1800, in the cases of recapture, (act of 3d March, 1800, chapter 14,) it is perfectly clear that the claimants are barred of all right; for that act expressly excepts from its operation all cases where the property has been condemed by competent authority. The same result would flow from the principles of the law of nations. It is admitted on all sides, by public jurists, that in cases of capture a firm possession changes the title to the property; and although there has been in former times much vexed discussion as to the time at which this change of property takes place, whether on the capture or on the pernoctation, or on the carrying infra præsidia, of the prize, it is universally allowed that at all events a sentence of condemnation completley extinguishes the title of the original proprietor, and transfers a rightful title to the captors or their sovereign. It would follow, of course, that property recaptured from an enemy after condemnation would, by the law of nations, be lawful prize of war, in whomsoever the antecedent title might have vested. (3 Wheaton, 85, 86.)

The laws of nations, I must assume, were known to these countries when they negotiated this treaty; and I must assume that they were known to that great and august tribunal who tried the question of the liability of Great Britain for acts in aiding the confederates in respect to those vessels against the commerce of the United States—acts, I repeat, of the vessels, which is the language of the treaty and which is the language of the tribunal; not acts against our citizens, for which they were preferring claims against Great Britain, as they could if the captures were illegal, but acts of these vessels. In the language of Count Sclopis in pronouncing the judgment of the tribunal upon what were called the indirect claims, certain things were not to go into the computation of claims between nations. That is the language which the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SCHURZ] read when the case was handed to him—not deciding, as he intimated, that the tribunal was to pass upon the claims of this citizen or that citizen or any body of citizens, but saying that these classes of indirect claims were not the subject of computation in controversies between nations. And yet out of this very proceeding of this tribunal honorable gentlemen endeavor to draw the idea that that tribunal found itself confined to a decision as between the United States and its own citizens as to whether an insurance company that had already grown rich out of this destruction and the cognate ones and the risks of the war, should be paid double or not.

Why, Mr. President, no nation has ever yet submitted to a tribunal a question between itself and its own citizens. Every nation, through sentiments of self-respect and independence, reserves to itself the right to determine the claims of its own citizens against itself, and never concedes to another nation or to any other tribunal the right to determine what its relations are to its own citizens or what its obligations are to its own citizens. If it is to recover from a foreign country for damage that is done to the property of its citizens, it recovers it because inasmuch as the property of its citizens is damaged so the nation suffers; and it recovers because the nation suffers, and not because the citizen suffers.

But let us go a little further. I have only spoken now of the state of the case which is presented to us here, that this property was admittedly destroyed as a belligerent act by vessels of the Confederate States of America, and that Great Britain was held responsible because in respect to these vessels, and in respect to this particular destruction, she, in the language of the publicists, was the ally, or the associate, or the assistant causing that destruction, which possibly the direct and immediate belligerent would not have been able to do if she had not received this friendly assistance from the nation which in that respect was her ally and associate. Now turn over to these instances of subrogation to which the honorable Senator from Ohio has so much referred, and what do you find? You find that in every instance the subrogation was allowed where the original capture was an illegal capture, one made in violation of the laws of war and made of the property of a neutral and not of the property of a belligerent. What is the reason? Then, as the books all say—I need not take time to read them, because nobody disputes it—the seizure in that case is an illegal seizure, and it does not change the property of the citizen in the goods or the vessels that may be seized, and therefore, the property not being changed, if it be carried into a belligerent port the owner has a right to go to the belligerent nation and say, as a matter of right and in his own right, "Give me back my vessel or give me the value of it; you have not captured this vessel under the laws of war; you have not captured it in a belligerent capacity; you have not assisted a belligerent to capture it; but through a mistaken interpretation of your officer as to what his duties were you have seized the vessel of a person who was not in any way engaged in the controversy." That seizure is illegal. The captain who makes the seizure or who carries in the prize is liable to an action, and his government is bound to protect the citizen thus wronged. As the Senator from New York has shown by the statute of 1799, the citizen of this country in that instance, if it had been such an instance, would have been entitled to sue Great Britain in her own courts as a citizen of the United States for the loss of the property which he had suffered by such a destruction. But unhappily the answer of the British courts in such a case as this would have been, "Why, Mr. American Citizen, this seizure by Captain Semmes, of the Alabama, was not an illegal seizure; it was a belligerent seizure; it was a seizure under the commission of a power in the world that we recognized and that you recognized as a power lawfully authorized to take prizes and to sink ships; and therefore you have no status in court at all." Then if you went further, and it were put upon the ground of an illegal assistance by citizens of Great Britain to the confederates, upon the ground which the Senators would like to have this case put on, and the ground upon which the counsel of Great Britain in the arbitration would have been glad to have it put—which was in their argument to be sure, but not in ours, and not in the decision—then you would have been met as we were met in the case of the Alexandra, where she was seized and prosecuted in the courts of Great Britain for an effort to violate her neutrality and to commit her to an assistance in a war against us, and would have found that the laws of Great Britain happily did not provide for such cases; that nobody in Great Britain was responsible for fitting out ships to aid the confederates; that the municipal laws of Great Britain did not hit the case; and your citizen would have gone home as empty as he came, and in perfect accordance with British law.

Where, then, does the citizen of the United States stand in this case? He stands as a man who is the citizen of a country engaged in a public warfare; he stands as a man whose ship in that public warfare has been sunk by the cannon of the enemy; and then when we look to the reclamation we find that that public enemy was assisted in that destruction by a nation which, according to the definition of the publicists and according to the decision of this tribunal, was not in respect to these vessels a neutral nation, but that in violation of the attitude of neutrality that she pretended to occupy she had become an ally and an assistant of the confederate forces who were making war upon us, and was therefore responsible to us as a nation for the consequences of the destruction that she aided the public enemies of the United States to commit; and in that case, as I have shown from the decisions of our own courts and from the principles that the publicists have always laid down, the citizen of the United States has no individual claim against anybody. But would it follow because he had not an individual claim that the Government of the United States could not prefer one against Great Britain? By no means. Suppose Great Britain had made direct war upon us, and at last, at the end of the war, we had conquered a peace by going across the northern border and taking that somewhat cold and inhospitable country called Canada as an indemnity; would it be said that the citizens of the United States whose territory had been invaded and whose property had been destroyed would have a claim upon this Government—I am now speaking of a legal claim of right, and that is the ground on which these insurance companies stand—to be indemnified out of the lands of Canada? By no means. Nobody ever pretended that; and yet this tribunal decided, as I say, that Great Britain, professing to keep a neutral attitude, and therefore, as she claimed, not being responsible because she had preserved her neutrality, was guilty of having assisted the war against us, and was therefore responsible for the consequences of that war against us as far as they could be followed. And why was she not held responsible for the other damages that we claimed? Not for the reason that they were injuries to the nation by any means, because the injuries to the citizen were injuries to the nation, but because you could not refer to her part in the war the acts of these other cruisers, because you could not refer to her part in the war the fact that the premiums on insurance had been raised upon war risks, for the reason that there would still, if she had not been the ally of the confederates, have been the chance that the confederate forces would have been enabled to bring a naval armament upon the sea and to make war upon our commerce. That was the difficulty. It was impossible for the arbitrators to separate the fact that in respect to three vessels Great Britain had committed herself to a state of war against us and the fact that in respect to all other vessels she had not, and to the possibilities that at any moment out of these thousands of miles of sea-board held by the confederates there might emerge vessels of war to make war upon our commerce; and therefore it was impossible to know to what extent insurance was based on the fact that Great Britain had engaged in warfare, just as it is in the case of these private ship-owners, to which so much allusion has been made as to the profits that they made out of the state of war. It is impossible to tell. There is the difficulty. You cannot assert of any individual ship-owner that he made a dollar because there was a war in which Great Britain participated. You cannot say of any vessel that because the Alabama sailed, the owner of that vessel made a profit. You can say that in the course of five years or three years in the war he made profit. Can you tell how much; or how much more or how much less profit he would have made if there had been a state of peace? You cannot tell. But when you turn to the premiums of the war insurance company, you know that if there had been peace it would not have made any profit at all, because it could not have insured against any war risks.

Therefore the distinction, as it appears to me, is perfectly obvious between the case of the insurer who rests himself upon the state of war alone, and the case of the merchant who makes his profit not because there is a war, but because he is engaged in a commerce out of which he would make profit if there were peace, and in respect to which it is impossible by any scales known to human understanding to put into the balance on one side or the other what he would have made or would have lost, as comparing a state of war to a state of peace.

But now, coming down, Mr. President, to the state in which this treaty was made, you will find, as I said a year ago, and as is not disputed or referred to now save in one instance, that in the dozen treaties which have been made between the United States and other powers for the indemnification of our citizens for wrongs committed against them in the very instances out of which these insurance cases grew, which are called the subrogation instances, the treaties themselves declare that the other government shall be responsible only for the illegal captures and seizures of the property of American citizens, America being a neutral and the other nation being at war and our property therefore having been illegally taken, and hence the title not changed, and our citizens therefore having a direct and lawful right to go directly to the government whose vessels had destroyed their commerce and demand recompense. They were not bound to do it through our intervention, as the statute of 1799 shows. They could appeal directly. It was a debt, in the language of the French treaty, which France owed to us for the spoliation of her vessels on our commerce, out of which the spoliation treaty grew and the spoliation claims grew, and it expressly declares that France is to be responsible only for the illegal seizures that her cruisers made of our property. Now, the Alabama, the Shenandoah, the Florida, made no illegal seizures. The seizures that they made were lawful ones. There remained, therefore, after condemnation, or after destruction, which is greater, no right in the individual citizen at all. The mass of the nation has suffered through the body of its members, just as the body of a man suffers if his hand is cut off or his eye is put out. That is the difference.

Then in the treaty with Spain precisely the same principle is asserted and in terms in the treaty, that the right of the citizens of the United States depends upon the fact that their property has been illegally seized under the authority of Spain; and so in the case of Denmark; and so in the case of Mexico; and so, to sum up, in every instance in which the rights of citizens of the United States have been put forward where we have occupied the attitude of a neutral and the power against which we put them forward has occupied the attitude of a belligerent. Here we occupied the attitude of belligerent and Great Britain pretended to occupy the attitude of a neutral, but has been found by this tribunal to have, as it respects these vessels, occupied the attitude of an ally of the belligerent, and she was responsible as the belligerent would have been for the destruction of this property.

That is the distinction, and one which as I say the honorable Senators on the other side have carefully and industriously steered clear of, because in the one instance the right upon which they seek to found the claim of these insurance companies to stand in the place of the assured does exist, and in the other it does not; and unhappily for their arguments the right exists where there is an illegal seizure or condemnation, which does not change the property, and it does not exist, as in this case, where the destruction was a public, belligerent one; and the party is held responsible for it solely because as it respected that property she had become the ally and the assistant of the belligerent power.

I have not time to go through all these treaties in detail; Senators will find every one to be as I have stated, that the distinction is between the claims of the government (made, it is true, and measured by the losses of its citizens, because there is no other way to measure a national injury, where the injury is inflicted on the body of the inhabitants, except to take each instance and foot them up and see how many vessels of A have been destroyed, and how many of B, and how many of C, and what their cargoes were) and the claims of private citizens in private right made against the government of the other. In respect to the Alabama claims, this treaty of Washington starts out by declaring that there is a difference between the United States and the government of Great Britain. The old treaty for American claims against Great Britain herself, the treaty of 1794, starts out by declaring that it is to settle the claims of American citizens against the government of Her Majesty. The treaty with France starts out by declaring that it is the claims of American citizens against France that are to be determined. The Spanish treaty starts out by saying that it is the claims of American citizens against Spain that are to be atoned for and the distribution made to them. But when you come to the Alabama claim, you find that it is a claim made by the Government of the United States, growing out of the acts of Her Majesty's government or its neglect in respect to the vessels known as the Alabama and her associate cruisers, what are generically known as the Alabama claims.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. EDMUNDS. If it is not over a moment.

Mr. THURMAN. The distinction between those treaties and the treaty of Washington is this, that in all those treaties there were nothing but individual claims involved; but under the name of the "claims known generically as the Alabama claims" in the treaty of Washington there were other than individual claims.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, Mr. President; but the Senator has again industriously omitted to touch the point that in one case it was the property of the citizen of a neutral power that had been illegally seized by a belligerent power; and in the other case it is the property of the citizen of the belligerent that has been destroyed by the ally or through the assistance of the ally of the other power at war. That is a point that that Senator cannot meet; and I venture to suggest, but in a whisper, that he is somewhat sensible of it himself.

Now let us go a little further.

In order to remove and adjust all complaints and claims on the part of the United States—

Not on the part of citizens of the United States, but "on the part of the United States, it is agreed to refer" the claims known as Alabama claims to this high tribunal. What then is to be done? If they determine in gross, they are to allow a gross sum. If they determine, as has been so well said by the Senator from New Jersey, that there shall be a minute inquiry in order to ascertain exactly how much injury has been done, then there shall be a board of assessors. Then what is to happen? Are the expenses of this board of assessors to be paid, as in the case of private claims by the citizens of one government upon another, out of the fund? By no means. "In the case of the assessors the expenses of the board are to be borne equally by the two governments." They are not to be paid by citizens, and why? Because citizens have no right to the fund that is recovered. Their rights begin, as the rights of all citizens in such cases do, upon the sentiments of justice or generosity or public policy that their government itself may be called upon to act upon in reference to the special injuries its citizens have received. Now go to the twelfth article of the very same treaty and see what it says:

The high contracting parties agree that all claims on the part of corporations, companies, or private individuals, citizens of the United States, upon the government of Her Britannic Majesty, arising out of acts committed against the persons or property of citizens of the United States during the period between the 13th of April, 1861, and the 9th of April, 1865, inclusive, * * * shall be referred to three commissioners.

Is there any mistake about that? Does anybody fail to see that in the first instance one kind of language is employed when speaking of those matters that are of public right and public injury, and when it comes to the claims of private citizens upon either side on the government of the other the same identical treaty says in terms, as all the old treaties do in respect to these illegal acts, that they are the claims of private citizens against the other government, and as such they are to be allowed and paid.

Can somebody tell me how it happens that if this first class of claims referred to were understood by the parties making this treaty to be the claims of citizens and in the right of citizens as such, language was not used that would say so? When you turn over to the claims that were understood to be private and for the benefit of the persons who make them or on whose behalf they are made, then the treaty uses clear and specific language to say so.

Mr. THURMAN. May I again have another moment?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir.

Mr. THURMAN. Why then was the tenth article put in the treaty?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That has been twice already explained, and my friend shall have the benefit of a third explanation. The trouble is that he attends to somebody else while I am on that point, and so does not hear me. I will restate it. I say the tenth article was put into the treaty in order that instead of guessing at a gross sum, if the arbitrators should say this amount of injury is so uncertain that we cannot judge justly or estimate justly at large how much it amounts to, then there shall be a board of assessors, who shall go into the particulars and find out as the woodman finds out how many logs he has cut in the forest, tree by tree, acre by acre, instance by instance, and in that way make up the sum total that Her Majesty's government are to pay.

Mr. THURMAN. But the question is, would not that board of assessors have decided in favor of A and B and C?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the question. I say no; no more than they would have decided if they had been counters of a flock of sheep on an Ohio prairie, if there is one there, that every individual sheep had acquired a right against the Government because he was counted by some public man who was to lay taxes upon him. These assessors were merely the masters, who were to compute in detail the amount of the injuries if it turned out that the tribunal of arbitration found that any injuries had been committed, unless the tribunal should say "it is easier and we can get near enough at the whole amount of these injuries by allowing a sum in gross." That is all. One was a sum in arithmetic; the other was a general estimate upon the general character of the claims upon both sides and the general probability as to the aggregate of the losses. There was a difference.

Then when you come to the case of private claims under the twelfth article, as I say, they are, as in every other treaty where private rights are intended to be protected, enumerated as private rights eo nomine; and when they come to sum up the expenses of such a determination and inquiry, you find, as this treaty provides, that those who have the private rights upon either side shall pay the expenses of their being enforced by a deduction of 5 per cent. out of the sum awarded upon either side for them. You do nothing of that kind as to the Alabama claims; you do not name them as individual claims; but when in the same treaty and in the same document you come to those claims that are matters of private rights still existing in behalf of the citizen upon one side or the other, because the act of the Government as to him was not a belligerent act and he did not stand therefore in the attitude of a person whose property might justly be destroyed, in that case you speak for him, because he has a right; in the other case you speak for yourself, because yourself have been injured through the body of the persons of your citizens and their property.

My honorable friend from Wisconsin [Mr. CARPENTER] kindly reminds me of what I ought to have mentioned, if I may—it has been referred to in the debate—the fact that the Johnson-Clarendon treaty undertook to put the claims of our citizens as this twelfth article puts this class of claims of our citizens in this last treaty, and that was as the claims of citizens of the United States upon Great Britain. I have the treaty here before me. Although I believe it is a confidential document, it has been referred to; and I must take leave to violate the rules if others do. In that treaty it was provided, "Whereas claims have at various times since the exchange of ratifications," &c., "been made upon the government of Her Britannic Majesty on the part of citizens of the United States and upon the Government of the United States on the part of subjects of Great Britain," and therefore it proceeded to declare that we would have an inquiry and settlement about them. The Senate of the United States—I believe I do not disclose any secret in saying—rejected that treaty almost unanimously. Then when we come to this treaty we find that when we turn to this class of claims entirely different language is used, and it is put upon its true ground as a claim of the United States against the party who has assisted in making war upon her by destroying the property of her citizens. Then when you come to the next ground, it is the claim of the United States and of Great Britain reciprocally for the private claims of their respective citizens against the other, which are to be heard, tried, and determined as private claims and paid accordingly. There is the difference; and yet in the face of all this we find Senators strenuously arguing that, although all this loss has run down as to the insurance companies upon the body of the tax-payers and is a question for ourselves to determine, we shall double the profits of those who speculated upon the war by saying that they shall be paid out of this fund.

I see, sir, that my time is exhausted.

Mr. OGLESBY. Will the Senator from Vermont allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will, with the permission of the Senate, as my time is out.

Mr. OGLESBY. I should like to have one explanation before voting.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will answer any question with the permission of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 32, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Bayard, Bogy, Bontwell, Buckingham, Conkling, Conover, Cooper, Cragin, Davis, Dennis, Fenton, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Howe, Ingalls, Johnston, Jones, Merrimon, Morrill of Vermont, Norwood, Pease, Ransom, Robertson, Saulsbury, Schurz, Sherman, Stockton, Thurman, Tipton, and Washburn—32.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Boreman, Carpenter, Chandler, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Hager, Hamilton of Texas, Harvey, Hitchcock, Kelly, McCreery, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Oglesby, Pratt, Ramsey, Sargent, Scott, Sprague, Stewart, Wadleigh, West, Windom, and Wright—27.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brownlow, Cameron, Clayton, Dorsey, Ferry of Connecticut, Flanagan, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamlin, Lewis, Logan, Morton, Patterson, Spencer, and Stevenson—14.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to offer two or three amendments, some of which are formal and some I consider material. In section 11, line 13, I move to insert after the words "shall be" the words "stated and adjudged upon the basis of United States gold coin;" so as to read:

And all claims provable, or to be allowed under this act, shall be stated and adjudged upon the basis of United States gold coin, and be verified by oath, &c.

The only object of the amendment is to make that clear which is not now clear by the bill, whether or not these claims are to be based upon gold coin or upon currency. It is clearly for the interest of the United States that gold coin be the basis of all these claims; first, because they accrued on the high seas and sometimes at foreign ports, where the value of our currency was not known; and, second, because currency varied from 110 to 290 during the period when these claims accrued; and consequently, if we settle them on the varying basis of the value of currency then, and pay them in coin now, it would be manifestly uncertain and unjust. I offer this amendment to protect the United States and make the basis of stating the account and of adjudging the account and paying the account the coin of the United States of standard value.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.]

A division was called for.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the Senator from Vermont will state any objection he has to this amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Debate is not in order. I am not entitled to make any objection to it.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator is.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think this is like a United States bond that we are bound to pay in coin.

The question being put, the ayes were 7.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is a further count insisted upon?

Mr. SHERMAN. I deem it my duty to take the five minutes allowed me to explain this matter. I regard this of vital importance.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not want to interrupt the Senator, but I merely wish to inquire whether five minutes were by the agreement to be allowed? I am not disposed, of course, to find any fault or to make any complaint.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair was not present yesterday at the time the agreement was made.

Mr. CONKLING. The RECORD will show. Let that be read. The Chair will find the agreement in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will read the agreement. This occurred yesterday:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state it.

The proposed arrangement is that at two o'clock to-morrow the Senator from Vermont who has charge of the bill shall take the floor and occupy it for one hour, and at three o'clock the voting shall commence upon the amendments and the bill without further debate.

Mr. THURMAN. It is not intended that there shall be no debate on amendments that shall be thereafter offered, is it?

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. Except a limited debate by general consent.

Mr. THURMAN. Of course there ought to be some debate on amendments that are offered, if it is only a five-minute debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the proposition agreed to? ["Yes!" "Yes!"] The Chair hears no objection, and the proposition will be regarded as agreed to.

It seems to be an agreement for five-minute debate on the amendments offered to-day.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now I will occupy but a moment or two to simply state the importance of this amendment. I view it simply as a financial point. Suppose a claim to have accrued when gold was at 270 for a ship worth $100,000 in currency—and I am informed some of these claims are made in that way—it would dwindle by the test of gold to $40,000. The claim may have accrued in a foreign port; it is manifestly proper that that claim should be stated in gold coin, the standard of all commercial transactions, the standard of all the commerce of foreign nations, the standard at every place where these claims could have accrued. Gold coin alone could be the standard at any place where the Shenandoah or Alabama could have made a capture; and consequently to allow these claims to be made upon a currency basis to be paid now in coin would be manifestly unjust and against the interest of the United States. I think that the fair reading of this bill as it now stands would require the claim to be made on the basis of gold coin. I have inquired of the Senator from Vermont, and he says it is uncertain or he cannot tell.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What does the Senator say?

Mr. SHERMAN. I spoke to the Senator about whether or not these claims would be based upon coin or currency, and the Senator, as I understood, said he did not know; that he understood many of them were based upon currency.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator misunderstood me, or I misunderstood him.

Mr. SHERMAN. Are they based on currency or coin?

Mr. EDMUNDS. The claims are presented in currency to the State Department.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will then take the case of a vessel worth $100,000, sunk near a foreign port. It is worth $100,000 in currency, but really worth only $40,000 in gold. Shall we pay out of this fund $100,000 in gold for that which was worth only $40,000 in gold? Certainly not. That would be manifestly unjust not only to the United States but to the other claimants. It would create an inequality in regard to these claims. I say the standard of value should be the gold coin of the United States, or gold which is the standard of all commercial transactions. All these insurance contracts were based upon it. So important do I regard this that I will venture to divide the Senate and call for the yeas and nays in order to have an expression of the sense of the Senate upon it. Indeed when I showed it to the Senator from Vermont I understood that he would not object to it strongly.

The next amendment I shall offer provides for the payment of the awards in coin. The money is in the Treasury of the United States in coin, and therefore the whole transaction ought to be in coin.

Mr. STEWART. I have not been here during the debate; but I understand that we have now decided by a vote of the Senate to pay this money to the insurance companies, and we are not to pay any more money than we got from Great Britain. Then I think that the less complication we have about it the better, for the reason that the quicker we get rid of the money the better. I am thoroughly satisfied it is not going to the parties who have been injured, but is going to parties who do not deserve it, under the pretext that according to existing law it is theirs. We not having made a law for the fair distribution of it, it is going to parties who went into a speculation for the purpose of making money, and did make money in the speculation. With all the facts before them they went into the business of insurance and receiving war risks. We have gone to work to collect this money, and propose now to give them more, so as to make their speculation more successful. That having been done and the money going to them, I do not think it is worth while to set the accounting officers to investigate what particular premium gold was worth at the time. It is not going to parties who suffered; it is going to enrich those who made speculation out of the war. Let it go in that way; I am opposed to any amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I can be excused, under the ruling of the Chair, I suppose, for speaking for a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the ruling of the Chair the Senator is certainly entitled to five minutes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think it is wise for the Senate, if one of the minority may be permitted to express an opinion about this bill, for the United States, having received these claims on the basis of sums stated in the currency of the country at the time they accrued, and having been presented as it is said for the benefit of these people in the currency of the country, because the tribunal awarded the money in coin, which would make 10 or 15 per cent. addition to it, to be sure, which might cover interest, and when the United States is a trustee, (for that is the ground we go upon,) to undertake to wrong the beneficiary by shaving him down to an original gold basis when he bought everything at enormous prices and lost at enormous prices and when we have got the gold for him and 12 per cent. over. To now undertake to say that we will treat our beneficiary in that way would be grossly unjust on the principle the Senate has adopted, that we are the trustees of this fund and hold it for the benefit of those who are entitled to it. Now, to undertake to say they shall not have their claims allowed in the same way that the tribunal allowed them—that is footing them up and computing in the currency of the country and paying in gold, which is exactly the reverse of the proposition of the Senator from Ohio—I confess very much astonishes me. It is true the Senator from Ohio says the awards shall be paid in gold, but he says also that each account shall be stated in gold. If you state the account in gold, you cut down these claims one-half to begin with, taking the average of them during that time, for gold was nearly 200 almost all the time when these things occurred. You cut them down most enormously, and then this trustee that has been working for the interest of its beneficiaries is to pay them on the basis of that reduction. That is the proposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks he ought to call attention to the RECORD once more. On hastily reading it over the Chair on first taking it in hand was of opinion that the arrangement agreed to yesterday included five-minute debate on amendments; but in reading the whole, what precedes and what follows the part already read by the Chair, the Chair is clearly of opinion that that was not intended. The Chair will read:

Mr. THURMAN. It is not intended that there shall be no debate on amendments that shall be thereafter offered, is it?

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly.

That is "certainly it is so intended."

Mr. SHERMAN. Except a limited debate by general consent.

Mr. THURMAN. Of course there ought to be some debate on amendments that are offered, if it is only a five-minute debate.

Then the Presiding Officer said: "Is the proposition agreed to?"

Hastily reading it, the Chair was of opinion that that included the five-minute debate, but evidently it did not. It included the first proposition which the Chair had stated, and in stating that proposition no qualification was made by the Chair. So that as the record stands the Chair is of opinion that there is no debate on amendments except by unanimous consent.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that I gave notice at the time the proposition was pending, at some stage of it, that I should offer these identical amendments and desire an opportunity to explain them.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator has explained them, so that it is all right so far.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have spoken on this amendment. I may wish to speak on the others also.

Mr. THURMAN. I hope there will be no objection to a discussion of this very important amendment. I am sure I want some light on it. I do not know exactly how to vote on it, and I want to be enlightened.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to allowing debate on this subject, and will assume that the debate proceeds by unanimous consent unless some objection be made.

Mr. THURMAN. Obviously where an amendment is offered in good faith and is of importance, as this is, where it is not offered in any spirit of hostility or carping or merely for the purpose of allowing debate to take place, I think it is the best way to consider it. I do not think there is danger of any unnecessary consumption of time, and I should like to hear what is to be said on this subject that I may intelligently vote upon the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.]

Mr. THURMAN. If I understand the amendment of my colleague, it is that these claims are to be put in upon a gold basis. Now I want to know, if his amendment prevails, whether they are to be reduced to gold as gold stood in the market at the time the loss occurred?

Mr. SHERMAN. They are to be stated on the gold basis, their gold value at the time the loss occurred, and they are to be adjudged upon that value and paid with interest in gold now.

Mr. THURMAN. Then I submit to my colleague whether his amendment is specific enough?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is to be followed by another amendment which declares expressly that the award shall be paid in coin with 4 per cent. interest.

Mr. THURMAN. That is true; but will they not estimate their losses in currency and reduce that to gold at the present price of gold, which would make a world of difference? That would only reduce them about 12 per cent., whereas at the time the losses occurred gold was all the way from 200 to 280. It seems to me that if the purpose of my colleague is to make them estimate the losses in gold instead of in currency at the time the losses occurred, it ought to be specifically expressed.

Mr. SCOTT. I can see that this amendment is clearly open to the objection made by the Senator from Ohio who sits farthest from me, [Mr. THURMAN.] The language, as I have just read it at the desk, is that the claims shall be "stated and adjudged." That I think refers to the adjudication by the tribunal. It therefore ought to be "shall be stated and adjudged upon the basis of United States gold coin at the time of the loss of the vessel or property."

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to that modification.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.]

Mr. SHERMAN. Let it be read as it now stands.

The CHIEF CLERK. The proposed amendment is to insert after the word "be" on the thirteenth line of the eleventh section the words "stated and adjudged upon the basis of United States gold coin at the time of the loss."

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think the decision of the Chair was perfectly correct in regard to debate; but I also think that an amendment of this importance ought by general consent to be placed before the Senate so that it can be understood. I confess that I do not feel ready to vote upon this, although if I have no more information than I have now, I shall go with the committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have not the slightest objection to stating more fully the ground of it; but I do not wish to violate the rule. I never like to ask for unanimous consent.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senator does not violate the rule if he asks for general consent. Debate cannot proceed without general consent, as the Chair has very properly ruled, but on this amendment general consent will be given, no doubt.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will then ask general consent of the Senate to make a few remarks on this amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio asks unanimous consent to make a few remarks on this amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not object to that, but I think that he ought to ask that general leave be given to debate this proposition. To give general consent to one gentleman to speak and then depend upon a unanimous consent for other gentlemen, might be unfair. I have no objection to general consent being given that this subject may be debated.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to opening this amendment to debate? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Five minutes discussion, or unlimited debate?

Mr. THURMAN. Do not limit it; it is too important.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unlimited debate is what is proposed.

Mr. CONKLING. Unlimited debate upon what?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On this amendment.

Mr. CONKLING. On this amendment and no other?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposition is in relation to this amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope it will be five-minutes debate, because I presume every Senator can express what he desires in five minutes.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection, then, to opening this amendment to discussion in speeches five minutes in length? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHERMAN. When I first carefully examined this bill yesterday I called the attention of the Senator from Vermont to what I regarded as some defects in the financial section. One of them was that the bill was entirely indefinite as to how these claims should be made up, whether upon the basis of gold or currency, and also as to whether the money should be paid in gold or in currency. The answer as given by the honorable Senator was not very satisfactory, and I then studied the bill carefully, and I assure Senators that the bill is now open to very serious and perhaps fatal objections that will create claims against the United States much larger than could possibly be presented under a bill properly framed.

The government of Great Britain have awarded to our private citizens $15,500,000. That is their money in gold; and the United States in my judgment is simply a trustee for these people. If the persons who lost vessels and sustained injuries by the action of the Alabama and other cruisers during the war can present their claims in currency in lawful money of the United States, the result is that in some cases their claims will be swollen to twice and a-half what is the just foundation of their demands. Remember that these losses all occurred on the ocean beyond our jurisdiction; not one of them within the jurisdiction of the United States; all beyond the reach of our legal-tender laws, in a region where gold alone was the standard of all values, and every vessel and every loss incurred in foreign waters was measured by the gold standard. There were times during our war when some of these vessels which were worth $40,000 in gold were worth $100,000 in currency. They were sunk in mid-ocean, in foreign waters, where their value was entirely based on the coin. Now, can it be possible that such a claimant shall come in here and demand $100,000 out of this money which is the property of a great number of claimants, and probably not sufficient to pay them all? Because at that time there happened to be a depreciated currency in this country, because our laws here among ourselves declared that money to be legal-tender, can such a person come here and now demand $100,000 in gold out of this fund as the property of any individual? The same lawful money now is worth nearly par in gold. But the measure of value of all this property thus lost was gold, and that was the basis upon which all commercial transactions rested. Therefore the account ought to be made out upon the gold value at the time, and the interest ought to be paid upon that gold value at the rate stipulated, from that time to this; and now the money ought to be paid in gold. We have secured it in gold. Why, sir, one of the honorable commissioners suggested to me a moment ago that in all human probability there is scarcely a doubt but that these claims were reduced, when they were allowed, to the gold standard; and yet under the operation of the bill the Senator from Vermont admits parties may present these claims in currency, although they may have been awarded and adjudicated upon and the $15,500,000 allowance may have been based upon gold value.

Mr. HOWE. Does it make the slightest difference in the world, as to the general result, whether these claimants are paid in currency or coin, if they all claim upon the same basis?

Mr. SHERMAN. There is the trouble. The losses occurred at different dates. Sometimes on the occasion of the early losses our greenbacks may not have been at a depreciation of more than 10 per cent., and two or three years after they may have been at a depreciation of 180 per cent., and therefore there is a gross inequality among the claimants. If, however, you pay them their losses as commercial losses, in gold, with interest from that time in gold now, you have equalized the matter among them. Otherwise you make a very great inequality. On the basis of this bill the claims presented against these fifteen and a half millions may amount to twenty or thirty millions, because if they are all made out on the currency basis the money will be totally inadequate; and the inequality of distribution would be manifest and would be severely felt by many of the claimants. I only speak of it to protect the United States and to protect the claimants in the division of this property. It seems to me the amendment is very clearly right, and I supposed when it was offered no one would object to it.

Mr. HOWE. I have not a word to say about this. I cannot see myself that the Treasury is in the slightest danger. We have got $15,500,000 in gold there; and that is the only fund, I take it, that this Government can pay out. They may pay their awards in currency, if they please, but they will pay just as much more currency than that as the gold is worth more or the currency is worth less than the gold. They will not leave the premium or the difference between the coin and the currency in the Treasury. If their awards are paid in currency, they will pay the currency value of fifteen and a half millions of gold.

Mr. SHERMAN. The present currency value.

Mr. HOWE. And that is the time they are going to pay it out.

Mr. SHERMAN. That has nothing to do with it. The question is whether the claims shall be stated at the time the losses occurred, in currency or gold, and whether the interest shall be on the currency value or the gold value.

Mr. HOWE. I have not the slightest objection to giving any direction about the way they shall state their claims; but it is the award that is going to affect the Treasury and not the claims, and the tribunal when they make their award will have precisely the same currency in their mind.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, it occurs to me that the point the Senator from Wisconsin did not see—and I know there are very few that he does not see—was that the award was made based upon the claim, the claim being made in United States currency at the time of the loss. If it were, say, $100,000 for the loss of a vessel, it might have been worth about $80,000 in gold, or $60,000, or $50,000, or $40,000, according to the date of the loss; and yet as gold is the unchanging standard of value, the loss was stated at so much in currency, but in fact it was a certain sum in gold, no matter when it occurred. But the arbitration took the claim stated in currency and made the basis of the award in gold. Therefore if we are to follow that judgment, that award, and execute this trust, we will give back to these people just what was stated for them; that would be the gold measure; and to avoid fluctuations and consequent inequality is the object, as I understand, of the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. THURMAN. I am not entirely certain that I am right; but on reflection I am inclined to think that the amendment offered by my colleague ought to be adopted. Its object is to put these losses on a gold basis, and that was the object of the Geneva tribunal. It was alleged by the British counsel in their case that these losses were estimated in the currency of the United States, and it was claimed that they ought to be reduced to a gold standard, and they did proceed, therefore, to attempt to reduce them to a gold standard. I am not sure, but my impression is, that our counsel did not dispute the propriety of reducing them to a gold standard. Now, the object of the amendment of my colleague is to ascertain what was the loss by a gold standard at the time the loss occurred, and to allow that and 4 per cent. interest. That is a very material thing.

Let me illustrate it by the case of the Alert, the first vessel that was captured. She was captured in September, 1862, by the Alabama. The claims on her account amounted to $202,000, in round numbers to $200,000. That was in currency. I do not know exactly what was the price of gold at that time.

Mr. SCOTT. One hundred and fourteen.

Mr. THURMAN. Then that would not make much difference; but if you go along further to another case arising when gold had risen to 100 per cent. premium, and a vessel was lost, and she was put in at $200,000 when $100,000 in gold would have paid for her, if you allow her now to receive $200,000 less the present premium on gold, you would give her about $170,000 in currency. The present premium is 12 per cent., which would be $112,000. She would get $170,000 instead of $112,000, whereas $112,000 in gold with 4 per cent. interest would fully indemnify the parties. It seems to me you will swell these claims immoderately if you do not adopt the amendment of my colleague, and I think that will do exact justice; that is, if you pay the party the loss he sustained at a gold standard in gold at the time the loss occurred with 4 per cent. interest; and that is all he can ask.

Mr. HOWE. I am satisfied the amendment had better be adopted, not because it will change the result at all; but if there is any possibility that any court or any tribunal can find the present value of a piece of property at what was its currency value ten, twelve, or fifteen years ago, I think we had better guard against it by agreeing to this amendment; but I did not suppose such a thing was possible.

Mr. STEWART. I do not know that it is exactly pertinent to this question, but I should like to make an inquiry, if it is in order, of the chairman of the committee. A large amount of this money, $6,000,000 I understand, goes to insurance companies. I should like to know if under the bill foreign insurance companies also come in for their share.

Mr. THURMAN. No; they are prohibited by the bill expressly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That depends upon what form the bill is finally to assume. If, as is the present disposition of the Senate in committee, this bill is to be put on the theory that the United States is merely a trustee, and, except to the extent of the two vessels that it lost itself which it had hired, stands as a trustee for the people whose claims it presented before the tribunal, then upon every principle that I know anything about affecting trusts, it is the duty of the trustee to pay out the whole of this fund to the persons for whom it was collected; and it is not for the trustee to say, "I have collected too much for you, sir, and I will pocket the difference myself." It is not for the trustee to say, "There was included in this mass of claims which I presented, one for you"—a citizen of Holland if you please, an Amsterdam insurance company. "I have got the money upon it, and now having got the money upon it I turn around and say to you, you shall not have it because you are not a citizen." That will not do, if we are a trustee, as it appears to me. So that I should suppose, in harmony with what the Senate in Committee of the Whole has now determined to do, if that shall be adhered to, we ought not to make any distinction as to foreign insurance companies, but let them take their chances under the general principles of law. If it turns out that their claims were allowed by this tribunal as a part of the general footing, as a part of that which made up the $12,000,000 which the tribunal finally allowed, then of course it is their money in the Treasury, as the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Missouri have so forcibly remarked, which must be paid out to them, unless having got the money under pretense of recovering it for them we are to pocket it for ourselves because they are foreigners.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to call the attention of the chairman to the language of the bill, and see whether he regards that as an exclusion of foreign insurance companies:

> And no claim shall be admissible or allowed by said court arising in favor of any insurance company not lawfully existing at the time of the loss under the laws of some one of the United States.

I would inquire of him if by the laws of most of the States a foreign corporation does not have a lawful existence there, though it may not have been created there?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It does not have any existence there at all. A corporation only has an existence in the country where it is founded; it cannot be moved. It has a right to do business through agencies in other countries and subject itself to liabilities, it is true; but a corporation lawfully existing under the law of a given state is a corporation which that state by law has created or adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. I shall be excused perhaps for saying a single word upon this topic of interest.

These claims were allowed by this tribunal just in the form they were presented, and each merchant and each insurer when he made up his claim made it up, as he had a perfectly legal and proper right to do, in the currency of his own country, and he estimated the value of his vessel and of his cargo in the currency of the country as it stood at the time, just as everybody else disposed of his property or put it into the tax-lists and so on. Therefore, if the tribunal acted upon these claims as individual claims made into a mass of $14,000,000 or $12,000,000, they allowed to that extent without diminution on account of difference in currency, because the British judge in his commentary upon Mr. Staempfli's estimate alludes to that very fact. He says:

> It is necessary, therefore, in the first place, to deduct from the United States claim the three amounts specified in paragraphs a, b, and c, respectively—
> Which are not the question of currency and gold—
> which will leave, as is shown by the annexed table, a properly reduced claim of $10,801,324, as against the British estimate of $7,465,764, if the difference between paper and gold currency be for the present purpose disregarded.

So, disregarding the difference between paper currency and gold, he proceeds to show that Mr. Staempfli's table is in error so and so, and so on. Then the result of it was that the tribunal considered the question of the award of a sum in gross, without saying anything more about the question of gold and currency at all; and after detailed deliberation they proceeded to allow $15,500,000 to be paid in gold by Great Britain. It appears from what has already been stated that $12,000,000 with a certain interest was the principal of the sum which the arbitrators allowed, and I believe that to be correct. They called it $12,000,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. In gold or paper?

Mr. EDMUNDS. They called it $12,000,000 of gold that they were to allow; but the amount we claimed, saying nothing about what kind of currency it was in, was made up in our currency of our currency values. It was more than $12,000,000; we made it fourteen or fifteen million dollars on our own reduced estimates. The British counsel only made it $10,000,000. The arbitrators in substance, to use a northern phrase, split the difference and called it $12,000,000, and then they added interest enough to make $15,500,000. So the arbitration allowed us, as principal, to say nothing about interest, $12,000,000 in gold to pay $12,000,000 of currency estimate. That is the fact about it, and thereby they did a liberal thing to the citizens of the United States, if they were the people they were working for.

Having allowed that, the Senator from Ohio now proposes that every man, no matter at what period his loss occurred, no matter how much his ship was worth then, or how much he paid for it in his own currency, and for which the arbitrators allowed that sum in currency in coin, which was an advantage, shall now only take in coin what it was then worth. The consequence will be, in my opinion, if you get at it, taking the dates of these respective claims as they were filed in the State Department, and the dates of the losses, that if you adopt the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, you will, as he says, aid the Treasury of the United States vastly; you will probably save three or four million dollars, but how? You will save it by shaving it out of your cestui que trusts, for whom the tribunal has already furnished gold enough to pay the whole.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, it seems to me that the Senator from Ohio is right in his amendment, and I will try in a few words to assign my reason for thinking so.

Some time ago when gold measured by paper was very costly, claims were filed by American citizens against Great Britain. Those claims came eventually to be carried into an award, which award was in, and payable in, gold. Unless we ascribe error to the computation which resulted in the award, we must of course suppose that the measurement of value resorted to by the arbitrators was a coin measurement. Let us stop there and suppose that at that moment a rendition had been made to the cestui que trust, as the Senator from Vermont says, of this trust fund, what would have been done? Every man would have received in gold his share of that award. Meanwhile time has elapsed, and the beneficiaries have suffered delay. What recompense does the law make them for that delay? Interest, does it not? Always interest, never anything else. Accordingly the bill provides, fixing a rate of interest, that interest shall be allowed for all this period. So far it is very plain sailing and easy to be understood.

But while interest has been running and delay occurring a large appreciation has taken place in the paper currency of the country, so that if the tribunal now to be authorized to distribute the fund measures by paper, what will be the result? Every beneficiary will have, first, the value to which he was originally entitled; second, he will have interest upon that value; third, he will have the enormous appreciation in the mean time of the paper currency, amounting at least in round numbers to 33⅓ or 50 per cent. That cannot be.

How does the Senator from Vermont answer this? He says if we measure by coin, there may be a residuum of the trust fund. As he said, if we do not pay foreign insurance companies, if it turns out that they were excluded, there will be a residuum of the trust fund. To that I say, "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." Should it occur, it would be very common. Nothing is more common than that a trust fund consisting of many elements turns out in the end not exactly to coincide with the draughts upon it. If the draughts exceed the fund, the bill provides that the payment shall be made pro rata. If it turns out that although the American Government represented nobody but its own citizens, did not represent the citizens of France or Holland, by some blunder of the tribunal a claim or parcel of a claim due to a French subject, or a man in Amsterdam, in Holland, was carried into the amount, that will be one of those casualties, one of those occurrences by no means extraordinary, and what we shall do in the end with that money will be exactly the same question which would arise should a hundred dollars or a thousand dollars or a million dollars of the trust fund remain, a separate question to be decided when the time comes in the presence of the fact.

But certainly it does not answer the argument of the amendment now before us to say that it may result in saving two or three millions to the Treasury. So be it. It is enough for us to know that every man receives precisely what he would have received at the time. What was that? It was the measure in coin of the property he lost, with the interest added, and I see no reason why he should receive also the benefit of the great appreciation of currency.

Suppose it were the other way; suppose in place of calling in our currency and nourishing it, as we have done by legislative acts, more currency had been issued and there had been a depreciation so that it would require now four paper dollars to buy one coin dollar, would it be said that it would be just to pay to the losers in paper and let the great discrepancy which would there occur be involved? I submit not, and we must adhere to the coin standard in order to avoid error either way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 37, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Boutwell, Buckingham, Conkling, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Fenton, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Howe, Johnston, Jones, Kelly, Logan, Merrimon, Norwood, Oglesby, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Ransom, Robertson, Sargent, Saulsbury, Schurz, Scott, Sherman, Stockton, Thurman, Tipton, Wadleigh, and Washburn—37.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bogy, Boreman, Carpenter, Chandler, Conover, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Hitchcock, Ingalls, McCreery, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Sprague, Stewart, West, Windom, and Wright—21.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brownlow, Cameron, Clayton, Cragin, Dorsey, Ferry of Connecticut, Flanagan, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Harvey, Lewis, Morton, Patterson, Spencer, and Stevenson—15.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now, in lieu of the words already stricken out at the beginning of section 15, I move to insert the following:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and required to pay in coin the said respective judgments of said court out of any such money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; and for that purpose he is hereby authorized, when necessary, to issue and sell at public sale, after ten days' notice of the time and place of sale, at not less than par in gold, a sufficient amount of coupon or registered bonds of the United States, in such form as he may prescribe, of denominations of fifty dollars or some multiple of that sum, redeemable in coin of the present standard value at the pleasure of the United States after ten years from the date of their issue, and bearing interest, payable quarterly, in such coin, at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum.

I will simply state that this amendment does not increase the public debt, as is suggested to me, but it authorizes the cancellation, according to the bill, of the present bonds that have been issued and the substitution in their place of the bonds provided for by the act of 1870, and it furnishes the means to pay the award.

Mr. CHANDLER. I would suggest to the Senator from Ohio, instead of making a new class of bonds, why not specify some bonds that are already issued, that they may be of the same series and the same species and in the same form.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is precisely what I have done.

Mr. CHANDLER. No; you have provided for a new ten-year bond.

Mr. SHERMAN. This is precisely the bond prescribed in the act of 1870, what is called the new five, word for word, and it is put in for the purpose of avoiding the difficulty suggested. The present bond that has been issued is not a new class of bond. It is a 5 per cent. bond, but it is in the nature of a trust bond, and that is to be canceled when these bonds, which are new fives, are issued.

Mr. CHANDLER. Why not sell the bonds you have on hand? We want them thrown upon the market.

Mr. SHERMAN. Because they are not of the description of those now in the market. They are simply trust bonds issued for this particular case, and they are to be canceled.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Ohio is greatly mistaken in saying that the bond in which this money is invested by the Government is a special trust bond. That is a mistake, unless the Treasury officials and the Secretary of State have violated the law. The law directed this money to be applied to the payment of the public debt and an equivalent amount placed in a five-twenty registered bond of the United States, one of the regular five-twenty registered series, and it has been so done, as I am informed. Therefore the United States is the holder of a bond or bonds of one of the existing classes, and which we may dispose of to meet these judgments, as the Senator provides, from time to time; but we have not got a new obligation of the United States of a different kind and form from that before authorized by law. It was just as if the money had been put with the American Trust Company, if you please, who were instructed to invest it in five-twenty bonds of the United States to hold; and therefore there is no need of this change in the bonds; but there is no objection to it that I know of. I do not care anything about it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I showed this amendment to the Senator. The only object is to authorize the sale of these bonds.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That I do not object to.

Mr. SHERMAN. The bill as prepared authorized the cancellation of these bonds, but provided no means of raising the money to pay the judgments. The condition of the Treasury may not be such as to enable us to pay out of the current revenue this debt, and this amendment provides that in such a case, if it is necessary to raise the money, these bonds may be sold. I am entirely indifferent whether the particular bonds now outstanding shall be sold or whether new bonds are sold.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So am I, Mr. President. I do not want to occupy a moment's time about that; but what I do object to in this amendment is the idea that we are going to sell bonds to raise money to pay this sum. We have got the money into the Treasury. It has been used to pay so much of the public debt, fifteen and a half millions in coin. The public debt has been that much reduced, and a similar amount has been placed, although it is merely a formal account, in a five-twenty bond, which is in charge of the Secretary of State.

The committee thought that out of the current income of the Government, if we were to pay in currency, as we thought we ought to pay in currency, these payments should be made, and as fast as made we should cancel the bonds held by the Secretary of State. What is the effect of that? That enables you to do what the world understands you have done already; that is, to have paid off fifteen and a half million of the public debt and reduced it so much, and to pay out of your current revenue, as you have now taken that step, these claims. The Senator from Ohio proposes that we shall increase the public debt in effect by selling bonds enough to pay this money, instead of paying it out of the money in the Treasury, on the ground that we may be short. If you are to pay in coin, perhaps that might be necessary, because if the imports should be very small and the amount of coin receipts therefore very small, it might be that all the coin we should obtain would be absolutely necessary to pay the interest on the public debt; and in that point of view it may be the Senator is right. If you are to pay in gold, it is very likely that you will be obliged to increase the debt of the United States by selling bonds and getting coin to meet this obligation. As the Senator has charge of the money branch of this subject, I certainly shall not object to anything he proposes.

Mr. SHERMAN. I find I was right. I thought I was before; but I now learn from the Secretary of the Treasury, who issued this 5 per cent. bond, that it was issued in the form of a single bond for $15,500,000, the largest bond probably ever issued in the United States—a 5 per cent. registered bond.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there any law against issuing a fifteen million dollar bond if you can get a purchaser for it?

Mr. SHERMAN. Not at all; but I say it is in such a form that it could not be sold by piece-meal or canceled by piece-meal as provided by the bill. Therefore there is a necessity for some new bond of a similar character to be issued and sold.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.]

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. There is an amendment on the table which I propose to move, and I will state in a single word, before it is read, its object. The first ten sections of the bill before us consist of provisions for the establishment of a special court. I propose in the language of one of the House bills, that this matter shall be referred to the regular judicial courts of the country; and I therefore move to strike out the first ten sections of the bill and substitute for them the sections which lie upon the Secretary's table. The part stricken out relates entirely to the machinery of the court and nothing else.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, which was to strike out the first ten sections of the bill, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

That within sixty days after the passage of this act, the Attorney-General of the United States shall file in the circuit court of the United States, in a circuit to be designated by the President, a bill in equity, in the nature of a bill of interpleader, which shall state, if any, what claim on said money paid upon said award is made by the Government of the United States for losses or damages, with a concise statement of the facts, grounds, and nature of such claims, respectively; and also that the United States holds the money paid by Great Britain in pursuance of said award, and the interest accruing thereon, subject to the just claim of all persons and corporations entitled thereto. All persons, companies, or corporations who have already filed claims in the State Department for losses or damages caused by either of said cruisers shall be named as defendants in said bill, and that they claim severally to be entitled to portions of the said money, but the particulars of their several claims need not be set forth. And notice of the commencement and pendency of such bill shall be given by publishing the substance thereof in one public newspaper in each State and Territory at least once a week for three months successively. And such notice shall state the day of filing such bill, and that every person, company, or corporation claiming to be entitled to any part of said fund, and desiring to appear and become a party thereto to assert such claim, is required to enter an appearance therein within six months from the filing of such bill. And all and every person, company, or corporation, whether named as a defendant in said bill or not, who shall not enter an appearance thereto within said six months, shall be forever barred of all right or claim in or to any part of said award: Provided, however, That the court may allow, within thirty days thereafter, any party to enter an appearance upon proper cause showing that such party was prevented therefrom by fraud, accident, or mistake.

SEC. —. That every person, company, or corporation who shall, within six months after the filing of said bill, appear and claim to be entitled to any part of said award, shall be admitted as a party defendant therein; and within two months after the expiration of said six months, every claimant to any part of said award who has duly appeared as a defendant in said cause shall file in said court a statement, under oath of the party or his duly authorized agent, giving concisely and clearly the facts and grounds of his claim, and the amount thereof, together with such exhibits as he may be advised, which statement and the exhibits shall be in print, and twenty copies thereof filed in said court: Provided, That those persons named as defendants and claimants in the bill may file such statement of their claims at any time after said bill is filed, and before the expiration of said six months, at their option.

SEC. —. That immediately after the filing of such statement of claim by any claimant, the court shall fix a reasonable time for such claimant to take and file his evidence in support thereof, and shall allow the Government reasonable time to take and file evidence in opposition thereto; and any claimant shall be allowed to file evidence in opposition to any claim made by the United States to any part of such fund; and all testimony shall be taken in the manner and according to the practice of the court in equity causes, subject to the provisions of the second section of this act.

SEC. —. That when the evidence is closed upon any claim, the court shall hear and determine the same in accordance with the provisions of this act; and in all its proceedings herein, the court shall be governed by the rules of practice of courts of equity of the United States so far as the same may be applicable.

SEC. —. That whenever more than $5,000 of any claim shall be disallowed by the court, the claimant, within thirty days but not afterward, may appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States; and whenever any claim exceeding $5,000 shall be allowed, the United States shall have the same right to appeal; and if any claim shall be allowed in favor of the United States exceeding $5,000, any claimant, or any number of claimants jointly, may appeal therefrom; and all appeals shall be taken according to the law and rules governing appeals in equity from the circuit to the Supreme Court, but only so much of the record of the circuit court contained in the bills, pleadings, and evidence as may pertain to the claim in the judgment appealed from shall be sent up. Upon the allowance of any such appeal, it shall pass immediately to the Supreme Court for hearing, without awaiting the decision of other claims, and such appeal shall not delay proceedings in the circuit court upon other claims filed in the cause: Provided, however, That the death of any defendant shall not work a discontinuance of any part of the proceedings, but the legal representative may appear and prosecute his claim within such time as the court may order.

SEC. —. That all appeals from the allowance or disallowance of such claims shall be entered at the term of the Supreme Court next after such appeal; and the Supreme Court shall give them precedence of other causes in said court, so far that they shall, if practicable, be heard at the term they are entered, and the decision of the Supreme Court shall be certified back to the court from which the appeal was taken.

SEC. —. That when the time shall have expired in which any claim can be filed in said court, the judge shall certify a list of all such claims, showing in detail the gross amounts thereof, to the Secretary of State, who shall cause a certified copy of such lists to be filed with the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. —. That whenever final judgment shall be rendered in the circuit or Supreme Court in favor of any claimant, a certified copy thereof shall be issued to the claimant, and a like copy be filed in the State Department.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should be very sorry to see that amendment adopted. The committee very carefully considered on two occasions the propriety of sending this matter to a court with all its machinery, and the extreme danger of allowing these claims to be estimated and examined in detail by a master of a court; because everybody knows that no one judge in the United States could or even would himself examine these claims, whereas the committee thought that a commission composed of five men of eminence, whose duty it was directly, and who had nothing else to do, no other judicial duties to perform, could so do it as to be sure to do justice between the various parties and the United States. This proposition to turn this whole matter into a grand hodge-podge by a bill in equity in favor of the United States against everybody else to litigate for this fund in some uncertain circuit court, whose constitutional powers on such a question as between citizens of different States might be open to some question, and whose other duties would lead, as the committee thought, to almost infinite delay, was a thing which in their opinion ought not to be done. They considered that, as in all other cases under treaties, it was much safer to leave it to a commission whose duties were exclusive, whose character was high, whose numbers were sufficient that they might correct the mistakes of each other, and who would get to a determination at some time; and I believe there is no instance in respect to the action of commissioners under treaties where citizens have been allowed to prefer claims that the commissioners themselves have been justly suspected of not doing justice to all sides.

Then, speaking for a majority of the committee, I should certainly hope that whatever else may be done with this bill, we shall not send these claims to any one circuit court of the United States where the forms of law, the process and proceedings all take the shape of judicial affairs, and where only one judge, the circuit judge, could have any control over them, and where under him every matter of detail would be left to those who are called masters, and who in some of the courts are well known to be persons who, however good their intentions may be, are liable to make very great mistakes.

Mr. CONKLING. I need not tell the Senate that I have no feeling about this amendment. I have not even that pride in regard to it that one might have in respect of an amendment which he drew himself. I did not draw it. It was prepared in the House of Representatives, and perfected once by a committee there, and I believe it adequate to the purpose, should the Senate choose to send this matter to a regular court rather than to one specially created for the occasion. It has in my mind several merits, to two or three of which I will refer without arguing them.

In the first place, it utilizes an existing tribunal with regular rules of practice and full equipment. Thus it dispenses with the necessity of building up a special court with a special set of machinery for this purpose.

Again, it commits every man who is employed as counsel in these cases to a forum and to a mode of procedure to which he is accustomed and which he knows all about in advance.

Again, it saves not only the expense, with the various matters involved in that, of a special tribunal, but it saves a good deal which I do not care to refer to that is quite likely to attend or be supposed to attend one of these special commissions.

That brings me to what I deem more important than any consideration I have specified in its favor, namely: It allows every claimant, if his claim amounts to $5,000, to take the judgment upon every question of law of the highest judicial tribunal, in place of being estopped forever upon all questions of law as well as of fact by the judgment of five men who never saw each other as judges until they assemble here to be gathered together at $5,000 or $6,000, whichever the bill prescribes, for this single and exceptional service. I do not know what class of lawyers are to be resorted to, willing to lay down their business absolutely and abandon everything for a period not to exceed eighteen months, and give their whole time in the city of Washington to adjudicating these questions. I venture to say, however, that the President and the Senate will hardly be able to select five men whose final judgment upon a question of law will be quite as satisfactory as the judgment, in the first instance of a circuit court with a right of review upon every question of law, to every claimant whose interest amounts to $5,000 by the Supreme Court sitting in banc.

It seems to me that for these reasons, without referring to others, we may well avoid the expense and innovation of creating a special court and allow the President to select some circuit, of which there are several, not overburdened with business, where in one single suit upon an interpleader, everything can be heard, and every one who chooses may have the judgment of the highest tribunal upon every question of law.

I desire to take the sense of the Senate on the amendment, and I will venture to ask for the yeas and nays upon it, adding, as the Senator from Vermont referred to the committee, that I believe I shall commit no impropriety when I say that this question like some others has been one of a good deal of doubt in the committee, and the committee not only has not been unanimous in regard to it, but some of those who gave their assent to the form which the bill has taken were quite balanced in opinion upon this very point.

Mr. HAMLIN. I do not myself believe that it would be wise to adopt the amendment submitted by the Senator from New York; and I will state in a very few words the reasons why I think it would not be wise, and which will control my vote.

First, there is no circuit court that can discharge the duties that would devolve upon it if all these claims are sent to it, without a denial of justice to some other parties who may have business in that court.

Second, a court can be organized under this bill, as reported by the committee, amply competent to discharge all its duties.

Third, I think that court should by no means be composed entirely of lawyers. One great question to be determined will be the true and honest value of ships and vessels; and while there will be questions of law not very delicate perhaps to be considered, no questions that an ordinary lawyer in good standing I believe would not be able well and truly to determine; there will be questions of value upon which the judgment of a man who knows every timber in a vessel from the keelson to the top-block of a ship would be worth more than that of all the lawyers you could congregate in all the courts of Christendom.

Mr. HOWE. He will not see the ship.

Mr. HAMLIN. He will not see the ship, but he will know what constitutes a ship, and he will understand the evidence that will be given in relation to the value of a ship.

Again, if these claims go to a circuit court, what will be the result? To get at these various sums which are to be paid, the different cases will be referred to masters, and you will have a hundred of them. One master will adopt one rule of estimating damages and another another, and you will have just as many different rules to fix the compensation to be paid as you have got masters; whereas the court proposed by the bill, I think, as the Senator from Vermont says, will practically settle all these questions, and whatever may be the rule they adopt, it will be a uniform rule, and all will come within it, while by referring them to a hundred masters you will have a hundred different rules by which you will establish the award to be made. For these reasons I shall vote for the bill as it is.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I merely wish to trespass on the Senate by saying one word in addition to what the Senator from Maine has said; and that is in the interest of these claimants themselves. If we are to provide for them, let us make justice to them as easy and as cheap as possible. If you have a commission, as the bill is framed, it is the duty of the State Department to turn over the papers and proofs to that commission. The honest ship-owner whose ship has been destroyed and who has filed his proofs there really need not be obliged to take any further step about it. There is his claim; there are his proofs. If you turn it over to a circuit court and make him a defendant in a lawsuit and oblige him to appear, put in his answer, come to his pleadings, and then be sent to a master to litigate the question, he had better throw up his claim to begin with; he never will get anything unless his claim is a very large one; while under the bill, with a tribunal constituted here where the papers are, to which the papers are to be turned over, the tribunal acting upon its own simple rules of providing justice for these men, in nine cases out of ten there would not be the slightest necessity for any counsel at all and the claimants would immediately get what they are entitled to.

Mr. HOWE. I saw this amendment and I read the provisions of the bill. I really myself thought the machinery proposed by the amendment for distributing this fund was the most convenient, the most economical, and the safest to the rights of the Government and to all parties having claims upon it. I cannot see any necessity for creating a special tribunal to dispose of a given fund, the exact amount of which is known. It is true that a great part of the business under the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York will be transacted, not before the court, but by masters. It is very true that those masters will not be in every instance men of as high character as perhaps you would select for the officers of this special tribunal; but it is not at all true, I think, as suggested by the Senator from Maine, that there will be as many rules of adjudication as there are masters engaged in the investigation of these claims, for this reason: whatever master is employed, he will have the claimants before him, and whatever may be his rule of adjudication, those who think he errs or who feel injured by it, whether it be a private claimant or the Government itself, will take exceptions to his report, and that will bring all these different decisions of the master before one tribunal, to wit, the circuit court; and if that court makes a ruling which is not satisfactory either to the Government or to the claimant, an appeal will lie from its adjudication in any given case to the Supreme Court; so that you will finally have a distribution of the award made with but very little reference to the Supreme Court, but made under rules which meet the sanction of the highest court in the land.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. After much woe, grief, and trouble.

Mr. HOWE. Very little grief and very little trouble, as it seems to me. There is but very little trouble in taking an exception to an erroneous ruling, very little trouble in submitting that exception to the judgment of the circuit court, and very little trouble in taking an appeal, if need be, from the decision of the circuit court upon that exception to the Supreme Court, and getting the judgment of that court. After one or two adjudications of that kind, the principles upon which the whole fund is to be distributed would be known to the whole profession.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not wish to detain the Senate a minute. I simply wish to say that having given this subject considerable consideration, I think the advantages of adhering to the plan reported by the committee over that contemplated by the Senator from New York have been truly and correctly stated by the Senator from Maine. There is great advantage in having a summary proceeding in this matter, a great saving of expense to the people, and this fund cannot be more economically used than in spending a part of it to maintain that tribunal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] upon which the yeas and nays have been asked for.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 23, nays 34; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bogy, Boutwell, Conkling, Cooper, Dennis, Fenton, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Hager, Hamilton of Texas, Howe, Johnston, Jones, Logan, Merrimon, Norwood, Pease, Ransom, Sargent, Scott, Sprague, and Stockton—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bayard, Boreman, Buckingham, Carpenter, Chandler, Clayton, Conover, Cragin, Davis, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Gordon, Hamlin, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Kelly, McCreery, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Oglesby, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Saulsbury, Sherman, Stewart, Wadleigh, Washburn, West, and Wright—34.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brownlow, Cameron, Dorsey, Ferry of Connecticut, Flanagan, Hamilton of Maryland, Harvey, Lewis, Morton, Patterson, Schurz, Spencer, Stevenson, Thurman, Tipton, and Windom—16.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SARGENT. In section 1, line 5, I move to strike out "five" and insert "three," so that there shall be three commissioners instead of five to constitute this tribunal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California.

The question being put, there were, on a division—ayes 22, noes 24.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My objection to three instead of five is the fact that here, with the interest, is $17,000,000 of money to be decided about and disposed of; the rights of probably five or six hundred persons, I do not know how many, but taking seamen and all, perhaps a thousand persons are to be heard and determined by this tribunal. Now, if you are to have celerity of final decision so as to have justice and right done speedily, it requires a very considerable number of persons of high attainment to do it and do it justly and well, without putting the claimants to the expense of employing counsel to know and to do that which the commissioners of the Government themselves should know and should do. Then a considerable number is always a guarantee against undue influence, fraud, or overreaching of any kind, to which a smaller number might in various ways be subjected.

I make this suggestion to the Senator from California and to his good sense. If it is to be a commission to distribute so large an amount of money and to determine the rights of such a vast number of claimants, it ought to be of sufficient number to devote themselves to it, and to have it done in season, and to have it done well. If you reduce the number to three, you reduce by almost one-half the working capacity of the court, and you reduce therefore by a very large degree also the ease and celerity with which citizens can have their claims determined and disposed of.

Mr. SARGENT. I admit that as this bill is framed it seems possible that there may be a very large number of these claims, more I think than there ought to be. I doubt if the claim of each sailor, which is referred to by the Senator from Vermont, should be taken as a separate claim to be pressed before the tribunal. I admit the number would swell to a thousand, perhaps to two thousand if the claim of every sailor is to be received separately and passed on by the tribunal as distinct from the vessel and distinct from the interest of the owners of the vessel to which he belonged. In that way the claims will be frittered away in mere spray and will amount to nothing. Many of the claims will result in nothing to the claimants under the expensive system provided for in this bill; but it seems to be implied in the remark of the Senator from Vermont that the number of these claims, including those of sailors, makes a requirement for a large commission. If this bill shall be so amended that there can be no question but that the claims of sailors may be ascertained and added to the claims of the vessels, and be distributed by the owners of the vessels or by those who would have paid them, under bonds given to the Treasury, in the same manner that they would have been required to pay them if there had been no interruption of the voyage—if that shall be made clear in the bill, then at least one-third of the work which is supposed by the Senator from Vermont to be put upon these commissioners will vanish. But aside from that I believe that three commissioners, even if they are to pass upon the individual claims of sailors and fishermen, will be sufficient to do this duty.

So far as the labor of consultation is concerned and the time occupied in consultation, it takes no more time for three men to consult than it does for five; in fact it can be done with more celerity and dispatch because there are fewer minds to be brought into accord. If two instead of three are a quorum for a court and two instead of three are to concur, that concurrence is more readily obtained than the concurrence of three out of five. There is nothing magical in the number of five for the attainment of honesty or just dealing with the parties whose rights are to be determined by this tribunal. If it is necessary to increase the number in order that we may have honesty in these matters we had better increase it to seven or to nine, and the more you increase it the more honesty you will get. I believe that three men may be as honest as five men, because it is not the honesty of individuals added together but the integrity of each individual which makes the sum of honesty, and you do not increase the amount of honesty by simply increasing the number of men. Therefore the argument on the ground of honesty entirely fails. If this is a question of honesty or stealing, if the court is to be influenced by bribes, then we are no more safe with five, and perhaps less so, than we should be with three.

I propose further along in the bill to offer an amendment which shall provide that where claims have been filed under the rules of the State Department, and are strictly in form according to their rules, and those claims have been recognized by the Geneva tribunal, they shall be admitted without the necessity of further proof. I do not think that claimants should be loaded down with the necessity of again proving claims which were distinctly proved before and which were distinctly admitted by the Geneva tribunal as just and an award made for their settlement. If that amendment be adopted, it certainly will lessen the labor of this commission so much that we can afford to save twelve or eighteen thousand dollars extra from the Treasury which would be absorbed by a larger court.

For these reasons I have asked that the court consist of three instead of five members.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, is it not a plain argument as to the convenience and practical workings of this tribunal, that if you reduce the number of commissioners you increase the chances for a divided court. By having five commissioners you make three a quorum; and the chances are that illness, temporary disability, or the absence of one of the judges or of two of the judges will leave you still with a quorum for the transaction of business. It seems to me that as the tribunal is to be a temporary one, as its business is to be confined to a single transaction, the ascertainment of these amounts under the law, it would be unwise and false economy to cut down the number of judges from five to three. I say nothing about the wisdom that is said to proceed from the counsel of many; but I certainly believe that the chances of proper adjudication would be increased by the larger number. I think there is also something in what was said by the Senator from Vermont, that the chances of improper control from any source are decreased by increasing the number of those who are to decide. I thought it was almost received as an axiom in legislative bodies that where you bring the body down to a small number you do increase the opportunity for improper individual influences. I say nothing, however, upon that point, because I hope that in so great an occasion as this is and so important a one to our people, the class of men who will form this commission will be such as to command the confidence absolutely and unrestrictedly of the entire country. I think it would be unwise and false economy, leading to possible delays, if you limit the tribunal to three judges, one of whom may be sick or absent, and if so you have a quorum of two who may be divided.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. In addition to the magnitude of the amount that is to be distributed, which justifies having a larger number on the commission, I have no doubt the purpose of the Senator from California, which I take to be economy, will be better served by having five than three. If we should have no more than three, I predict that the time allotted for the adjudication of these cases will have to be very much prolonged. Now, if there are five to take hold of the business, of course each one of them will have a certain portion of the business allotted to him; and taking the amount of documentary evidence that will be submitted, it will be no small labor for any one to make a synopsis of the evidence that is produced. Under these circumstances and under the circumstance alluded to by the Senator from Delaware, that there is a possibility of the disability of one in case there were to be only three and the two remaining should happen to be divided, all business would be hung up until the recovery of the third commissioner would enable them to have a majority to decide a case, I believe that it is absolute economy for us to have five.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 22, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bogy, Clayton, Conkling, Davis, Dennis, Gilbert, Hager, Hamilton of Texas, Hitchcock, Howe, Johnston, Jones, Kelly, Logan, McCreery, Mitchell, Robertson, Sargent, Saulsbury, Scott, Stewart, and Washburn—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Anthony, Bayard, Boutwell, Buckingham, Carpenter, Chandler, Conover, Cooper, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Merrimon, Morrill of Vermont, Norwood, Oglesby, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Ransom, Schurz, Sherman, Sprague, Thurman, Wadleigh, West, and Wright—28.

ABSENT—Messrs. Allison, Boreman, Brownlow, Cameron, Cragin, Dorsey, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Flanagan, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Harvey, Ingalls, Lewis, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Patterson, Spencer, Stevenson, Stockton, Tipton, and Windom—23.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SARGENT. I offer the following amendment, to be added as a proviso to section 9:

Provided, That all claims now on file in the State Department that shall on examination be found to be prepared and verified in accordance with the rules established and promulgated by that Department, after eliminating therefrom such items as were declared by the Geneva arbitrators as inadmissible, shall be deemed conclusive without further proof.

I do not think it is just to those parties to require them to prove their cases twice. The State Department laid down the rules which they were required to follow in proving their cases. They followed those rules, or I assume that some of them did, strictly, in accordance with the directions which were given. The cases went to the Geneva tribunal. Some of them were eliminated, thrown out, not provided for. I propose that these parties shall be saved the necessity of hiring lawyers and of waiting eighteen months upon this tribunal; that if they have proved up their claims strictly in accordance with the requirements of the Government heretofore, or proved them sufficiently to have them collected on their behalf from a foreign government, we now shall recognize them as proved, and relieve them from this great cost, and relieve this tribunal, which is made so large on account of the enormous amount of labor that is before it, of a portion of that labor.

Mr. THURMAN. The proposition is to decide upon the distribution of this money upon wholly ex parte testimony. It is not a question now between us and Great Britain. It is a question between these different claimants, and this is a proposition to decide as between them upon an ex parte presentation of the case. That will not do.

Furthermore, if the amendment be adopted this fund will fall very far short of paying the claimants, for these claims amounted to very much more, according to the estimates of the persons making the claims, than was allowed by the Geneva tribunal.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. It is well known by some men that some claims have been presented which will not bear very thorough examination; and for that reason I hope this amendment will not be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. STEWART. I believe the theory of this bill now is that we are trustees of this fund; and inasmuch as the fund is going to parties that acknowledge they have not sustained loss, but claim to be the rightful owners of the fund for whom the United States is trustee, I will try to offer an amendment to carry out the theory. It is a new section:

That all expenses incurred by the United States in negotiations and otherwise by which the money was obtained from Great Britain, and in the care and distribution of the same, shall be reimbursed before any private claims are paid.

I offer that as an independent section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. THURMAN. The bill distinctly provides what the United States shall retain. If the purpose of the Senator from Nevada is to kill the bill, let him avow it at once, and let him vote against it; but it is not to be killed in this way by attaching to it such a provision as this. Five per cent. is retained. Some of the expenses, perhaps a major part of the expenses incurred by the United States, was incurred in prosecuting claims of the United States which were rejected by the tribunal. There is no justice whatsoever in saying that we shall deduct from the claims all the expenses incurred by the Government before the Geneva tribunal.

Mr. STEWART. The theory of this case is that the United States has become a collector. For whom? For persons who organized for the purpose of making money out of the adversities of the country, out of a condition of war, and who realized large gains thereby. They organized insurance companies, or the insurance companies already organized provided themselves with means to charge war rates, out of which war rates they made many millions, while the rest of the country was suffering and being taxed. While the burdens were falling upon their fellow-citizens these individuals were speculating in war risks, which they had a right to do, and out of which they made money. Now is it fair to further tax the United States to collect claims from Great Britain to further increase their wealth and their enormous gains? If we are trustees we have a right to deduct from the fund the expense of administering the trust; and there is no lawyer who can deny it. It is charged here that we are trustees, and that these companies are subrogated to the rights of the insured. It is upon that theory that the bill now rests. We have been to immense expense in collecting this money. Whatever expense we have been put to collaterally or directly in all these negotiations ought to come out of this fund before it is given to corporations that have grown rich out of the accident of war. If there is anything in the theory, this amendment is certainly legitimate.

Mr. THURMAN. It does my democratic heart good to hear the Senator from Nevada preaching up a little of the old democratic doctrine against corporations. He is indignant at these soulless bodies. He forgets that the corporations that hold two-thirds of these claims are mutual insurance companies, and that he might just as well denounce a partnership; he might just as well denounce Grinnell, Minturn & Co. as to denounce these mutual insurance companies, who were not making profits out of the misfortunes of other men, who simply insured themselves; and they hold two-thirds of these insurance claims.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CHANDLER. Is not the Senator aware that mutual insurance companies, as well as all other insurance companies, charged 10 per cent. war risks?

Mr. THURMAN. But they charged themselves.

Mr. CHANDLER. Not at all. They divided their profits as others did among their stockholders, and the assured were stockholders to the extent of the money they paid for insurance. They charged the war risk and collected it and made money just as every other insurance company did out of the misfortunes of war.

Mr. THURMAN. How did they make money? They paid themselves; that is all. The men who made the money were the men who paid the money. That is the whole of that. They were merely a set of men agreeing to insure each other, not making profits out of the adversities of the country. I am not going to argue that over again. But what is the Senator to do with the eleven millions that do not go to insurance companies, that go to the poor sailors, that go to pay the seamen's wages, that go to pay the people whose property was destroyed and sunk or burnt—what is he going to do with them? Is he going to find out how much the Government expended in recovering some compensation for them?

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I am not afraid to do justice to a corporation or to an individual. It does not make any difference whether the parties were insurance companies, or individuals, or mutual insurance companies or any other kind of insurance companies. They charged war rates and made money out of that particular business, and they have no equity.

Mr. CONKLING. Did those who insured themselves make money?

Mr. STEWART. The money was made up out of the general public in the enhancement of everything that was consumed and the general rise of prices. They made money and lost nothing. I say, if the general public is to become a collector for them and is to give it to them and cannot distribute it on principles of equity because it must be distributed on principles of strict law, strict law is just as good for corporations as for individuals; and if the United States is trustee it has a right to charge for the administration of the trust. That is it.

Mr. SHERMAN. We reserve 5 per cent.

Mr. STEWART. It has cost more than 5 per cent. If it has cost the whole we have a right to take it. As to paying the poor sailor, I was willing the money should be distributed to those who had sustained real losses and stand by the Committee on the Judiciary because they reported in favor of real losses, and let the Government be the collector for those who had sustained real losses. On that theory I was willing to do it. But when it is put on the other ground, that we must pay because we are bound by law and are mere trustees, then carry out the theory and diminish to that extent the enormous gains of these insurance companies. I think they will get it pretty much all anyhow. I think the poor sailor will get very little. I think it is all pretty much in the hands of speculators and insurance companies now. If we are to collect it from Great Britain, let us charge for the administration of this trust the same as a private individual would charge, if we apply the doctrine of subrogation. There is no reason in it otherwise.

Has it come to this, that we have taxed the people of the United States, that we have gone through all these negotiations and at last find ourselves tied up by legal principles to such an extent that we are unable to distribute this money among the real losers, but we are so bound up by legal technicalities that we must give it to those who confessedly do not deserve it? If it has come to that, if that is the situation, then follow the real legal logic of the situation and require the expenses to be paid before you distribute the fund.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not wish to argue this particular amendment. I shall vote against it because I think the bill as reported from the committee is correct as it respects the amount of costs to be charged and taken out of the allowance from the fund. I merely wish to say one word, however, as the Senator from Ohio has opened the subject of mutual insurance companies again. I do not see that subject quite as he does, as perhaps may have been imagined before. He says they insured themselves. They entered into a special business, though so far as insurance goes it is a separate business, and anybody can come in. It is not a combination formed for taking care of each other, to which nobody else is admitted; but anybody can insure in a mutual company. The only effect is that he thereby becomes a stockholder, and whatever profits are made while the policy lasts he shares in. The moment his policy expires he is out, and the next man who comes in takes any profit that may have been made during that time. Therefore you cannot fix any particular moment at which you can say truly that an insurance company is, in the sense of a partnership, a mutual insurance company as to profits. But that is apart from the true question, and I should not have referred to it now but for the fact that the Senator from Ohio has done so again.

I merely rise now to say that I hope this amendment will not be adopted, and to express the hope that the Senate will hereafter stand by the understanding which we had, and that is to proceed and vote without any further debate unless under very special circumstances, and get the bill disposed of in some shape.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nevada.

The amendment was agreed to; there being, on division—ayes 21, noes 20.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Is it too late to call for the yeas and nays on the amendment of the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. EDMUNDS. We can reserve it and have a separate vote in the Senate.

Mr. SARGENT. I offer the following amendment, to be inserted after line 12 of section 12:

Provided, That 25 per cent. of the value of the whaling and fishing vessels allowed to the owners of such vessels, in lieu of catch, shall be added to the claims of such vessels, and also that the wages found to be due to the officers and seamen of all vessels in accordance with the award shall be added to the claim of each vessel, and the owner or owners thereof shall be required to file a satisfactory bond with the Secretary of the Treasury, before receiving any portion of the sum awarded for such vessel, that he or they will settle with and pay such officers and seamen in the same manner they would have been bound to settle with them if the voyages had been completed without interruption, the bond to provide for suit or suits by all or either of such officers and seamen in case of refusal or neglect to make such settlement when demanded.

I wish to say a word. Either this bill does provide such machinery that each individual sailor does not need to appear by a lawyer or counsel to push his claim upon this tribunal, or it does not. The amendment which I propose puts it beyond any dispute. It provides in the best way that I can devise—and if there is a better way I would like to have it suggested—a mode by which these matters may be treated in lump; that is, treated with the individual vessel and be distributed so as to safely reach the individual sailor. I do not wish this bill to pass in such shape that it will be a confiscation of these humble claims. It seems to me only just and fair that it should be provided that the sailors' claims should follow their vessel as they really did in the decision of the Geneva tribunal, and that they should go into the hands of the owners of those vessels, the employers, they giving a satisfactory bond to the Secretary of the Treasury that they will distribute the money in the same manner they would have distributed it if the voyage had not been interrupted, with the right of suit on this bond to any party aggrieved by a failure to distribute it.

If the bill provides all this let some gentleman show it to me; let the passage be pointed out. If it does not provide it, I ask Senators if it ought not to be provided for? If these humble individuals with a claim of a few dollars apiece, in no instance amounting to more than $100, are to be put to the expense of specially proving their claims before the commission, they will never get any money, and it will indefinitely prolong the labors of the commission. I propose the amendment in good faith, and think it will have a beneficial effect.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will not take up time, because I have no right to do so. I do not doubt the Senator's good faith in this amendment. That is the only quality that I think the amendment has, if it has good faith. It turns the sailor over to the owner, who may be dead and gone or bankrupt, and takes in lieu of the money a bond from the owner. By and by the owner gets the money and the sailor does not get any. The sailor comes to the United States and says, "I was not a party to that agreement; pay me." We cannot do that. Then the amendment includes something which the arbitrators rejected about prospective catch. I do not think we ought to do that.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator admits in effect that these sailors are to pursue each individual his claim before the tribunal. I thought he intimated it earlier in the debate on the first amendment which I offered. It now stands in the exact shape that each one of these sailors, unaccustomed to the law, is to be the victim of the worse landsharks than those we protected him against by the passage of the shipping commissioners' act. He is to be fleeced by a horde of lawyers. If that is to be the system on which this bill passes, I trust for one there will be another amendment offered to this bill and adopted by both Houses, providing that no member of Congress shall be allowed to practice before the tribunal.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That would be a good amendment.

Mr. SARGENT. The first part of the amendment, on the objection, which I have not now time to verify, of the Senator from Vermont, although my impression is the contrary, I will strike out; I mean that referring to the catch. Of course the Senator should be well posted on that matter; and when he states so positively as he does that it was rejected by the tribunal, though my impression was otherwise, I will conform to the objection and modify the amendment by striking out the first part of it which relates to the catch, although I think myself that the Senator is mistaken. With due deference to his great information on this matter, I will assent so far as to have that come out; but the other I say must work beneficially.

The objection which the Senator names certainly cannot be valid because the very owners of these vessels or their assignees, they or their representatives, are to come forward and press the claims of these vessels. I propose to connect the interest of the sailor with the interest of the vessel. Allow the sailor to avoid the necessity of employing lawyers to present his individual case, and a bond can be given which will bind the owners of the vessel, which will bind the money in the hands of these parties, and I am perfectly willing for the sake of the great benefit that will be conferred on the sailors, if it shall be found in some half-dozen cases or some two dozen cases that he has been defrauded by this arrangement, to say that because of the benefit we shall have conferred on all the rest we will pay those who have been defrauded out of the Treasury of the United States; and it will only amount to a very few hundred dollars to do it, and will save these poor men thousands on thousands of dollars, or the loss and entire abandonment of their claims.

If the Senator can show me that that which I point out is remedied; that there is any provision in this bill by which the hundreds of sailors who are not accustomed to forms of law are relieved from the necessity each one of putting his claim into the hands of a lawyer to prosecute before this tribunal, then I will admit that there is no necessity for my amendment. But the argument of the Senator asserts exactly to the contrary, and that being so, I insist that there is some necessity that these claims be attended to in this way.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But then I must insist on the understanding that we must go on with the voting without making so many speeches, although I listen with pleasure to my friend, and there is ingenuity in what he says; but he is mistaken about this bill. The bill provides that the board of commissioners are to take the evidence already on file and give it such weight as shall be just. If the case of the sailor is properly now on file, as it generally is, inasmuch as the nature of his claim is such that there cannot be any special dispute about values—you have the shipping articles which these gentlemen can get without any trouble, and you know who the sailor was, you know what ship he was on, you know where he went, and public history knows when the voyage was broken up. There is no trouble about turning the sailor over into the hands of the lawyers. His claim does not depend on principles which are disputable, and there is no danger of fraud. In the next place, if the sailor wants to do this, all he has to do, if he has confidence in the owner, is to get the owner to present his claim for him. There is no difficulty about it, but it must be left in the sailor's will. He now has a right against us which we have no right to throw off for anybody's bond. Now I do hope that we shall stand by the arrangement and go on with the voting.

Mr. THURMAN. I must claim the right to say one word on this proposition. I shall be very brief. In Mr. Staempfli's estimate these wages were put at $538,000. Probably that would quite cover them. We know that sailors are usually shipped for the voyage, and when the voyage is at an end they are discharged and go their way. If this proposition of the Senator from California shall be adopted, all the wages of the sailors on a ship will be paid to the owner of that ship. The sailors will have gone here, there, and everywhere, and I venture to say that not one out of ten of them will ever get one cent. It is just putting so much money into the pockets of the owners. It is very true that if on the other hand they are to prosecute their claims before this court, many of them will fail to prosecute the claims, and the consequence will be that so much money will be left in the Treasury of the United States.

When you come to analyze this thing, the whole question is whether or not these sailors' wages shall go to the owners of the vessels or whether they shall remain in the Treasury of the United States to be paid out hereafter to any claimants that we may think justly entitled to the money, or to remain as money in the Treasury. Although I grant that the amendment is offered in perfect good faith and I see the force of what is said by the Senator from California, yet the practical effect of his amendment, if adopted, would be to give four or five hundred thousand dollars to the ship-owners, not one dollar in ten of which would ever reach a sailor's pocket.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to ask my colleague a question. I ask whether under the third section of this bill it would not be within the competency of that court to prescribe rules and regulations by which all claims growing out of a particular vessel could be brought before the court at once, or could it not act on the proof of the claims for seamen's wages already on file?

Mr. THURMAN. I think that in regard to sailors' claims the court will have the power of a court of equity, and will let them be proved before an auditor just as a court of equity does, without any formal proceeding.

Mr. SHERMAN. And may render judgment in favor of the sailor on the evidence already filed?

Mr. THURMAN. I think so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California.

The amendment was rejected.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 3006) authorizing the President to nominate Holmes Wickoff an assistant-surgeon in the Navy; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3168) making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works for rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. E. BABCOCK, his secretary, announced that the President had, on the 7th instant, approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. No. 539) granting a pension to Eugene Smith, of Company F, First Nebraska Veteran Volunteers; and

An act (S. No. 567) granting a pension to Mary E. Naylor, widow of Osborn Naylor, late a private in Company C, Second Kansas Volunteers.

The message also announced that the President had yesterday approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. No. 350) providing for the payment of the bonds of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company; and

An act (S. No. 379) for the relief of Nathan Cole, late captain Twenty-third Regiment Veteran Reserve Corps.

AFFAIRS IN ARKANSAS.

Mr. CLAYTON. I ask consent to offer the following resolution at this time:

Whereas there is a condition of affairs in the State of Arkansas that may invoke Federal interference; and whereas Joseph Brooks and Elisha Baxter are each assuming to exercise the office of governor of the State, each having called on the President of the United States for aid to suppress domestic violence, and have called the Legislature of the State to meet in extra session, and have each surrounded himself with large armed forces; and whereas martial law has been proclaimed in several counties of the State, and all business has been suspended in Little Rock, the capital of the State, and the rights of person and property are jeopardized; and whereas in consideration of the foregoing it is the duty of the Government of the United States to be fully informed of the true situation of affairs in said State, and also as to whether or not the State has a government republican in form: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That a committee of three members of this body be appointed to forthwith proceed to the State of Arkansas with power to fully investigate into the cause of the disturbed condition of affairs therein, and also into the question as to who is the lawful governor of said State by reason of having been elected to said office by the legal voters thereof; and that said committee be authorized to send for persons and papers.

I move that the resolution be printed and laid on the table, to be called up hereafter.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CLAYTON. I ask consent to offer another resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate, if not incompatible with the public interest, all papers and correspondence relating to the troubles in the State of Arkansas that may be in his possession.

I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it go over until to-morrow.

Mr. CONKLING. Are not the papers already before the other House?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over.

THE GENEVA AWARD.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 7) for the creation of a court for the adjudication and disposition of certain moneys received into the Treasury under an award made by the tribunal of arbitration constituted by virtue of the first article of the treaty concluded at Washington the 8th of May, A. D. 1871, between the United States of America and the Queen of Great Britain.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I propose to amend the bill in section 11 by inserting after the word "claims" in line 2 the words "including war premiums;" and also the same language after the word "claims" in line 5.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The effect of that is to bring in what are called the war premiums paid on war risks.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. On the amendment I propose to say a word. I think the idea the American people had in their mind when we were making claims against Great Britain for damages done to American interests upon the seas was for losses which had occurred by reason of her omission to do her duty as a neutral power to us or by her acts of commission; and those covered the entire loss. There was no particular specification; but all our commerce had suffered loss; all classes of our people were exposed to the depredations on commerce, and were supposed to be included equitably. There was no technical consideration of this question, as I understand. It was not whittled down to the fine point which my friend from Ohio argued so ably yesterday in favor of particular corporations; but it was broad in its general expectation, covering losses of all descriptions by these depredations; nor was it understood that it was confined to losses by the depredations of the Alabama particularly, although she was a representative ship. Everywhere where the cruisers sailed and committed depredations upon our commerce there was a sensation of loss, a feeling of loss, and a feeling of indignation against the British flag. And the American people had expectations that all the equitable considerations which could be presented, backed by the certainty of loss, would in some way be met. That naturally covers many classes. Undoubtedly claims that have been represented here so eloquently and so forciby and so prominently on the floor of the Senate were among these. There is no question as to this general idea. Without arguing the technical proposition whether the insurance companies were by principles of law subrogated to the rights of the insured in any particular case, the claim was broad enough to cover all these classes. I am speaking now of the general expectation that the Government would demand of Great Britain under some circumstances, before any just settlement was made, money, a material consideration which should be sufficient to indemnify our citizens for actual losses. Nobody now will doubt that that was the general expectation; and just in harmony with that general expectation, with what indignation did the Senate of the United States reject a treaty which was supposed to come short of that, which was supposed not to meet that general expectation.

No voice, I believe, is reported to have supported a treaty which was believed to have come short of that general expectation. And, sir, in the speech which has been alluded to, made by the Senator from Massachusetts now no more among us, will be found to have echoed and re-echoed that general expectation and that demand upon the British government as broad as I have stated the popular expectation to have been.

Now, Mr. President, let us see for a moment how are we meeting with this general expectation to-day. How does this bill meet such an expectation? Let us look. What class is prominent here in the Senate of the United States to-day? Whose power and whose influence is conspicuous, pre-eminent, quite supreme here to-day? The losers? Those who have been losers by the war? I wish it were so. The people who went out upon the high seas carrying your flag, those who were brave enough and bold enough and patriotic enough to defy the British lion and the pirates upon the high seas, and to save this flag of ours? Very little consideration is given to them in some respects. How many millions were paid to keep that flag afloat during this war? Nobody has taken interest enough in the question on this floor to speak of it. But brave, bold, patriotic men, who scorned to take down the American flag and transfer their shipping as they might have done, and as many cowardly men did to their own interest, to other flags, took the perils of the war, paid out millions upon millions, amounting to six or seven millions more or less—I do not think I overstate it when I say six millions at least—in order to keep that flag afloat—is there any place for those men in this bill? Not a dollar; nor has a word been spoken in their behalf. But how tenderly we care for the men who exacted or who took it! How tenderly we care for the men who sat in their counting-rooms and planning exactly the chances of money-making on the perils of that war figured up their 25 per cent. dividends annually—upon what? Upon the extraordinary exigency of public affairs! That is all very well; I am not complaining of it. They made well of it. But the question is now, sir, whether you will pay this money to men who made 25 per cent. upon that practice to the exclusion of other classes of men who lost as much as they made? That is the question.

Here is a pamphlet which I happened to find a few moments ago in my desk, in which this thing is stated in this way:

Insurance companies paid out $5,750,000.
Increased premiums to insurance companies, $10,000,000 in round numbers.

Was it ever supposed that we were pursuing Great Britain in the interest particularly and conspicuously of insurance companies? Was it ever believed that we were pursuing these claims for losses to American citizens under such circumstances that whenever we should procure an indemnity from Great Britain any man would be allowed to come in here and upon a legal technicality give it to those who had made eight or ten millions, more or less, out of this great exigency of the war, and deny equities to persons who had suffered under the circumstances to which I have adverted, under the patriotic purpose of carrying your flag, to their exclusion? I believe not, sir; and I believe when the American people come to understand that the Congress of the United States have undertaken to dispose of a fund of money that was given to the American nation in gross, a gross sum to be distributed by the American Government, as in equity they were bound to do it, to cover losses, and that it has been given to companies who made untold millions out of the exigencies of the country, it will be met with great disappointment, if not chagrin.

Therefore, Mr. President, I have moved this amendment, thinking it not impertinent to this bill and that it supplements this precise point which I call attention to. I should like to see whether the Senate of the United States will vote to give $7,000,000 to these companies who have already made that amount, and give the insured nothing for the losses which they paid in premiums to these companies to the amount of five or six millions more.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will remind the Senator that his five minutes have expired.

Mr. THURMAN. I may be permitted to say that I believe when the American people come to know that the Senate of the United States have regarded the law, obeyed the law, and refused to set in the face of the nation an example of utter trampling upon the law, the American people will be well satisfied. I am not afraid in this nation, which once boasted of being the most law-abiding nation in the world, that this Congress will be denounced because it has followed the behests of the law.

But what has all that to do with this amendment? What is it that the Senator from Maine proposes to do? That we shall provide for the payment of what are called the war premiums, the enhanced premiums of insurance. The Senator knows very well that by the express decision of the Geneva tribunal those claims were rejected, and being rejected our Government solemnly declared to that tribunal that it would press them no longer; and it did not press them, and not one dollar of this money was ever awarded in respect to any such enhanced price of insurance. And yet the Senator says that we should pay $6,000,000—that is the amount of it—for enhanced premiums of insurance after that claim has been rejected by the tribunal and absolutely withdrawn by our Government. And that he thinks we ought to do on the ground that these people carried the flag of the country in the face of the enemy; the merchant sitting at home, insuring his case, taking care that he did not sustain loss by taking insurance and charging the insurance in the price of his goods when he sold them to the customer, the customer and not the merchant being the real loser! The Senator thinks it is monstrous that we do not pay these claims. Mr. President, this thing will not do. Here I hold the solemn decision of that tribunal that these claims should not be considered, without which decision the award never would have been made, that arbitration would have been broken up in limine. I hold in this book under my thumb the withdrawal of our Government of any such claim; and yet the Senator says, and says it with vehemence too, that we are not doing justice if we do not pay these claims in respect to which not one dollar of this money was awarded.

Besides he aggravates the matter about these insurance companies. I do not know who made up that table about the profits of insurance companies, but I say here that that table is utterly wrong. There were no such profits; but whether there were or not, pray, if you are to go into the question of profits, as the Senator seems to think we ought to do, why should we not go into the question of the profits of the merchant and the profits of everybody else, for the Senator speaks of these corporations as rich corporations? I think my friend has been a judge. If so, he took an oath that he would administer justice to the rich and the poor alike, without respect to person. But according to this new doctrine of his, this body, which sits here in a quasi judicial capacity, is not to inquire what is the justice of the case, but what is the length of the party's purse. It will be bad for this country, Mr. President, when questions of right and of justice shall come to be decided by the consideration whether the plaintiff is a richer or a poorer man than the defendant in the cause.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, it seems to me that it is evading the question to come here and ask for a law whereby these insurance companies are to get this money by an act of Congress, for nobody pretends that they can get it without a law; and then to claim that we are governed by an existing law, when in order to let them have it at all it is necessary to have a law passed for them!

Mr. SHERMAN. It is necessary to exclude them in order to prevent them from having a remedy.

Mr. CONKLING. You take the law away from them by the original bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. While you give it to the rest of the world.

Mr. STEWART. But in the bill as it stands, you state what insurance companies shall not be paid, thereby implying that there are some to be paid.

Mr. THURMAN. Not at all. It only gives them a day in court.

Mr. STEWART. If it is not intended to give them anything, just say that they shall not have anything; take the report of the committee if that is the intention of the law. If they are not to recover by virtue of this law that we are about to pass, if it is not intended that they shall recover by it, we can fix that readily. So that is a mere question of words. The effect of your bill is to give it to them. If it is not so, say so. If that is not the intention, make the intention clear. I say they ought not to have it because they have sustained no loss; and it is not fair to give the money to them when there are others in the country who have lost by virtue of these same cruisers, and if they cannot be found now keep it in the Treasury until they can be found, or if they cannot be found let it go into the general fund. If there are so many sufferers that you cannot distribute it, let all the people have it by keeping it in the Treasury. But it is by virtue of a law that you propose to pass that these insurance companies can recover. They have no law now to recover; and if it is not equitable for them to have the money, if they are not entitled to it in equity, it is wrong to pass a law to give it to them. You are bound by no law to give it to them. There is no common law, no written law, that requires Congress to pass an inequitable statute to give them something that they are not now entitled to by law.

I say the whole question of doing equity is before Congress; and I say they cannot shirk that responsibility by saying they can follow certain analogies of courts, they can follow certain analogies of the common law, and give this money to persons who have already realized large gains. The duty of Congress is to make a law and make a proper law that will do justice. We are bound to do justice and to see that the persons who sustained loss receive the money, and not persons who have not sustained loss. It will be hard to make the common people believe that there is any technical rule of law which requires us to give this money to persons who have not lost, but have made large gains. If there is any such common law it is the duty of Congress to reverse it in this act, and say that hereafter it shall be distributed to those who sustained losses, and who are entitled to it, and not to those who made gains and are not entitled to it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I now appeal to the Chair and to Senators to stand by any arrangement, if we have any, to come to a vote on these various questions without further debate. I do not know but that the arrangement has been lost sight of entirely.

Mr. ANTHONY. There was a distinct arrangement, one that was made at three o'clock to-day, and that was that debate might go on by unanimous consent, speaking being limited to five minutes, and the debate to stop at the objection of any Senator. That was the arrangement, and it is under that arrangement that the debate has been going on.

Mr. STOCKTON. There was an arrangement. That arrangement was, as the Senator from Vermont desired this bill to go through, that all debate was to cease at two o'clock to-day, except that he was then to have the floor and at three o'clock we should commence to vote. Some question afterward arose as to whether five minutes should be allowed on amendments. There appeared to be some little difference of opinion and no gentlemen seemed to be willing to make any particular point. But in violation of that even this debate has been continued, not on amendments, but the question which we were driven from the debate of at two o'clock has been revived in the Senate and argued, not for five minutes to twenty minutes at a time, not by consent, but because those gentlemen who were bound by the obligation and the rule did not feel that they had a right to say a word or to interfere at all.

I have to say, Mr. President, that a proposition was put through here, with my tongue silent a few minutes ago, that was as offensive to me as anything could have been which was offered in the Senate after the gentleman who offered it had made a speech of I do not know how long, but as long as he pleased, and running over the subject of the debate this morning, and who a second time has taken the floor and made another speech on it—I mean the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. STEWART.] Now I say that there must be some fair understanding about this matter. Here was a vote put through the Senate sub silentio that the Government of the United States, because we had claimed this morning that it was a trustee, may take the property of the cestui que trust to pay its expenses, after it had already reserved 5 per cent. to remain in the Treasury of the Government of the United States permanently and forever, to the disgrace of the very principle of trusteeship. And if the gentleman had reviewed his legal knowledge he would have known that the very first principle of trusteeship is that no trustee can benefit by the trust put in his hands. That is the foundation of the doctrine of trusteeship.

Mr. STEWART. Does the Senator deny that a trustee can charge his actual expenses?

Mr. STOCKTON. I do deny it on the basis of the common law. I do not mean to say that statutes, I do not mean to say that common law which may have grown up on statutes since, I do not mean to say with the consent of courts, the consent of parties, and the modern practice does not allow the men who have such fiduciary trust put in their hands to make some profit; but I do deny that that principle of trusteeship which is at the bottom of the whole of this thing allows a trustee to make one single cent by his trust.

Mr. STEWART. Does the Senator pretend to say that if a trustee by the common law should bring a suit for the protection of the fund he would have to pay out of his own pocket the expenses of that suit?

Mr. STOCKTON. I mean to say that no trustee can benefit one dollar by the trust reposed in his hands.

Mr. STEWART. Exactly, and my amendment does not go to any such thing. The proposition of the committee is 5 per cent., mine is the actual disbursements. I undertake to say it is precisely the common and the statute law in every State.

Mr. STOCKTON. I undertake to deny positively that any benefit whatever by the old common law on which trusteeships were founded could accrue in any event to the trustee. It was the most solemn and sacred thing on the earth that he should not benefit by it.

Mr. STEWART. I deny that the Government benefits by it.

Mr. STOCKTON. The Senator from Nevada has been on the floor several times and much more than five minutes, while I have not said one word. I simply now protest against the course this debate has taken. Gentlemen who bring in propositions at the last moment come here and support them and seem to care nothing about how much time they occupy, and these propositions are being put through while we are sitting here in silence indignant that such propositions should be introduced at this period of the debate.

But I say that there is no analogy to be drawn from the law of trustees and cestui qui trusts. I mean to say that away above that proposition, high above it, higher than the heavens are over the earth, is the duty we owe this day in acting on this matter toward our posterity, toward the world, toward all time, that we shall not do such a thing, after getting this money from England under the claim that it was for injuries done and losses incurred by the citizens of this country, as to try to keep in the Treasury of the United States a poor little 5 per cent. of it. I should think it would make any American blush with shame to have that record read in any other country. In any other parliamentary body than this, were such a proposition to be brought in at such a period in the debate and a vote taken on it by standing and sitting, and an announcement made that "one more gentleman has stood up," and then the debate to go on upon one side and we to sit here and hold our tongues! Mr. President, I want no more agreements in this body if that is the result of them. I will make no more agreements if that is to be the result. The agreement means that those gentlemen shall talk who please and talk as much as they choose, and that those who try to observe the rule shall see things put through which are abhorrent to every sense of righteousness and justice that they have!

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan.) The Chair will state, in answer to the Senator from New Jersey——

Mr. STEWART. I wish to make a word of explanation. I have been out of the Chamber——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will remind the Senator from Nevada that he has spoken upon this amendment five minutes. The Chair will now observe to the Senator from New Jersey——

Mr. STEWART. I want to correct some mistakes the Senator from New Jersey has fallen into. I hope I shall have unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will observe to the Senator from New Jersey that his attention was called to the understanding made subsequent to the time to which the Senator alluded, perhaps when the Senator was not in his seat. The Chair understood from the former occupant of the Chair that the understanding was that debate should proceed by common consent, and that as long as it did thus proceed each Senator should be entitled to five minutes. The Chair has endeavored to enforce that, and the Chair has not heard any objection to the debate during that time, and has endeavored to enforce the rule. The Chair now observes to the Senator from Nevada that he has occupied his full time on this amendment.

Mr. STEWART. I ask leave to suggest to the Senator from New Jersey——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the Senator from Nevada proceeding?

Mr. STEWART. I will not make a speech, only to correct——

Mr. STOCKTON. There is no objection on my part.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. PRATT. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana objects to the Senator from Nevada proceeding.

Mr. SARGENT. I object to all debate.

Mr. STEWART. So do I.

Mr. McCREERY. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. MORRILL.]

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. OGLESBY, (when his name was called.) I rise to ask whether during the roll-call I can inquire what is the amendment. I came in at the moment it was being submitted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The roll-call cannot be suspended. The Senator will have an opportunity of voting after the roll-call is through.

The roll-call being concluded, the result was announced—yeas 20, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckingham, Chandler, Clayton, Hager, Hamilton of Texas, Hitchcock, Logan, McCreery, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Sargent, Sprague, Stewart, Wadleigh, West, and Windom—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Bayard, Bogy, Boutwell, Carpenter, Conkling, Conover, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Edmunds, Fenton, Ferry of Michigan, Howe, Ingalls, Kelly, Merrimon, Morrill of Vermont, Oglesby, Robertson, Schurz, Scott, Sherman, Stockton, Thurman, Tipton, Washburn, and Wright—28.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Boreman, Brownlow, Cameron, Cragin, Dorsey, Ferry of Connecticut, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamlin, Harvey, Johnston, Jones, Lewis, Morton, Norwood, Patterson, Ransom, Saulsbury, Spencer, and Stevenson—25.

So the amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate concur in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to reserve the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] striking out the limitation against insurance companies, and also the amendment proposed by the other Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] respecting the gold computation, and the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] about the expenses of the original tribunal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. With these exceptions the question will be on concurring in the other amendments.

Mr. BAYARD. An amendment was offered by the Senator from Nevada and adopted in committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is reserved.

Mr. BAYARD. Very well.

The amendments were concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the first reserved amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. The first reserved amendment is in section 11 after the words "shall be" in line 13, to insert "stated and adjudged upon the basis of United States gold coin at the time of the loss."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in this amendment.

The amendment was concurred in—ayes 29, noes not counted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next reserved amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The next reserved amendment is in section 12, to strike out the following clause, beginning in line 13:

And no claim shall be admissible or allowed by said court by or in behalf of any insurance company or insurer, either in its or his own right, or as assignee, or otherwise, in the right of a person or party insured as aforesaid, unless such claimant shall show to the satisfaction of said court that during the late rebellion the sum of its or his losses, in respect to its or his war risks, exceeded the sum of its or his premiums or other gains upon or in respect to such war risks; and in case of any such allowance, the same shall not be greater than any such excess of loss.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On that amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Do I understand this to be the amendment in reference to insurance companies?

Mr. EDMUNDS. This is the insurance amendment.

Mr. LOGAN. Is the vote on concurring in the amendment made in Committee of the Whole?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On concurring in the amendment.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. THURMAN. I am requested by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CARPENTER] to state that he is paired on this question with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY.] The Senator from Wisconsin if here would vote "nay," and the Senator from Delaware would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Boutwell, Buckingham, Conkling, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Fenton, Gordon, Howe, Ingalls, Merrimon, Morrill of Vermont, Ransom, Robertson, Schurz, Sherman, Stockton, Tipton, and Washburn—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clayton, Conover, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Hager, Hamilton of Texas, Harvey, Hitchcock, Kelly, Logan, McCreery, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Oglesby, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Sargent, Scott, Sprague, Stewart, Thurman, Wadleigh, West, Windom, and Wright—29.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Boreman, Brownlow, Cameron, Carpenter, Cragin, Dorsey, Ferry of Connecticut, Flanagan, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamlin, Johnston, Jones, Lewis, Morton, Norwood, Patterson, Saulsbury, Spencer, and Stevenson—23.

So the amendment was not concurred in.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to reconsider the vote which has just been taken, on which I shall of course vote "no;" but as the Senate has agreed to finish this bill to-day I propose to have this amendment finished now if it is possible.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves to reconsider the vote just taken.

Mr. THURMAN. How did the Senator vote?

Mr. CONKLING. He can make the motion; he voted with the majority.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish to say that I voted "nay" in order to move a reconsideration.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us have no debate now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Will the Senate reconsider the vote by which they refused to concur in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. THURMAN, (at six o'clock and eight minutes p. m.) I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is not according to the understanding.

Mr. CONKLING. No part of this procedure is according to the understanding.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. THURMAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 9, nays 40; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Gordon, Ransom, Thurman, and Tipton—9.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Boutwell, Buckingham, Chandler, Clayton, Conkling, Conover, Edmunds, Fenton, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Hager, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Kelly, Logan, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Oglesby, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Sargent, Scott, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Wadleigh, Washburn, West, Windom, and Wright—40.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Boreman, Brownlow, Cameron, Carpenter, Cragin, Dorsey, Ferry of Connecticut, Flanagan, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Hamilton of Maryland, Johnston, Jones, Lewis, McCreery, Morton, Norwood, Patterson, Saulsbury, Schurz, Spencer, Stevenson, and Stockton—24.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Vermont to reconsider the vote by which the amendment made in Committee of the Whole was disagreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Which I hope will not be adopted.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not know whether any Senator——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont will state his point of order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The point of order is that by the order of the Senate debate is not now in order.

Mr. THURMAN. There was no such order made.

Mr. CONKLING. And if it had been, it would not cover this.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that he has no power to sustain the point of order. The Chair understands the fact to be as the Senator from Vermont states, but it is an understanding among Senators, binding on their honor only, not to be enforced by the Chair.

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, sir; and it has been very much observed!

Mr. EDMUNDS. By the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. THURMAN. I am not going into a question about its observation by me. I am responsible not to the Senator from Vermont at all.

Here is the point in this bill about which the great contest has been made from the first to the last. This amendment was adopted in Committee of the Whole when there was a full Senate. Owing to the absence of certain Senators who voted for it in committee the amendment has not been agreed to in the Senate; and now the question is whether or not we are bound to sit here and with a recorded majority in favor of this amendment when the Senate was full, see the will and opinion and wish of that majority defeated by a Senate from which they are absent.

It may be said that it is no business of theirs to be absent. That may be so. I do not know what has caused their absence; but I do say it is entirely too sharp practice in the Senate of the United States to decide a question of this kind, of this magnitude, simply by taking advantage of the absence of Senators, who may have been called away for reasons that would be perfectly satisfactory not only to themselves but to the Senate. The Senate can do as it sees fit about this business; but it does not seem to me that it is consistent with the course the Senate has heretofore pursued to take advantage of the temporary absence of Senators to vote down that which was carried when the Senate was full.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, sympathizing with the Senator from Ohio, I violate no understanding that I have by adding a word to what he has said. It was agreed yesterday that at three o'clock to-day voting should proceed without debate. First, by a modification of the understanding which was made tacitly at least, some debate was allowed, restricted however to five minutes. We went on, Senator after Senator, nobody calling attention to it, violating the understanding utterly, speaking repeatedly, and speaking very much more than the five allotted minutes. In consequence of that, we have reached the hour of a quarter after six o'clock, Now I ask does any Senator think that within the spirit of the understanding made yesterday, a quarter after six o'clock was to be reached before a vote was to be taken upon the final feature of the bill?

Again, the Senator from Vermont rises, as he has the right to do, being one of the majority, and makes a motion in hostility to the bill of the committee, which is, to reconsider a vote affirming that report. Why does he do it? Was there any understanding yesterday that to-morrow and next day, both of which days are given to the Senator from Ohio and every other Senator in the majority to move a reconsideration of the final vote and to move a reconsideration of this very vote—was it a part of the understanding, I say, that he should be deprived of that privilege to-morrow and next day? No, sir; but what is the effect of the motion made by the Senator from Vermont? When to-morrow comes a motion is made to reconsider the vote by which the bill passed. Does that do any good? No, sir, because when that shall be reconsidered, if it shall be, we are met on this vote by the fact that a motion to reconsider has once been made and voted down by the Senate and that exhausts the privilege held out by the parliamentary law.

Now, can it be said that it was intended yesterday, first, that instead of observing the agreement, a quarter after six o'clock should come and the agreement be still unexecuted owing to its violation, and that then the mover of the bill, the Senator having charge of it, or anybody else, should interpose a motion, the negation of which would close the door forever after against a motion to reconsider? I think not.

If there is enough left of the understanding, which I do not deny, still to be executed, I venture to suggest to my honorable friend from Vermont that he should withdraw his motion to reconsider; let us proceed to execute the understanding or the remnant of it, and then leave the Senator from Ohio, if he can, as he may upon every other bill upon which final action has been taken, to make his motion hereafter within the parliamentary period to reconsider; and if he can find a majority with him, to go back and reconsider this vote also. I put it to the Senator from Vermont whether that would not be the clear right of every Senator to-morrow and next day had the agreement been executed, without being violated at all? If so then it seems to me that his motion impairs the agreement. It seems to me that his motion brings in a new element which will justify every Senator in saying, "This goes too far; this is an attempt to extend the agreement to that to which nobody supposed it was to extend."

Mr. President, I would like to stand by the agreements which we make in the Senate. This is not the first time we have had bad fortune in doing it. I was compelled to sit here to-day and listen to a very eloquent speech from a Senator before me, [Mr. MORRILL, of Maine,] who told us about the vicissitudes of those who had carried the American flag, and carried it, as I understood him, very near the jaws and claws, not to speak of the tail, of the lion of England. He made a very pathetic and moving appeal, which nobody had a right to answer, although that appeal continued for a good many minutes and moved the Senate deeply.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. But the Senator from Ohio certainly did answer.

Mr. CONKLING. Well, the Senator from Ohio did put in a very pithy and eloquent five minutes; but if the Senator from Maine could only have seen himself as others saw him, could only have heard himself as others heard him, he would understand how totally inadequate were those five minutes or any conceivable five minutes to respond to an argument the rigid cast-iron logic of which, saying nothing about its declamation, swept the whole Senate off its chairs.

However, as I say, I would like to observe agreements; I would like to observe the tattered remnant of this agreement; but I do submit to Senators that in the Senate it is pretty industrious practice—I use that word because my friend from Vermont used it to-day—for the Senator having charge of a bill to make a motion in hostility to it, the only parliamentary effect of which must be to deprive other Senators of that privilege which they have usually after final action on a bill and which they would have in this case had the agreement been literally and religiously observed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not know that the Senator wishes to be reminded of the fact that his five minutes have expired.

Mr. CONKLING. I am always glad to be reminded by the Chair of many things, and I take my seat expressing my gratitude to him.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Inasmuch as I conceive that in point of honor my lips are sealed on this question in exercising a right that the rule gives me to make a motion, I will reserve until I can defend myself honorably any reply to what the honorable Senator from New York and the honorable Senator from Ohio have said. When I have an opportunity I will defend myself, to my own satisfaction at least.

Mr. TIPTON. I voted for an adjournment a short time ago, supposing that the understanding was that at three o'clock to-day we would commence with five-minute speeches on amendments and so continue until we closed the debate; but I did not understand that we were compelled to close the debate to-day, nor have I heard in anything that has been said to-day on the question that we obligated ourselves to finish it before we should take an adjournment. I understood that debating was debarred after three o'clock, and five-minute speeches were to be the rule until we did close the debate; and hence I voted to adjourn, thinking that we could adjourn and continue the debate to-morrow under the five-minute rule.

Mr. THURMAN. We never agreed to sit it out to-day.

Mr. TIPTON. I heard nothing of sitting it out to-day.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is very extraordinary. However, I do not wish to spend one moment of the Senate's time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont to reconsider the vote by which the amendment made in Committee of the Whole was disagreed to.

Mr. THURMAN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

Mr. CONKLING. As I see one or two Senators present who were absent when the vote was taken before, I ask for the yeas and nays on this motion, as I believe it will be the only opportunity we shall have to record ourselves upon it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WASHBURN.] If he were present he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 22, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Bayard, Bogy, Boutwell, Buckingham, Conkling, Cooper,

Davis, Dennis, Fenton, Gordon, Howe, Ingalls, Jones, Merrimon, Morrill of Vermont, Ransom, Schurz, Sherman, Stockton, Thurman, and Tipton—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clayton, Conover, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Hager, Hamilton of Texas, Harvey, Hitchcock, Kelly, Logan, McCreery, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Oglesby, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Sargent, Scott, Sprague, Stewart, Wadleigh, West, Windom, and Wright—27.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Boreman, Brownlow, Cameron, Carpenter, Cragin, Dorsey, Ferry of Connecticut, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamlin, Johnston, Lewis, Morton, Norwood, Patterson, Robertson, Saulsbury, Spencer, Stevenson, and Washburn—24.

So the Senate refused to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was non-concurred in.

Mr. THURMAN. I move to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. THURMAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WASHBURN.] He would doubtless vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

Mr. McCREERY. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. JONES.]

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 13, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Conkling, Davis, Dennis, Fenton, Gordon, Merrimon, Ransom, Schurz, Stockton, Thurman, and Tipton—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Boutwell, Buckingham, Chandler, Clayton, Conover, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Hager, Hamilton of Texas, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Kelly, Logan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Oglesby, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Sargent, Scott, Sprague, Stewart, Wadleigh, West, Windom, and Wright—30.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Boreman, Brownlow, Cameron, Carpenter, Cooper, Cragin, Dorsey, Ferry of Connecticut, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamlin, Harvey, Howe, Johnston, Jones, Lewis, McCreery, Morton, Norwood, Patterson, Robertson, Saulsbury, Sherman, Spencer, Stevenson, and Washburn—30.

So the Senate refused to lay the bill on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next reserved amendment will be reported by the Secretary.

Mr. STEWART. I ask leave to withdraw that amendment now, as the insurance companies do not get the money.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to withdrawing the amendment?

Mr. CONKLING. Do not let that be withdrawn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We can vote on it instantly.

Mr. STEWART. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore The amendment will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, which was to insert as an additional section the following:

That all expenses incurred by the United States in the negotiations or otherwise by which the money was obtained from Great Britain, and in the care and distribution of the same, shall be reimbursed before any private claims are paid.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That completes the reserved amendments.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I now renew my motion to amend made in Committee of the Whole, to insert after the word "claims" in section 11, line 2, the words "including war premiums," and also to insert the same words after the word "claims" in line 5 of the same section.

Mr. HAMLIN. I wish to state in a very few minutes the reasons which induce me to vote for the amendment of my colleague.

There have been two theories advanced here in this debate, and upon the one or the other we shall have to rely for our action. One theory has been that this award is national in its character; that while the losses have been of an individual character, the treatment of the subject has been national; and therefore here is a fund to be nationally divided and to be divided upon equitable principles. The other theory has been that a claim was prosecuted by the Government for certain purposes, for certain citizens and certain corporations, and that the Government is the simple trustee to distribute this fund according to the principles laid down by the Geneva tribunal. Those are the two theories. Now, I take this bill as it stands as embodying the final action of the Senate before we give a final vote upon its passage. I have not voted upon those propositions, and I did not vote upon them for a purpose. If my vote could have determined the question at any time, it would have been given; but I chose to wait until this hour, until I should see what was the final form the bill would assume before we should vote upon its passage. I now know it.

Now, sir, the bill has excluded one class of cases which were included by the tribunal at Geneva and upon which largely these awards were made up; and why has it excluded them? Because equitably they lost no money. If it is equitable to exclude one class of claimants because they lost no money, and we are to make the distribution of this fund upon equitable principles, then I hold it is equally just and equally right to include another class of cases if they are equitable, no matter whether they were considered or rejected by the tribunal at Geneva. That is my doctrine, and that covers this class of cases.

I go one step further, and I concur in what the Senator from New York who sits by me [Mr. CONKLING] said, that if you do distribute this money upon equitable and not legal rules, then the vessel that was destroyed the day before the Shenandoah went into Melbourne, and the vessel that was destroyed the day after she came out, are each equitably entitled to be paid for; the owners are each entitled to remuneration. Taking, then, the bill of the Senate as I find it, and finding it one making a distribution upon the equitable and not the legal principle, I shall vote for the amendment of my colleague.

Sir, those increased sums were paid in consequence of the war. They were paid because these British cruisers went out and committed depredations upon our vessels. They were as much the cause of it as they were in the case of the vessel that was destroyed by the Shenandoah the day after she left Melbourne. That is my idea.

Again you have excluded the insurance companies from the provisions of this bill; and at Geneva those companies were included; and why? Because the very men who paid the extra war premium remunerated the insurance companies. If you will not pay the money to the insurance companies, then I hold that equitably you should pay it to the men who did remunerate the insurance companies and in consequence of which the argument is that they are to be excluded.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. STOCKTON. Mr. President, the amendment that I gave notice of yesterday and had read at the desk to-day became unnecessary when the amendment of the Senator from Ohio prevailed. That amendment having been stricken out in the Senate, I now renew the amendment which I offered this morning. I ask the Clerk to read it, and I ask for the yeas and nays upon it.

Mr. WEST. Is that in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be in order after the pending amendment is disposed of.

Mr. THURMAN. I have an amendment to offer to the pending amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the pending question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine. The Senator from Ohio has the floor.

Mr. THURMAN. I move to add after the word "premium" in the amendment of the Senator from Maine these words:

And all claims for losses of vessels destroyed by the Shenandoah before her departure from Melbourne.

Mr. HAMLIN. I hope my colleague will accept that.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I have no objection; I will accept it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maine as modified.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I simply wish to say a word on this subject. There is a class of claims in this bill that all agree ought to be paid. Now, do not let us burden the bill. Hereafter there will be a balance, and then provision can be made for the war premiums and the other claims.

Mr. THURMAN. Do I understand that the Senator from Maine has accepted my amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He has.

Mr. THURMAN. Then I have a further amendment to offer. I move to add:

And for all losses by any confederate cruiser.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment, as modified, is to make section 11 read:

That it shall be the duty of said court to receive and examine all claims, including war premiums, and all claims for losses of vessels destroyed by the Shenandoah before her departure from Melbourne, &c.

It is proposed to amend the amendment by adding:

And for all losses by any confederate cruiser.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I should be very sorry to see that amendment adopted or any part of it. It may not seem so to all; but certainly this is a very grave business, touching, as I consider, very deeply the reputation of this country. The objection was made by the honorable Senator from Ohio to the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine that it directly included a class of losses, to wit, the losses from increased insurance, which the arbitration had distinctly declined to entertain. For that reason his statement was entirely just, and it was almost exactly in the language of the arbitrators themselves. The same remark applies with the same force to the proposition just made in regard to extending it by this last clause.

I am very sorry, from the indication of the vote of the Senate, for the shape this bill is now taking; but certainly I shall not contribute to make it worse by voting for amendments, or offering them, directly in the teeth of the doctrines and the proper rule for the framing of this bill which have been referred to in the course of the debate. The bill after all will take the shape the will of the Senate desires, and I do not think that two wrongs ever can be made to constitute a right, or that one wrong can be lessened by adding others to it. For that reason I trust that no amendment not precisely in accordance with the frame-work of the treaty, of the action of the arbitrators under it, and of our duty to execute the trust in regard to these moneys created by the treaty and the award of the arbitrators, will be offered or maintained by a vote.

Mr. THURMAN. I feel the full force of what my friend from Delaware has said. I do not believe that the amendment of the Senator from Maine, whether amended as I propose or not, should be adopted; but I cannot shut my eyes to what has been revealed to-day. Here are certain Senators, some of whom think one class of claims ought to be allowed and others think another class of claims ought to be allowed. Some think the war premiums ought to be allowed; others think that the claims for vessels destroyed by the Shenandoah before she entered Melbourne should be allowed; and others think that the claim for vessels destroyed by any and every confederate cruiser ought to be allowed. All these various Senators entertaining these different opinions have seemed to think it was necessary for them to combine against allowing payment to the insurance companies upon whose rights and property the money was awarded. Every one has seemed to think it was necessary to exclude them from consideration on the ground that they made money in the war, and give this money to one of the other classes whose claims were not admitted at all by the tribunal, and in respect of whom not one dollar was awarded. I want to see how far the Senate will go in this business. The Senator from Maine wants war premiums allowed, and he thought it was necessary not to advocate war premiums on their own merits, but to displace some other claims in order that he might get his war premiums paid. Another Senator thinks that the claims for vessels destroyed by the Shenandoah before she left Melbourne ought to be allowed, and he, too, in order to get a fund to pay them, must displace the claims upon which the award was made; and so to the end of the chapter.

Well, sir, I want to see how far these gentlemen will go. I want to see how far they will stand up for their claimants. The amendment is not my opinion of what is the law or the right of the case, but I want to give them a chance to record themselves upon this question.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I desire to say one word about the amendment as it stands, as amended by the proposition of the Senator from Ohio, and I wish particularly to congratulate the Senator from Ohio upon his perception of the fact that there could be really in principle no difference between damages, from that point of view, to say the least of it, committed by the Shenandoah before she went in and after she came out of Melbourne. The matter of going in and coming out, so far as the debate was concerned, did not seem to constitute a very great difference. I never could see that it did. Therefore with great alacrity I accepted the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, and I think in principle it strengthens the equity of the whole proposition of the bill. I shall therefore vote for the amendment with great cheerfulness.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio to the amendment of the Senator from Maine.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected—ayes 2, noes not counted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Maine as modified.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 9, nays 34; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckingham, Gilbert, Hager, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Morrill of Maine, Sprague, West, and Windom—9.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Chandler, Conover, Cooper, Cragin, Davis, Dennis, Edmunds, Fenton, Frelinghuysen, Gordon, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Kelly, Logan, Merrimon, Mitchell, Oglesby, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Sargent, Schurz, Scott, Stewart, Stockton, Thurman, Tipton, Wadleigh, and Wright—34.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Anthony, Boreman, Boutwell, Brownlow, Cameron, Carpenter, Clayton, Conkling, Dorsey, Ferry of Connecticut, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Goldthwaite, Hamilton of Maryland, Johnston, Jones, Lewis, McCreery, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norwood, Patterson, Ransom, Saulsbury, Sherman, Spencer, Stevenson, and Washburn—30.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOWE. I am disposed to offer an amendment to section 12, which I will send to the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. STOCKTON] offered an amendment which was not then in order, and the Chair will recognize him if he desires to offer it now.

Mr. STOCKTON. If the Senator from Wisconsin will excuse me, I will take but a moment.

Mr. HOWE. Certainly.

Mr. STOCKTON. I simply desire to say that when I offered that amendment I explained the motive for it. It was offered with no other desire but to illustrate the argument on the other side. It was said that those who had made money by the war in any business, those who had made money by premiums in other ventures, particularly the insurance companies, ought not to receive any portion of this fund. In answer to that I offered the amendment for the purpose of making a few remarks upon it. I now ask that the amendment be read. I will not detain the Senate at this time of night by calling for the yeas and nays upon it, but I should like to have the question taken on it.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, which was in section 12, after line 12, to insert the following words:

And no claim shall be allowed in behalf of any claimant unless said claimant shall show to the satisfaction of the said court that during the late rebellion the sum of his losses in business exceeded the sum of his gains during the same period.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOWE. I move to amend the bill in section 12, line 22, by inserting after the word "loss" the following:

Provided, however, That mutual insurance companies shall be allowed to claim for all losses paid by them by reason of damages caused as provided in the preceding section of this act: And provided further, That the amount allowed to any mutual insurance company for losses so sustained shall be apportioned by the company among the members thereof at the time of the losses paid by them respectively in proportion to the interest then owned by each member thereof.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the same as paying the war premiums exactly.

Mr. HOWE. My understanding of the twelfth section as it stands is that it would require this court to settle with mutual insurance companies. The only stock I believe they have is the premiums they pay. The only dividend they ever get is the return of that portion of their premiums which are not lost, not spent; but to make it certain whether the Senate means to pay them or not I have offered this amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. THURMAN. Let us have the yeas and nays on that amendment.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, but five Senators rising to second the call.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. THURMAN and Mr. BAYARD called for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill, and they were ordered.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WASHBURN] on all amendments to the bill, and yet I shall hold my pair good throughout the consideration of the bill. I suppose the Senator from Massachusetts, if he were here, would vote "nay," I should vote "yea."

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.] If he were present he would vote "nay, and I should vote "yea."

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] is paired with the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CARPENTER.] The Senator from Delaware, if he were here, would vote "nay," and the Senator from Wisconsin would vote "yea."

Mr. TIPTON. I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.]

Mr. DAVIS. I am requested by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STEVENSON] to state that he was called home on business that could not be put off.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 26, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Conover, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Hager, Harvey, Hitchcock, Kelly, Logan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Oglesby, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Sargent, Scott, Sprague, Stewart, Wadleigh, West, Windom, and Wright—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Buckingham, Conkling, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Fenton, Gordon, Hamlin, Howe, Ingalls, Merrimon, Ransom, Schurz, Stockton, and Thurman—17.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Boreman, Boutwell, Brownlow, Cameron, Carpenter, Clayton, Cragin, Dorsey, Ferry of Connecticut, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Goldthwaite, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Johnston, Jones, Lewis, McCreery, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norwood, Patterson, Saulsbury, Sherman, Spencer, Stevenson, Tipton, and Washburn—30.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. THURMAN. I ask leave to report a bill from the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I object; and I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I felt a little hurt at the course pursued by my friend from Ohio; but I will withdraw the objection.

Mr. THURMAN. I will offer the report in the morning.

Mr. EDMUNDS. All right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Vermont to adjourn is still pending.

The motion was agreed to; and (at seven o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, May 12, 1874.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

W. L. PARVIN AND H. A. GREENE.

On motion of Mr. EAMES, by unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 589) for the relief of Washington L. Parvin and Henry A. Greene, late captains California Volunteers, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

BILLS REFERRED.

Mr. BECK. I ask the House to consent to allow the various bills on the Speaker's table to which no objection may be made to be referred to the appropriate committees.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection that will be done.

There was no objection; and the following bills to which no objection was made were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the appropriate committees, as follows:

The bill (S. No. 552) to refund to E. and J. Koch certain customs duties—Committee on Ways and Means;

The bill (H. R. No. 2095) granting a pension to Charles McCarty, with Senate amendment—Committee on Invalid Pensions;

The bill (H. R. No. 1227) granting a pension to Eliza A. Maxham, with Senate amendment—Committee on Invalid Pensions;

The bill (H. R No. 1948) granting a pension to Mary J. Blood, with Senate amendment—Committee on Invalid Pensions;

The bill (H. R. No 2356) to grant a pension to Edward Jardine, late colonel and brevet brigadier-general United States Volunteers, with Senate amendment—Committee on Invalid Pensions;

The bill (S. No. 420) to amend the act entitled "An act for the restoration to homestead entry and to market of certain lands in Michigan," approved June 10, 1872, and for other purposes—Committee on the Public Lands;

The bill (S. No. 588) approving the action taken by the Secretary of War under the act approved July 15, 1870—Committee on Military Affairs;

The bill (S. No. 320) fixing the number of paymasters in the Army of the United States—Committee on Military Affairs;

The bill (S. No. 457) to declare the true intent and meaning of a certain portion of the treaty with the Sioux Indians concluded April 29, 1868—Committee on Indian Affairs;

The bill (S. No. 503) for the relief of Susan R. Moore, the relative and legatee of Phœbe Sofield, a pensioner—Committee on Invalid Pensions;

The bill (S. No. 595) for the relief of Benjamin Cooley and James W. Boswell—to the Committee on Claims;

The bill (S. No. 596) for the relief of H. W. Read—to the Committee on Claims;

The bill (S. No. 597) for the relief of William A. Griffin—to the Committee on Claims;

The bill (S. No. 609) granting a pension to Margaret A. Hoffner—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions;

The bill (S. No. 613) granting a pension to Jefferson A. French—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions;

The bill (S. No. 614) to provide for the removal of the wreck of the ship Patrician near the entrance to the harbor of San Francisco, California—to the Committee on Commerce;

The bill (S. No. 441) enabling claimants to lands within the limits of the Territories of New Mexico, Colorado, and Arizona to institute proceedings to try the validity of their claims—Committee on Private Land Claims;

The bill (S. No. 305) for the relief of Albert von Stienhousen, late major Sixty-eighth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry—Committee on Military Affairs; and

The bill (S. No. 620) for the relief of Osceola C. Green, administrator de bonis non, and one of the heirs at law of Lieutenant-Colonel Uriah Forrest—Committee on War Claims.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS IN MISSOURI.

Mr. BUCKNER. I ask consent to report back for present consideration, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, the bill (S. No. 32) obviating the necessity for issuing patents for certain private land claims in the State of Missouri, and for other purposes. I ask that this bill may be acted upon now. It is a matter only of local interest to our State.

The bill was read.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Is this bill reported from a committee?

The SPEAKER. It is reported from the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I must object to its present consideration.

Mr. HOLMAN. Some years ago it was thought proper to discontinue the office of recorder of land titles in Missouri, and an act was passed limiting the continuance of this office to one year. That seems to have been overlooked and we have continued to make the small appropriations for that office ever since. The effect of the last provision of the bill——

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I objected some time ago to the present consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, the bill is not before the House.

THE FREEDMAN'S BANK.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BROMBERG] calls up the motion to reconsider the vote whereby certain papers in relation to the Freedman's Bank were referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency with a view to having the same printed. Certain papers in relation to the Freedman's Bank were sent to the House and referred to that committee without an order to print. The gentleman from Alabama, at the suggestion of the Chair, afterward entered a motion to reconsider, and he now desires to call up that motion with a view to having the papers printed.

Mr. BROMBERG. I desire to be heard upon that motion.

Mr. BURCHARD. Would it be in order to raise the question of consideration?

The SPEAKER. It would.

Mr. BURCHARD. If the gentleman intends to occupy his hour, I wish to raise the question of consideration. If he only desires to make a brief explanation, I shall not object.

Mr. BROMBERG. This is a privileged motion, which I conceive does not depend on a single objection by any member.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] proposes to raise the question of consideration, and that he has the right to do.

Mr. BROMBERG. Is not this a privileged motion?

The SPEAKER. But the House has a right to determine on any question, even a question of privilege, whether they shall now consider it.

Mr. BURCHARD. I have no objection to the gentleman from Alabama making an explanation if he does not wish to occupy an hour.

Mr. MERRIAM. I object to it at this time.

Mr. BROMBERG. I want to have read from the RECORD, to show the reasons why I made this motion——

Mr. MERRIAM. I object to it at this time.

Mr. BURCHARD. I feel bound in view of the condition of the public business to raise the question of consideration, if the gentleman wishes to occupy an hour at this time.

Mr. MERRIAM. I desire to say that the Committee on Banking and Currency have had this matter under consideration and have prepared a bill, and they have unanimously agreed this morning that when they bring in the bill they will ask for one hour's discussion, thirty minutes upon our side and thirty minutes upon the other side. The delay will only be for a short time, as yesterday we got permission to report the bill at any time.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. The bill is not yet ready.

Mr. BROMBERG. I asked the gentleman yesterday distinctly whether time would be given me, and I was told that no condition of the sort would be made with me.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. This would be the regular order, but the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] raised the question of consideration and it is for the House to decide whether they will consider this matter now. The Chair was waiting to see if some arrangement could be made in reference to it.

Mr. BROMBERG. Does the gentleman from New York say that an opportunity will be allowed for debate upon the other side?

Mr. MERRIAM. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROMBERG. That is more than he would agree to yesterday, and with that understanding I will not press the motion now.

The SPEAKER. Then the understanding is that the gentleman from Alabama will have half an hour when the bill is introduced.

Mr. BROMBERG. Still, I think that the House ought to have this matter in print before it when the bill comes up, because the bill is one of the most monstrous bills that was ever proposed to this House.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I object to discussion upon the merits of the bill.

Mr. DURHAM. As I have charge of the bill I desire to say that I have no objection to allowing the opposition to it to have half an hour to discuss it; but I doubt the propriety of allowing the gentleman from Alabama to occupy the whole time.

Mr. BROMBERG. It is too late to recall that understanding.

Mr. DURHAM. I shall have charge of the bill, and if the gentleman proposes to speak for all of that side of the House which opposes the bill, he may do so; but I doubt the propriety of giving the whole time to him.

Mr. BROMBERG. As the introducer of the resolution in response to which these papers were sent, I think I have a right to be heard.

Mr. HOLMAN. I thought this matter was disposed of by an agreement that each side should be allowed thirty minutes for debate when the bill comes up.

The SPEAKER. Some fault was found in regard to the non-printing of the papers in this case.

Mr. BROMBERG. The House will remember that the papers were so indorsed that nobody on the floor, not even the Speaker, knew what they related to. They were only indorsed with a reference to the resolution by its date.

The SPEAKER. The papers came indorsed from the Bureau of Banking and Currency. The Chair did not notice anything unusual in regard to them, and they were referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency. Some comments were made afterward upon the fact that they were not ordered to be printed, and the Chair suggested to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BROMBERG] that the matter was still within the control of the House by a motion to reconsider, and it is now within the control of a majority of the House.

Mr. BROMBERG. The papers were so indorsed that neither the Speaker nor the Clerk could have comprehended what they referred to. The indorsement simply referred to the resolution of the 18th instant, and nobody knew what it meant. As soon as I found out what the papers were I entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which they were referred.

Mr. BURCHARD. If the arrangement proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky is satisfactory, I see no necessity for further discussion about this matter now.

Mr. BROMBERG. I do not accept his proposition at all. I understood that the House accorded me half an hour.

The SPEAKER. One hour is to be devoted to the discussion of the bill when it shall be reported, and half of that time will be given to the opposition and half of it to those who favor the bill. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Alabama in opposition to the bill.

Mr. BROMBERG. But I understood that half an hour was to be accorded to me.

The SPEAKER. Well, that of course will give the gentleman half an hour, unless he chooses to yield any of his time to some one else.

Mr. BURCHARD. Then I move that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

Mr. BROMBERG. No, sir; I have not yielded the floor for that purpose. I think the motion to reconsider had better be left pending, for the reason that the committee may not report the bill for some time.

The SPEAKER. The committee will report the bill to-morrow or the next day.

Mr. BROMBERG. With that understanding I have no objection to laying the motion to reconsider on the table.

The motion to reconsider was then laid upon the table.

RECONSIDERATION OF REFERENCES.

Mr. BECK. I move to reconsider the several votes by which bills from the Senate have been referred this morning, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TRANSPORTATION OF MAILS ON RAILROADS.

Mr. DONNAN. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to report the following resolution for action at this time:

Resolved, That one thousand copies of House Miscellaneous Document No. 263, being a communication from the Postmaster-General in relation to the question of compensation to the railroads for the transportation of the mails, be printed for the use of the Post-Office Department and one thousand for the use of the House.

I have no doubt members of the House have noticed a communication upon their desks entitled "Postal cars or no postal cars," a question to be settled by the action or inaction of Congress. The document referred to in this resolution is an answer to that communication, which claims that the compensation is wholly inadequate, and that unless it is largely increased, some three times, all postal cars will be withdrawn. This communication is an answer to that, and a thorough investigation into the whole subject. The Postmaster-General asks that one thousand copies be printed for the use of his Department.

The resolution was adopted.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS.

Mr. DEWITT, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3340) to amend and further extend the provisions of the act entitled "An act for the official adjustment of private land claims in the States of Florida, Louisiana, and Missouri, and for other purposes;" which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the Committee on Private Land Claims, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

DEBATE ON SUSPENSION OF THE RULES.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That the rules be amended as follows:

RULE —. When a motion to suspend the rules has been seconded, it shall be in order, before the final vote is taken, to debate the proposition to be voted upon for thirty minutes, one-half of such time to be given to debate in favor of, and one-half to debate in opposition to, such proposition.

EQUALIZING BOUNTIES.

Mr. GUNCKEL, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Military Affairs a bill (H. R. No. 3341) to equalize bounties; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

DEPARTMENT OF MANUFACTURES AND MINING.

Mr. WOODWORTH, from the Committee on Manufactures, reported back, with a substitute, the bill (H. R. No. 1246) to establish at the seat of Government a Department of Manufactures and Mining, and for other purposes; which was ordered to be printed, recommitted to the Committee on Manufactures, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

ARTIFICIAL LIMBS.

Mr. WOODWORTH also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3342) to amend section 1 of an act entitled "An act to provide for furnishing artificial limbs to disabled soldiers," approved June 17, 1870; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

SETTLERS ON RAILROAD LANDS.

Mr. MOREY, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3343) for the relief of certain settlers on railroad lands; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the Committee on the Public Lands, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

HOLMES WIKOFF.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of House bill No. 3006, authorizing the President to nominate Holmes Wikoff an assistant surgeon in the Navy, and that the bill be considered in the House at this time.

The SPEAKER. Where is the bill?

Mr. SCOFIELD. The bill is now in Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. It would have saved time had the gentleman given notice, so that the bill could have been looked up.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I learned just now that it is quite important to the individual that it should be passed now; it is of no account to the public.

The bill authorizes the President to nominate and, with the consent of the Senate, appoint Holmes Wikoff an assistant surgeon in the Navy, waiving his disqualification by age, and subject in all other respects to existing law and regulations.

No objection being made, the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar was discharged from the further consideration of the bill; and the same was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SCOFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ELECTION CONTEST—MAXWELL vs. CANNON.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. I now call up the contested-election case, from the Territory of Utah, of George R. Maxwell vs. George Q. Cannon. The Committee on Elections have reported two resolutions, to which two amendments have been proposed, one by myself and one by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRISON.] I desire to ask the previous question on the resolutions and amendments, and if it shall be sustained, I shall then ask the attention of the House for five or six minutes only to explain the resolution.

The resolutions reported from the committee were as follows:

Resolved, (1,) That George R. Maxwell was not elected, and is not entitled, to a seat in the House of Representatives of the Forty-third Congress as Delegate for the Territory of Utah.

Resolved, (2,) That George Q. Cannon was elected and returned as a Delegate for the Territory of Utah to a seat in the Forty-third Congress.

The amendment proposed by Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin, was as follows:

Whereas George R. Maxwell has prosecuted a contest against the sitting member, George Q. Cannon, now occupying a seat in the Forty-third Congress as Delegate for the Territory of Utah, charging, among other things, that the said Cannon is disqualified from holding, and is unworthy of, a seat on the floor of this House, for the reason that he was at the date of his election, to wit, on the 5th day of August, 1872, and prior thereto had been and still is, openly living and cohabiting with four women as his wives under the pretended sanction of a system of polygamy, which system he notoriously indorses and upholds, against the statute of the United States approved July 1, 1862, which declares the same to be a felony, to the great scandal and disgrace of the people and the Government of the United States, and in abuse of the privilege of representation accorded to said Territory of Utah, and that he has taken and never renounced an oath which is inconsistent with his duties and allegiance to the said Government of the United States; and whereas the evidence in support of such charge has been brought to the official notice of the Committee on Elections: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Elections be, and is hereby, instructed and authorized to investigate said charge, and report the result to the House, and recommend such action on the part of the House as shall seem meet and proper in the premises.

Mr. SPEER. Is that the resolution which was printed and of which notice was given?

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. I have modified the second resolution to correspond with the resolution as read by the Clerk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRISON,] a member of the committee, proposes in lieu of the second resolution what will be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That George Q. Cannon was duly elected and returned as Delegate from the Territory of Utah, and is entitled to his seat as a Delegate in the Forty-third Congress.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the point of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPEER] to be that the committee had instructed the gentleman from Wisconsin to call the previous question on the two resolutions.

Mr. SPEER. My point was that the gentleman from Wisconsin was directed by the committee to report the two resolutions for the action of the House; that he had no authority from the committee to offer any amendment or permit any to be offered.

The SPEAKER. That would not exclude the right to amend. It would still be within the discretion of the gentleman having the matter in charge, and ultimately within the discretion of the House, when the previous question should be called. The gentleman from Wisconsin now demands the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRISON.]

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, the only reason why I felt bound to present a protest against the action taken by the majority of the committee was that while the whole matter as to the election, returns, and qualifications of the Delegate from Utah was submitted to the committee, I was thoroughly convinced that the committee upon the question of qualifications could not go into anything except the constitutional qualifications.

I agree with the committee that the contestant was not elected and is not entitled to the seat. I agree with the committee that although there were some frauds and irregularities at some of the voting places in the Territory of Utah, yet the sitting Delegate was elected by an overwhelming majority. I agree with the committee in everything that they find in reference to this election, except that I am satisfied that when the committee found Mr. Cannon, the sitting Delegate, was duly elected and returned, and possessed all the qualifications fixed by the Constitution of the United States, it was their bounden duty, in pursuance of the long line of precedents which have governed in such cases, to report a resolution that he was entitled to the seat.

I have heard it suggested that it was unnecessary to report a resolution that he was entitled to the seat, because he had been admitted to it upon presenting his credentials to the House, and that the resolution of the committee to the effect that he was elected (he having been already seated) left him entitled to the seat. If I had believed that this was the view which the House would take of it, I should have been thoroughly satisfied with the resolution which stopped short of reporting that Mr. Cannon is entitled to the seat. But without making the slightest reflection upon the committee, for each member of which I entertain the very highest respect, I thought that the failure to take the course which had been uniformly taken when it was ascertained that a member or Delegate had been duly elected and was constitutionally qualified, the failure to declare that he was entitled to his seat was in the direction of establishing a precedent which I thought dangerous. Therefore it was that I brought to the notice of the House in the protest which I submitted the clear distinction between the right of the House to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of members under the Constitution, and the right of the House, under a separate and distinct provision of the Constitution, to expel a member by a two-thirds vote. I did not want this proceeding to take such a shape as would justify the expulsion by a majority vote, or would prevent a proceeding for expulsion from being taken regularly under that provision of the Constitution which looks to that special action and which provides that it shall be done by a two-thirds vote.

It is logical, it is in pursuance of precedent, it is right, that when a member or Delegate has been returned elected, and is qualified under the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, he should be declared entitled to his seat, whatever proceedings the House may afterward take looking to his expulsion. This distinction, which has been drawn in the Constitution, ought to be observed; and we ought not in any case to take a course which looks to breaking down the barrier which the Constitution itself has raised between a proceeding for the expulsion of a member and a proceeding to ascertain whether he is elected and qualified under the Constitution.

I have examined as closely as I could to ascertain whether there was any distinction in point of fact between a Delegate and a member of Congress in this regard. I find no precedent which comes clearly up to a decision of the question. But it is well settled that, the Constitution having fixed the qualifications of a member of Congress, it excludes the idea of any other prerequisite as a qualification for admission to a seat; and the analogies of the question bring the case of a Delegate within the same category. Therefore, when duly elected under the provisions of the law erecting the Territory, he is entitled to the seat on this floor, if he is qualified in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution. The people of Utah are entitled to be represented here; and although if a man presenting himself does not possess the qualifications prescribed in the Constitution the House may refuse to admit him, and although the House by instituting the proper proceeding has a clear right, by a two-thirds vote, to expel him, yet until that is done, I submit that this House, looking to the importance of the precedents established by its action, cannot stop short of declaring that the sitting Delegate is entitled to a seat on this floor.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. I now yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SPEER.]

Mr. SPEER. Mr. Speaker, I did not know that this case was to be called up for consideration this morning, and am therefore not prepared to discuss it at any length. It is just as well, however, for the House can understand the question in a few minutes.

The contest of George R. Maxwell against George Q. Cannon, the sitting Delegate from the Territory of Utah, was referred to the Committee on Elections. It was considered by that committee. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HAZELTON] was directed by the committee to report to the House, first, that Mr. Maxwell was not elected, and, secondly, that Mr. Cannon was. There were some irregularities in the election in Utah, but beyond and above them all was the undisputed fact that the sitting Delegate, Mr. Cannon, was elected by about 18,000 majority. Deducting all the irregular votes claimed, casting out all the polls where irregularities were alleged to have been committed, still the fact remained patent to us all that Mr. Cannon had a majority of several thousand unquestioned and unchallenged votes. That being so, the duty of the Committee on Elections was as plain as the sun, and that was to report the contestant was not entitled to the seat because he had not been duly elected and the contestee was. That far the committee in discharge of its duty went. Its duty under the contest referred to it neither required nor authorized the committee to go further.

The gentleman from Wisconsin, on his own responsibility, having made under the direction of the Committee on Elections the report reciting that Mr. Maxwell was not elected and Mr Cannon was, now submits an amendment to the report of the committee, reciting what was alleged by Mr. Maxwell before the committee against the sitting Delegate and authorizing the appointment of a select committee by the House to investigate this scandal and recommend such action to the House as it may deem proper. He has modified the resolution this morning, and instead of referring to a select committee, now proposes to refer to the Committee on Elections.

The proposition of the gentleman from Wisconsin now is to send this case back to the Committee on Elections—not to determine who was elected, not to determine who received the most votes, because Mr. Cannon, all admit, has 18,000 majority, but to determine how many wives he has or may have had during his lifetime.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, it would be just as proper for the Committee on Elections to determine how many wives Mr. Maxwell has or may have had in his lifetime. It is not a subject for the consideration of the Election Committee. The number of wives a man may have or may not have is not, I believe, under the Constitution of the United States, one of the qualifications of a member of Congress. He is not required to be married to be entitled to a seat in this House; he is not compelled to be unmarried to be entitled to a seat here, and therefore, in all candor, I fail to see upon what theory this amendment should be adopted and this contest sent back to the Election Committee.

If Congress proposes to deal by legislation with the system of Mormonism in Utah, that is one thing. I am not here to defend it. I know little about it theoretically and nothing about it practically, and I submit to this House that it is trifling with the question, it is imposing upon the Committee on Elections a duty which they do not want and have not time properly to discharge, to require of them the investigation of these scandals which have filled the ear of the country for years and years. Certainly this is not the way to meet the Mormon question, and to dispose of the very difficult and grave constitutional questions involved in the Utah problem.

And further, what report could the Committee on Elections make that would determine this House in its action on the right of Mr. Cannon to a seat here? If he has been duly elected he is entitled to his seat, unless he has committed some crime or by some act of his life he proved himself unworthy of a seat here, and then he should be expelled under a different provision of the Constitution—not the provision relating to his election and return as a member, but to his fitness as a man to occupy a seat upon this floor. The House has the undoubted right to expel any member for sufficient cause, but that point rests upon a separate and distinct provision of the Constitution from that provision which refers to the House to pass upon the qualifications and election of its members, and requires a vote of two-thirds, and not as in the other case a simple majority. Where the alleged unfitness of the member or Delegate arises from acts or offenses committed by him entirely unconnected with his duty here, and having no relation whatever to his conduct as a member of or Delegate in this House, it seems to me at this time, without further examination, that his conviction by a competent court is the proper means of determining his guilt in the first instance, and is the proper way to lay a foundation for our action. In such a case no committee can try and convict; it can only hear and report the facts.

I submit it is unfair to the sitting Delegate, it is unfair to the Committee on Elections, it is unfitting the gravity of the question itself, to attempt under the pretense of an election contest to thrust before this House and the country a report upon the prevalent scandals in Utah.

If Mr. Maxwell is not elected—and he is not, and he knows he is not—why should this House take up further time with the investigation of this contest? Or why should it be sent back again to the committee, already overburdened with volumes of testimony in a large number of cases that will occupy them to the last hour of the session and perhaps run into the next?

Mr. HALE, of New York. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SPEER. With pleasure.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I wish to inquire if the resolution now proposed purports to be in any form a matter of inquiry into a contested election; whether it is not simply an inquiry into certain charges made upon which the only action that the House can take is, if they deem that right, to expel the member or to impose such censure on him as they may see fit? And if that be so, then I beg to ask the gentleman if he thinks such charges are not a proper subject of investigation for the purpose of determining the question of expulsion?

Mr. SPEER. But such charges should not be referred to the Committee on Elections, because they do not relate to the election, qualifications, and return of the Delegate.

Mr. HALE, of New York. That is merely a matter of form.

Mr. SPEER. As I said before, if the House desires to enter upon an investigation of that kind, let a resolution for that purpose be offered, and let the investigation go to the Committee on the Judiciary or a committee specially authorized for the purpose. Such a resolution I will not oppose; but if I properly understand the duties of the Election Committee, as defined by the standing rules of the House, they are to inquire into the election, qualifications, and returns of members of the House. The duties of the committee are defined by one of the standing rules of the House. Now, why should the House impose upon the Election Committee a distinct and separate duty wholly unconnected with their duties as fixed by the standing rules of the House, and with the discharge of which they are now overburdened? If this inquiry be a proper matter for the consideration of the House—and upon that I pass no judgment now—I say it should not be connected with this question of the right of this gentleman to his seat upon the election returns. It is a separate, distinct, and independent matter which should stand upon its own merits. His right to a declaration by this House of his election does not depend at all upon that.

If all that is alleged in this resolution were true, it cannot and should not be permitted to affect the judgment of this House upon the other question as to his due election and return. Whether or not he is a proper person to have been elected, and, if elected, a proper person to sit here, is a different question—a question I admit, with the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HALE,] that this House has the right to determine, and which under many circumstances it becomes its imperative duty to determine. I purposely avoid that discussion here and now as irrelevant and improper. I now simply and only claim that the Election Committee as well as the sitting Delegate is entitled to an expression of the House upon its action unembarrassed by the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin, which should not have been offered in connection with the report of the committee. I think he has done the committee injustice by his course. It strikes me as an attempt to connect with this election contest the Mormon question, and thus embarrass it and deny the sitting Delegate the right, which every gentleman on this floor has, of being declared elected when he has been duly elected. It is an attempt to go back and investigate the domestic, social, and private affairs of a lifetime on this election inquiry. You might as well instruct the Election Committee to inquire how many chickens a member of this House has stolen, or how many plates of oysters he has eaten and not paid for, or how many other peccadilloes or offenses greater or less he may have been guilty of. If such matters are to be referred to the Election Committee, and if it is to be a committee of inquisition into the social and private habits of every member, that they may be brought here before the country, it seems to me that more gentlemen than the gentleman from Utah may suffer from such an investigation. If the sitting Delegate from Utah is guilty of illegal or immoral practices, there is a legal way to ascertain his guilt; and when his guilt shall have been legally ascertained, I shall be as ready as the gentleman from Wisconsin to discharge my duty under my conscience and my oath. But I shall not express an opinion and then seek jurisdiction of the case.

The system of Mormonism is wholly foreign to the question now before the House; and I trust gentlemen, however they may vote on the amendment, will adopt the report of the committee, declaring what all the members of the committee admit to be true, that Mr. Cannon was duly elected and duly returned. And then if the House wishes to sail out on this broad sea of personal slander, instead of meeting fairly and thoroughly the Mormon question itself, let the gentleman whose heart warms toward such an inquisition institute it; and let the committee that can feast and fatten upon such things be appointed to investigate them.

Mr. MERRIAM. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania one question before he sits down. If the moral sense of the people of this country decides that the retaining of a seat in this House by the Delegate from Utah is a scandal upon the intelligence, Christianity, and civilization of our day, and it should be decided to offer a resolution to expel him, would it not be better that the investigation should be made by the gentleman's committee, having already all the testimony before it, than that it should go to another committee, requiring all the testimony to be duplicated at a great expense?

Mr. SPEER. I do not think it would; because our committee, under the rules of the House, has certainly nothing to do with the investigation of such questions. If we are to be made a committee of general inquisition into the lives and habits of members of this House, it would be proper; but as we are already burdened with more work than can be disposed of to the end of the session, it seems to me eminently improper that such an investigation should be referred to us.

The Delegate from Utah comes here under the law which defines his qualifications and the manner of his election. If he is legally qualified, and has been duly elected, as the Committee on Elections believes and has unanimously reported, then the duty of that committee is ended. If it is proposed to change the law as to Utah, and provide more rigidly against Mormonism, let the gentleman from New York introduce his bill; but do not let him attempt to deal with a question so important by connecting it with the report of a committee which even he must concede is legally right. I carefully avoid expressing any opinion on the main question, but there is such a thing as doing a decent act in an indecent way.

Mr. MERRIAM. Is there any investigation before your committee so important to the welfare of the country as this is?

Mr. SPEER. The importance of the investigation here proposed is a matter dependent upon the views of the individual members of this House.

Mr. MERRIAM. It depends upon the testimony before you.

Mr. SPEER. There has been no testimony taken by the sitting Delegate for the purpose of meeting this charge.

We have questions before us relating to the right of members to their seats. Those are the questions which it is our duty to determine; those are the questions for the determination of which we have been appointed. I would prefer that gentlemen like the gentleman from New York, who seems to long for an investigation of this kind, should undertake it, and that the resolution of the gentleman from Wisconsin should be referred to a special committee composed of himself, the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MERRIAM,] and those who are equally anxious for such labor.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. I yield now for a few moments to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ROBINSON.]

Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, the qualifications of Representatives in Congress are fixed by the Constitution, and no act of this House or of Congress can modify or change them. There is nothing in the Constitution or in the acts of Congress that prescribes the qualifications of a Delegate from a Territory in this body; but as an act of Congress provides that the Constitution shall have effect in the Territories so far as it is applicable, and inasmuch as in the history of the past the qualifications of Delegates have been regarded the same as the qualifications of members of Congress, it may plausibly be held that the same qualifications should be required. But the committee made no decision upon that point. It will come up properly before the House when the guilt or innocence of this man shall be established upon the report of a proper committee. The committee has found that the sitting Delegate received a majority of the votes cast by the people of the Territory of Utah, and was therefore duly elected. That far the committee were unanimous. My friend from Tennessee [Mr. HARRISON] desired the committee to add to that a resolution declaring that the contestee is legally entitled to his seat. Now, I concede that it is the logical sequence of the finding of the committee that if he received a majority of the votes of the people of that Territory and was therefore duly elected, he would be entitled to a seat in Congress; but I disagree with the gentleman as to the propriety of so declaring, because in the contest before the committee and in the evidence which was before the committee the charge was made against this contestee that he is guilty of high crime; that he is living in a state of bigamy or polygamy in violation of a statute of the United States which declares that act to be a felony.

This being the case, I claim that it is not the duty of the House in one breath to declare him entitled to his seat and in another breath to declare that he is disqualified from holding the office to which he was elected. I shall therefore oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee and shall favor the resolutions of the committee, and then I shall follow that by voting to have this question investigated, and if the contestee shall be found guilty of the charge made against him, it will be for the House then to decide what action may be proper in the premises to secure the right of representation on the one hand and the honor and purity of this House on the other.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. I desire to detain the House only a very few moments in explaining the attitude of this case.

Mr. CROUNSE. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry. I would like to inquire the state of the question before the House; what resolutions are up for consideration?

The SPEAKER. The resolutions of the committee are pending, and as amendments there are pending the resolution of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HAZELTON] and the resolution offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRISON.]

Mr. CROUNSE. I would ask furthermore whether the resolution offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin is germane and can be entertained as an amendment to the resolution reported from the committee?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is; but if not, it is too late to raise the point now, because the resolution has been entertained and spoken on. The Chair, however, thinks it would be germane.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. At the commencement of the present session, as will be remembered, the sitting Delegate from the Territory of Utah appeared at the bar of the House, and although a question was raised as to his right to a seat, and although it was proposed before he should be sworn in to send the case to the Committee on Elections for investigation, upon argument and consideration the House voted that he should be sworn in and should take his seat without any condition or limitation. This case came to the Committee on Elections in the general budget of cases under the common resolution referring them all to that committee for investigation. Evidence was submitted to the committee and the case was very thoroughly and ably argued on both sides. The committee found in the investigation a jurisdictional question in their way, and those who have examined the report prepared on the part of the committee, and presented to the House some days since, will understand the nature of that question. The Committee on Elections was organized at the outset under the provision of the Constitution which provides and declares that each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its members. The committee concluded that under the general resolution of reference, under the order made by the House in this case, the only qualifications referred to the Committee on Elections were the constitutional qualifications, to wit, that the party should be twenty-five years of age; that he shall have been seven years a citizen of the country, and that he should be an actual inhabitant of the district which he claims to represent. Upon that view the Committee on Elections prepared a report, and the conclusion which seemed to be the logical result of the position taken by the committee is embodied in the two resolutions which followed the report and which have been read.

It was proposed in the committee that the resolution in regard to the contestant, Mr. Maxwell, ought to be adopted for the purpose of declaring to him and to others in like circumstances that a minority candidate may not be entitled to a seat under the decisions which have been adopted by this House and by the courts of this country. And so they resolve, as set forth in this first resolution, that he is not entitled to the seat. The second resolution agreed upon by the committee is as follows:

Resolved, (2,) That George Q. Cannon was elected and returned as a Delegate for the Territory of Utah to a seat in the Forty-third Congress.

Now, right here I desire to say a word as to the amendment proposed by my friend from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRISON,] to the effect that the House ought to go further, and affirm not only that the sitting Delegate was duly elected and returned, but that he is duly qualified and entitled to occupy the seat. My understanding of the law in regard to this question is this: that it is not necessary that the House should adopt any resolution as to the right of the sitting member to occupy the seat. In the absence of any resolution whatever he holds the seat simply by virtue of the fact that he has been sworn in and occupies it. In the Forty-first Congress the case of McGorty against Hooper was referred to the Committee on Elections. The committee investigated that case, and reported that Mr. McGorty, being the minority candidate, was not entitled to the seat; that Mr. Hooper, having been elected by a majority of the votes in that Territory, was duly qualified and entitled to the seat. The House, by a very large vote, adopted the first of those resolutions; it tabled the second. Yet the sitting Delegate continued to occupy his seat notwithstanding. Therefore, if the House should decline to pass the second resolution in this case, the sitting Delegate would remain in his seat by virtue of the fact that he has been sworn in and occupies the seat under his certificate and the oath he has taken.

It was the opinion of some members of the committee that to go further than this resolution goes, and affirm without any necessity therefor that the sitting Delegate is duly qualified, might embarrass the House and the committee in a further investigation of this case, if such an investigation should be ordered. It seems to me that no injustice will be done the sitting Delegate by voting down the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRISON,] while the committee and the House may be relieved from embarrassment if that course shall be adopted. But I do not deem it material one way or the other.

Mr. SCHUMAKER, of New York. I would inquire of the gentleman if a great deal of testimony has not already been taken on this point before the committee as to the fact that the sitting Delegate is a polygamist; and does he deny it?

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. A very large volume of testimony has been taken upon notice under the law, and has been submitted to the committee.

Mr. SCHUMAKER, of New York. Is it necessary, then, to go over all this testimony again? I understand that a great deal of testimony has been offered upon that point.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. I do not understand that it will be necessary to take more testimony, although that is a question which may be addressed hereafter to the committee, if either party shall desire to submit additional testimony. But the testimony already taken is very full and explicit upon that subject.

My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPEER] has attempted to criticise my conduct, either as a member of the committee or a member of the House, for presuming to offer the amendment to the second resolution which I have offered, and which I gave notice when the report was presented to the House that I would ask the House to pass upon when this case should be reached. It seemed to me that I could do no less. This testimony was submitted to the committee; it had been taken under the law; the case was fully argued before the committee; it was fully considered by the committee. While I agree that the jurisdiction of the committee was limited under the resolution by which the committee got jurisdiction of this case, yet it seemed to me that the facts which had been presented to our committee were proper to be considered by the House; that I owed it to the House to present the facts embodied in this amendment for its consideration, and that I should have been derelict had I done any less. I notified the committee when the report was agreed upon that I should either offer this resolution myself or procure some other member of the House to offer it. It will be remembered that when the report was presented to the House I gave notice that I should offer this amendment, and ask the vote of the House upon it when the case should be reached. Now, it does not seem to me pertinent to the question before the House to follow the gentleman from Pennsylvania into a discussion of the matter covered by this preamble and this resolution. It seems to me that we ought not to be diverted here and now to the discussion of that question.

I may add the expression of my surprise that my friend has felt called upon at this stage of the investigation to volunteer—it seems to me almost gratuitously and unnecessarily—a defense of the system of polygamy. I do not deem it necessary to enter upon that discussion now.

Mr. SPEER. Is the gentleman referring to me?

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. I am.

Mr. SPEER. Does the gentleman refer to me as having volunteered a defense of the system of polygamy?

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. I so understood the gentleman.

Mr. SPEER. I am not responsible for the gentleman's understanding; that is all.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. I understood the gentleman to allude to the matter embraced in the charge as a mere matter of scandal in one of the Territories on the frontier, as not of sufficient moment to challenge the attention of this House, as simply a matter to be whistled down the wind, to be overwhelmed with ridicule upon this floor; and he asked with some emphasis "Why drag this matter before the House and the country," as if it were a matter that had not yet been before the House and before the country, and before the civilized world; and as if it had not challenged the attention of men in high places and men in private life, men all over this country, of every party and of every denomination—as if it had not once before in our legislative history received the attention of this House.

Now, I say that I am not disposed at this time to enter upon that question. I simply say that the charge has been brought to the attention of the Committee on Elections, that the evidence has been presented in support of it; and I merely wish to take the judgment and order of the House as to whether this matter shall be dropped under this state of facts, whether the House will say it will not investigate this charge, or whether it will direct the Committee on Elections to proceed with the investigation and report the result to the House, recommending such action as in the judgment of the committee shall seem meet and proper. That is the only proposition contained in my amendment. I hope the House will adopt the amendment and order this investigation.

It is true the question might go to a select committee. It is true it might go to the Judiciary Committee. But there is no impropriety in its going to the Committee on Elections; and more than that, inasmuch as the testimony is before that committee and has been somewhat examined by the committee, it seems to me highly proper that it should take that course.

Mr. SPEER. Does the gentleman think that after the zeal he has manifested on this question he could act impartially as a judge upon it?

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. I might retort very pertinently by putting the same inquiry to my friend from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SPEER. I do not want the question to go before our committee; the gentleman does. That is the difference.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. I did not desire at the outset that this matter should go to our committee at all.

Mr. SPEER. The gentleman is pleading that this case should be referred to himself, who has prejudged it.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. At the instance of other parties I modified my resolution so that the case should go to our committee. I am not seeking jurisdiction of this case as a member of the Committee on Elections or otherwise. I would be very glad indeed if the House should refer the case to a special committee. I would be very glad to be relieved of its jurisdiction. But if the House shall order the Committee on Elections to consider it, I am disposed to do so, precisely as I would consider any other case sent to our committee.

As I have before said, in what I have stated I am not undertaking to go into the merits and demerits of the system of polygamy. I am simply referring to the propriety of disposing of this question which has been raised and brought to the attention of the House, and with the House I leave the responsibility of making the determination.

Mr. POTTER. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HAZELTON] yield to me?

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. For how long?

Mr. POTTER. For about five minutes.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. Yes, sir.

Mr. POTTER. Mr. Speaker, this question of the exclusion of Representatives from this House on account of moral qualifications is not new. It has been raised at various times since I have been a member of Congress. My own judgment is—and such has generally been the action of the House when called upon to consider the question—that the House has no right to add to the qualifications of Representatives prescribed by the Constitution of the United States for a member. I understand that in this case the gentleman in question is charged with having been guilty of violating a statute of the United States, of committing a criminal offense against the laws of the country having relation to the Territory of Utah, and that for this he is liable to be indicted, tried, and punished, and thereby to become disqualified from holding a seat in this House. I object, however, in this case, as I have objected in every case of the sort that has arisen since I have been a member of the House, to considering whether—— from New York [Mr. POTTER] to say that the House has never extended the jurisdiction of the Committee on Elections to consider anything but the constitutional qualifications of a person presenting himself as a member?

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. Do I understand the gentleman

Mr. POTTER. O, no; I did not say that.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. I so understood the gentleman.

Mr. POTTER. I said I had never been aware of any case—certainly not in my own time—in which anybody possessing the constitutional qualifications was declared not to be entitled to a seat in this House because he failed to possess certain moral or other qualifications of that nature—because he had been guilty of crime.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. The gentleman will find he is mistaken, if he will look at the reports upon this subject.

Mr. POTTER. I may possibly be mistaken; but certainly the question was very much discussed in the case of Porter, who came here from Virginia in the Forty-first Congress, and who was declared to have been disloyal, to have been convicted of crime, to have gone about the street wearing a ball and chain upon his leg. Objection was raised that he ought not to be admitted to a seat here. The House considered the question, and it was then declared by a very large vote—gentlemen on this side of the House agreeing with those on the other side, the vote involving more than nine-tenths of the whole House and turning after debate on this very question—that the House had no power to add to the constitutional qualifications of men elected to Congress. I have always believed that when a man possesses the constitutional qualifications, his constituents have a right to send him here, and we a-e bound to receive him and treat him while in the House as our equal in the House.

A constituency of thieves may choose to send a man here who is a thief, but until he has been tried and convicted as such, I know of no constitutional power in the House to exclude him from the seat to which he is elected. I put that as the farthest supposable case. I never shall vote, therefore, to inquire into any matter of that description unless it be with a view of having the alleged criminal presented, indicted, tried, and convicted.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Will my friend from New York allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. POTTER. Surely.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. The gentleman goes deeper than any one before in this discussion. It troubles my mind a good deal. I do not understand there is any constitutional provision for Delegates at all. Delegates come here only by the force of statutes. I wish to ask my friend whether it is claimed by statute one Congress of the United States can impose upon this House the presence of anybody, except its members who come here by constitutional right, against the will of the House; and if so, where that constitutional power is found which can make any man be received by this House as a Delegate on this floor they do not choose to have?

Mr. POTTER. I decline to answer the question of the gentleman from Massachusetts. It may well be that it has a great deal of force in it. But we have been discussing this case in reference to the generally received action of the Congress for many years in regard to the Delegates from the Territories. We have treated them in respect of qualifications as if they had been members. We have never disputed the right of former Congresses to give the Territories representation and their Delegates seats upon this floor. It may be now as suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (and I am unwilling now to say absolutely that it is not so,) that we may exclude a man entirely from representing a Territory at all by our own volition and without reason exclude him from any seat in this Chamber just as we may repeal the law which creates the Territory and thereby shut it off from representation. That, however, would require the action of both Houses and the approval of the President. Both Houses and the President having given Utah representation here, the question raised by the resolution is whether this man having been duly elected is entitled or not entitled to occupy a seat on this floor.

This case, then, is in the line of the general precedents of the action of the House on such subjects. Men are sent here to represent their constituencies. Provided a man has the constitutional qualifications he should sit here as a Representative of his State. When his constituency have decided he is a proper Representative and he has the constitutional requirements, I do not think the House of Representatives has power, in the case of Representatives, to impose additional qualifications for representation, moral or otherwise. By parity of reason it ought not to impose any additional qualifications in regard to Delegates from the Territories. For that reason I shall oppose this motion to refer this inquiry to the Committee on Elections or, for that matter, to any other committee. I am unwilling to introduce into the government of a country so vast as ours, differing in its climates, productions, and occupations, divided into parties, divided into sections, with Representatives differing in opinion, in belief, and in judgment, and in politics, any precedent by which the House shall inquire into the question of belief; shall inquire into the question of the moral qualifications of a member to a seat upon this floor, provided always he is duly elected and possesses the qualifications for a Representative prescribed by the Constitution. It is exactly because I do agree entirely in sympathy with the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HAZELTON] in regard to the condition of things in Utah, and do believe it is at variance with the spirit of our age, and do believe it is a condition of things which ought to be treated with seriousness, that I am unwilling to go into it in this manner. It is a question that should be considered by itself, not in connection with the right of a member to a seat because of some defect in his moral and individual though not in his constitutional qualifications. I believe the true rule would be to have the law prescribe whether——

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Let me ask the gentleman from New York whether this makes any difference in this case? It is alleged not only that the sitting Delegate in this case committed a certain offense some time ago, but that he is now, to-day, living in open, confessed violation of a statute—a violation which he may confess to this House. Now, does that make any difference? The gentleman will also notice it is alleged he is practically bound by a treasonable oath, and to-day is confessedly and continuously bound. Does not that act of treason, in continuando, as the lawyers say, that confessed continuation of the offense, make a difference in the gentleman's doctrine?

Mr. POTTER. Why, Mr. Speaker, it is not a question of power I am discussing; because I do not now assert that as regards a Delegate this House has not power to do very much as it may please. Certainly Congress itself may repeal the law by which Territories are represented here at all. And perhaps even this House may have constitutional power to prescribe arbitrary qualifications for a Delegate from a Territory without which we will not let him sit here. But what I am contending for is this: that it is very dangerous for a Congress of men representing here so many various communities to introduce into it the question of imposing as a condition of representation any other qualifications than those prescribed for Representatives by the Constitution. I think if gentlemen have the qualifications which the Constitution prescribes for Representatives in Congress, it will be safer not to inquire either of Representatives or Delegates what may be their moral, social, or political standing, or whether they have or have not offended against the laws, but to leave all that to the judicial department of the Government, which is competent to try and convict every man guilty of offenses against the law.

Mr. SCHUMAKER, of New York. Does my colleague mean that a convicted felon would have any status here? I understood him to say that a constituency of thieves could send a thief. Does he say that a convicted felon has any status?

Mr. POTTER. My colleague, who has been a district attorney, knows of course that a convicted felon has no legal status; but until convicted could he not sit here?

Mr. SCHUMAKER, of New York. Of course.

Mr. POTTER. And I say, of course, too.

Mr. SCHUMAKER, of New York. Does my colleague argue that a constituency of thieves can send a thief here, and that a constituency of bigamists can send a bigamist here?

Mr. POTTER. If a man is a convicted bigamist he cannot sit here.

Mr. SCHUMAKER, of New York. We have here the case of a self-confessed bigamist.

Mr. POTTER. Yes; but that is not the case of a convicted bigamist. The legal difference no one knows better than my colleague.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] a question. If it be alleged against a member, and that allegation is supported by proof, that he has taken an oath which he has never renounced, and which is inconsistent with his duty to the Government of the United States, will the gentleman from New York say that under those circumstances it is not incumbent upon us to order an investigation as to the facts? For that is involved in this question.

Mr. POTTER. I never had much sympathy with any provision for test oaths. I believe they are almost invariably useless and unwise. If this man has been guilty of taking an oath by which he has contracted treasonable relations against the United States, he is liable to be indicted and punished for treason. But I am myself opposed as regards Delegates, assuming we have full discretion as to them, as I am as regards members elected to this Congress, to enter upon an investigation with regard to any man's right to a seat here provided he comes here with the constitutional qualifications—not because I do not feel the same reluctance as other gentlemen to have a man here who is wanting in moral or other personal qualifications, but because it seems to me that in a country so large as this, with so vast a population, having such a variety of population, production, and opinions, nothing is so dangerous as to introduce into the House of Representatives what the fathers intended to exclude from it—the power to discriminate between men as Representatives because of their religion, their habits, their character, or anything outside of their constitutional qualifications.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. I yield for a few minutes to my colleague, [Mr. ELDREDGE.]

Mr. ELDREDGE. The questions presented here will be seen at first sight to be questions of the utmost importance, as all questions are that relate to congressional representation. I do not propose now to discuss the question of this Delegate's qualification. I do not propose to discuss any of his alleged qualifications or disqualifications. But in dealing with them I want to suggest to the House that we are dealing with a very delicate matter. The right of representation is one upon which our institutions are br sed, and upon the full and free right of which our representative system and liberties depend.

I want to say a single word in answer to the gentleman from Massachusetts, who suggested a very interesting question. It was whether one Congress could impose upon another Congress a person as a Delegate from a Territory whom we did not like or whom the existing Congress did not like? Now, I answer, undoubtedly they can. I have no hesitation in saying that when an act of Congress provides that a Delegate from a Territory may be elected and come here with the qualifications prescribed for members of Congress, when he comes here with those qualifications we are not at liberty to reject him because he is a Delegate any more than if a member of the House. This House, let it be remembered, is only one branch of Congress. The law was made by Congress, by the House of Representatives in conjunction with the Senate and the Executive of the Government. It is a law upon our statute-books to-day, and we are not at liberty to disregard that law. If it was a proposition to amend this law or to repeal it, it would be a very different question. But the law exists. Even the resolution of my colleague does not propose to repeal the existing law. And this House of Representatives is just as much bound by a law of Congress as the humblest citizen. We are therefore bound by that as an existing law. And when the question is presented here, as it is to-day, of the right of a Delegate from a Territory, who comes here under an act of Congress asking his seat in this House, and if he comes with the qualifications prescribed by an act of Congress, by the existing law of the land, he has a right to his seat as much as though he were a Representative coming here and claiming his seat under the constitutional qualifications. We have no power legally to refuse him.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND.]

Mr. POLAND. I regret somewhat the position in which this question is presented. This Delegate from Utah came here with regular credentials, and if there be any such thing as credential qualifications of a Delegate, there is no question but what he possesses them. He was allowed to take his seat here upon those credentials, and now occupies it. I regret that this question has been presented in connection with his right to retain his seat. I think that this proceeding is in its nature, and I suppose it was so intended, preliminary to the question whether this House will expel him. I understand that in the testimony before the Committee on Elections there is abundant prima facie evidence that this man is living in open violation of an act of Congress, which declares that for that offense he may be sent to the penitentiary for five years. Is there any man here prepared to say that if that be true it is not a sufficient ground to expel him? A little more than a year ago this whole subject was very largely discussed in this House by a gentleman whom I see near me upon the one side and myself upon the other, and this House by an almost unanimous vote decided that they had jurisdiction over this subject, and they took jurisdiction so far as to pass a severe censure. There is no difference between censure and expulsion as far as the question of jurisdiction is concerned. If the House has jurisdiction to censure, it has jurisdiction to expel.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I think there is a very wide difference. Expulsion would prevent the constituency from having any Representative on this floor, while censure is only the opinion of the House upon the conduct of a Representative, and would neither prevent his voting, or acting, or doing anything else he chooses.

Mr. POLAND. As I have but two minutes, I cannot stop to reply much to what the gentleman has said, and it is no answer to what I said. So far as the question of jurisdiction goes there is no possible difference and none can be made between a sentence, whether it be of censure or expulsion. We have more evidence in this case than was ever presented on which to ground proceedings for expulsion. There is evidence that was taken under oath and reported by the committee, and it is prima facie evidence that this man has been guilty of a penitentiary offense, and if he had been duly tried for that offense, instead of being here he would have been in the penitentiary.

Now, I desire to know if that is not ground which it is proper for the House to notice, and if the fact be established to act upon it? It seems to me that this resolution is substantially a resolution looking in the end to the action of this House on the question whether this man should not be expelled from it if it be found that he has committed, and is continuing to commit, this offense against the law which Congress passed; and it seems to me that it ought to be adopted.

Mr. COBURN. I would ask the gentleman if the same principle as that upon which the resolution rests was not applied in cases after the war when men were charged with being disloyal? They had not been convicted of any crime, but had simply violated the law by rebellion, and were refused seats in Congress for that reason.

Mr. POLAND. In those cases the men who were charged with being disloyal were not allowed to take their seats until the question was settled. In the Fortieth Congress, and in the Forty-first and Forty-second, gentlemen against whom there were charges of disloyalty, and who came here with regular credentials, were not even allowed to take their seats.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I would ask the gentleman from Vermont if he is not a little ashamed of some things which were done during that period in reference to representation on this floor?

Mr. POLAND. It is unnecessary that I should now attempt to justify them.

Mr. SPEER. Was not the gentleman opposed to the action of the House in those cases at the time?

Mr. POLAND. It is unnecessary for me to say whether I was or was not.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CROSSLAND.]

Mr. CROSSLAND. I desire to say a word or two about this matter. The question involved in the resolution of the gentleman from Wisconsin was not referred to the Committee on Elections. That committee has made a thorough investigation of all the matters referred to them by the House, and they have reported their unanimous conclusion in the first and second resolutions which were presented last week. I insist that the committee have not only complied with all the directions of the House, but they have exhausted all the powers conferred on them; and I insist that it is unfair to the committee, to the sitting Delegate, and to the House, that a third resolution should have been interposed by my colleague on the committee from Wisconsin. I insist that the committee was entitled to have the judgment of the House upon their report, and upon the conclusions they arrived at under the authority the House conferred, and in obedience to its directions. If the House should conclude that there are certain practices in Utah that affect the legality of the sitting Delegate's right to his seat, I should not antagonize a resolution proposing to investigate that question. But I do insist that the Committee on Elections ought not to be incumbered with any additional labor, but that if the question is to be investigated at all it ought to be sent to the Committee on the Judiciary, a committee composed, perhaps, of better lawyers than is the Committee on Elections, and who have more time to make an investigation than we have.

As has been said by my colleague from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SPEER,] we have already before us a large number of election cases. There are gentlemen who claim that they have been elected by the people, gentlemen outside who claim that they are entitled to seats by virtue of the votes of a majority of the electors in certain districts, which seats are now held by men who have no right to any voice in this House. I therefore suggest to my colleague from Wisconsin [Mr. HAZELTON] that he withdraw his third resolution, and allow the House to vote upon the first and second resolutions. He can then present his third resolution, referring this question to the Committee on the Judiciary, and let them determine whether or not the sitting member has been guilty of certain practices that affect his eligibility to hold a seat in this House. I ask him to permit the House to act upon and give expression to their affirmation of or disagreement to the report of the committee, because the committee have exhausted all the power which was conferred upon them.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. This whole question is in the control of the House, and I desire the House to do what shall seem best to it.

Mr. CROSSLAND. Let the House dispose first of the report of the committee, and then of the third resolution as an independent matter.

Mr. POTTER. I desire a moment to say, in answer to the authorities cited by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND,] that I do not understand the Credit Mobilier cases to have been decided upon the ground the gentleman says, but the very reverse. I was one of those who voted to censure as a substitute for expulsion, simply because I like others thought that Congress had no authority to expel a member for an offense committed before his election.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, in looking at the parliamentary attitude of these resolutions, sees no difficulty in presenting them so that no parliamentary advantage shall be gained or lost by any gentleman. The Chair will direct that the vote of the House shall be taken upon the resolution of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HARRISON] in the nature of an amendment, and upon the resolution of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HAZELTON] afterward. The House can vote upon those resolutions, and then upon the resolutions reported from the committee; or the votes can be taken in the reverse order, whichever shall be preferable, voting first upon the resolution reported by the committee in regard to Mr. Maxwell, and then upon the resolution in regard to Mr. Cannon.

Mr. SPEER. I suggest that the House vote first upon the resolutions reported from the committee.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. There is no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. Then the first question will be upon the first resolution reported from the committee, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, (1,) That George R. Maxwell was not elected, and is not entitled, to a seat in the House of Representatives of the Forty-third Congress as Delegate for the Territory of Utah.

The resolution was adopted.

The next resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, (2,) That George Q. Cannon was elected and returned as a Delegate for the Territory of Utah to a seat in the Forty-third Congress.

The resolution was adopted.

The next question was upon the resolution moved by Mr. HARRISON, as follows:

Resolved, That George Q. Cannon was duly elected and returned as Delegate from the Territory of Utah, and is entitled to a seat as a Delegate in the Forty-third Congress.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Do I understand that that resolution is to be voted upon as an independent resolution? I supposed it was offered as a substitute for the second resolution of the committee

That second resolution having been adopted, this resolution seems to me to be entirely unnecessary.

The SPEAKER. It presents a proposition entirely different from the second resolution of the committee.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I thought that second resolution, which has been adopted, was that Mr. Cannon was duly elected and returned.

The SPEAKER. But this resolution says "and is entitled to a seat." There is just the same difference presented as there would have been if it was treated as an amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. There is a distinction without much difference.

The SPEAKER. The words "duly elected" are in this resolution, and the additional declaration that "he is entitled to a seat."

Mr. POLAND. Is it anything more——

The SPEAKER. It is not necessary to debate it; the House can dispose of it.

The question was taken upon the resolution of Mr. HARRISON; and upon a division there were—ayes 75, noes 60; no quorum voting.

Mr. MERRIAM called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, there being 33 in the affirmative; more than one-fifth of the last vote.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 109, nays 76, not voting 105; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Barber, Beck, Bell, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bradley, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Buffinton, Benjamin F. Butler, Cain, Caldwell, Cannon, John B. Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Clymer, Stephen A. NOT VOTING—Messrs. Albright, Archer, Banning, Barnum, Barrere, Barry, Bass, Begole, Biery, Roderick R. Butler, Cessna, Clayton, Clinton L. Cobb, Corwin, Cotton, Creamer, Crocker, Curtis, Danford, Davis, Dawes, Dobbins, Elliott, Fort, Garfield, Eugene Hale, Hamilton, Benjamin W. Harris, John T. Harris, Havens, Hays, Hereford, Herndon, Hersey, George F. Hoar, Hodges, Hooper, Hoskins, Hubbell, Hunton, Jewett, Kelley, Killinger, Knapp, Lamar, Lamport, Lansing, Lawrence, Lawson, Lewis, Lofland, Loughridge, Lowe, Marshall, Martin, Maynard, Alexander S. McDill, McLean, McNulta, Mellish, Moore, Myers, Isaac C. Parker, Pelham, Phelps, Phillips, James H. Platt, jr., Poland, Pratt, William R. Roberts, Ross, Rusk, Sessions, Sheats, Sheldon, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloan, Sloss, Smart, H. Boardman Smith, Snyder, Standiford, Stephens, St. John, Storm, Stowell, Strait, Swann, Taylor, Charles R. Thomas, Tremain, Walls, Jasper D. Ward, Wheeler, Whitehouse, Wilber, George Willard, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, William B. Williams, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Wolfe, Woodworth, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—105.

So the resolution of Mr. HARRISON was adopted.

During the roll-call, the following announcements were made:

Mr. WILLIE. My colleague, Mr. MCLEAN, is absent on business. If here he would vote "ay."

Mr. STRAIT. On this question I am paired with the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. PLATT, who if present would vote "ay," while I should vote "no."

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. SPEER moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the preamble and resolution offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. HAZELTON,] which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas George R. Maxwell has prosecuted a contest against the sitting member, George Q. Cannon, now occupying a seat in the Forty-third Congress as Delegate for the Territory of Utah, charging, among other things, that the said Cannon is disqualified from holding, and is unworthy of, a seat on the floor of this House, for the reason that he was at the date of his election, to wit, on the 5th day of August, 1872, and prior thereto had been and still is, openly living and cohabiting with four women as his wives under the pretended sanction of a system of polygamy, which system he notoriously indorses and upholds, against the statute of the United States approved July 1, 1862, which declares the same to be a felony, to the great scandal and disgrace of the people and the Government of the United States, and in abuse of the privilege of representation accorded to said Territory of Utah, and that he has taken and never renounced an oath which is inconsistent with his duties and allegiance to the said Government of the United States; and whereas the evidence in support of such charge has been brought to the official notice of the Committee on Elections: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Elections be, and is hereby, instructed and authorized to investigate said charge, and report the result to the House, and recommend such action on the part of the House as shall seem meet and proper in the premises.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. On this question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. RANDALL. The preamble of this resolution makes certain allegations, in reference to which I would like to ask whether there is any proof of them?

The SPEAKER. That is in the nature of debate, and would require unanimous consent.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to call for the reading of the evidence on this subject.

Mr. MERRIAM. I object to any debate.

Mr. SPEER. The truth of those allegations is denied by the sitting member.

The SPEAKER. These remarks are altogether in the nature of debate.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 137, nays 51, not voting 102; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Ashe, Averill, Barry, Bradley, Buffinton, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Cain, Cannon, Cason, Amos Clark, jr., Clements, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Corwin, Cotton, Crounse, Donnan, Dunnell, Durham, Eames, Field, Fort, Foster, Frye, Gooch, Gunckel, Hagans, Robert S. Hale, Harmer, Harrison, Hatcher, Hathorn, Havens, John B. Hoar, Hodges, Hooper, Howe, Hubbell, Hunton, Hynes, Jewett, Kelley, Killinger, Knapp, Lamar, Lawson, Leach, Lewis, Lofland, Lowe, Marshall, Martin, Maynard, Alexander S. McDill, McLean, Mellish, Myers, Nesmith, O'Neill, Phelps, Phillips, James H. Platt, jr., Randall, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Ross, Sener, Sessions, Sheldon, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloan, Sloss, Smart, George L. Smith, H. Boardman Smith, Snyder, Southard, Standiford, Stephens, St. John, Stone, Storm, Strawbridge, Sypher, Taylor, Charles R. Thomas, Jasper D. Ward, Wheeler, Whitehouse, Whiteley, Wilber, John M. S. Williams, Wilshire, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Woodford, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—102.

So the resolution of Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin, was adopted.

During the roll-call, the following announcements were made:

Mr. SCOFIELD. My colleague, Mr. ROSS, is absent on account of illness. If here he would vote "ay."

Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio. My colleague, Mr. DANFORD, if present would vote "aye." He is detained from the House by sickness in his family.

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. The gentleman from Missouri, Mr. BLAND, is detained from the House by illness.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin, moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was presented by Mr. BABCOCK, one of his secretaries, who also announced that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 1935) for the relief of William J. Scott, late aide-de-camp on the staff of General Spears;

An act (H. R. No. 3093) to relieve David A. Telfair from political disability;

An act (H. R. No. 2206) to grant an American register to the bark Azor;

An act (H. R. No. 1364) to amend the act entitled "An act to regulate the carriage of passengers in steamships and other vessels," approved March 3, 1855;

An act (H. R. No. 1763) to permit Edward Savage, of Minnesota, to enter one quarter-section of the public lands, or any legal subdivision of the same;

An act (H. R. No. 259) for the relief of James W. Glover, postmaster at Oxford, in the State of New York;

An act (H. R. No. 497) granting a pension to William Haffords, of South Yarmouth, Massachusetts;

An act (H. R. No. 814) granting a pension to Olive S. Breed;

An act (H. R. No. 816) granting a pension to Jane La Font;

An act (H. R. No. 1230) granting a pension to Elizabeth W. Prindle, guardian of the minors of Joseph F. Doak, deceased;

An act (H. R. No. 1396) granting a pension to Thomas J. McIntire, of Rowan County, Kentucky;

An act (H. R. No. 1772) for the relief William N. Williams, late a second lieutenant of volunteers;

An act (H. R. No. 1933) to amend the thirty-first section of an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national militia, and for other purpose," approved March 3, 1863;

An act (H. R. No. 1951) granting a pension to Isaac M. Grant;

An act (H. R. No. 2096) granting a pension to James Roach;

An act (H. R. No. 1562) for the relief of Jacob Parmenter, reimbursing him for defending a suit brought against him for an official act;

An act (H. R. No. 2191) in relation to the customs duties on imported fruits;

An act (H. R. No. 3085) to authorize the Secretary of War to furnish copies of certain papers called for by resolution of the House;

An act (H. R. No. 498) to settle the accounts of Captain A. B. Dyer; and

An act (H. R. No. 1331) for the relief of Joab Spencer and James R. Mead, for supplies furnished the Kansas tribe of Indians.

PATENT-RIGHT ARTICLES.

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3344) to regulate the manufacture, use, and sale of patent-right articles, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. NEGLEY. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole, to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1588) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the better security of life on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, and for other purposes."

Mr. SWANN. I rise to move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The bill which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NEGLEY] moves to consider in Committee of the Whole was made a special order for Tuesday, February 24, to be considered in Committee of the Whole under the five-minute rule. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. SWANN] moves that the House proceed in Committee of the Whole with the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill. Before going into Committee of the Whole the House must settle which bill it will take up.

Mr. SWANN. The diplomatic and consular appropriation bill has been awaiting the action of the House for some time. It is very important that it should be disposed of at an early day. The Committee on Appropriations are very desirous to get all the appropriation bills passed through the House as speedily as possible.

The SPEAKER. The bill of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NEGLEY] is to-day the first bill on the Calendar as a special order; but it is competent for the House to set it aside by a majority vote, as it is competent to set aside any bill for the consideration of an appropriation bill. The question must be decided by a majority vote of the House.

Mr. SWANN. I would impress upon the House the great importance of getting through the appropriation bills. I hope my motion will prevail.

Mr. NEGLEY. I appeal to the courtesy of the House to adopt my motion. I have yielded to the convenience of other gentlemen for the last three months, and as I shall be called away next week by very pressing engagements, I sincerely hope the House will agree to my motion. I have shown every indulgence to other gentlemen.

Mr. SWANN. Mr. Speaker, I have the same claim on the courtesy of the House. I very seldom interfere with its business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. SWANN] moves that the bill of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NEGLEY] be laid aside in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of taking up the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill.

The question being taken, the Speaker declared that the ayes appeared to prevail.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to make one remark.

The SPEAKER. This is not a debatable question.

Mr. CONGER. I did not understand how the vote was determined.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a right, of course, to a division.

Mr. CONGER. As to this question of order of business, I wish to say that the bill for the security of life on steam-vessels has been prepared——

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I object to debate.

Mr. CONGER. I do not wish to debate the question; but this bill has been prepared with a great deal of labor——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE] objects to debate.

Mr. CONGER. I believe that the necessities of the business of the House have frequently been made the subject of remark on questions as to the priority of business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will observe that it would confuse the entire business of the House if the settlement, upon going into Committee of the Whole, as to which bill should have precedence were treated as a debatable question.

Mr. CONGER. I do not wish to debate the bill on its merits; but gentlemen here frequently speak on these questions as to the order of business.

The SPEAKER. But always by consent. The Chair would be glad to hear the gentleman, but the gentleman from Iowa objects.

Mr. NEGLEY. I ask a division upon the vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that while it is within the option of the House, when going into Committee of the Whole, at any time to prefer an appropriation bill to a prior special order by a majority vote, yet the bill of the gentleman from Pennsylvania would not thereby lose its place or precedence.

Mr. CONGER. I merely want to say that just at this season of the year, when vessels are being fitted out, it is a matter of very great importance if the House is to act on this bill at all that it should act on it immediately.

Mr. SWANN. No bills before the House are of more importance than the appropriation bills.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. SWANN] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NEGLEY] will act as tellers upon the motion of the gentleman from Maryland.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 74, noes 72.

Mr. NEGLEY. If the gentleman from Indiana and the House will agree to allow my bill to come in immediately after his, I will not consume further time on the question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania proposes that his bill be taken up in Committee of the Whole immediately after the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill. Is there objection?

Mr. COBURN. I object. I want to get up the bill for the reduction of the Army.

The SPEAKER. That bill is not in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COBURN. I am aware of that; but I presume the House would come out of Committee of the Whole immediately after disposing of the diplomatic and consular bill; and then we could take up in the House the bill for the reduction of the Army.

Mr. TYNER. If the bill of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is likely to take up any considerable time, I shall have to object to the proposition.

The SPEAKER. The bill of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is now the first bill in Committee of the Whole as a special order. The Chair will direct the reading of the rule on the subject, so that gentlemen may see the precise attitude of the question.

The Clerk read as follows:

And in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, general appropriation bills, and, in time of war, bills for raising men and money, and bills concerning a treaty of peace, shall be preferred to all other bills, at the discretion of the committee; and when demanded by any member, the question (of consideration) shall first be put in regard to them.—Rule 114. [Existing special orders, however, (being made under a suspension of the rules,) take precedence of all other business.]

The SPEAKER. The bill of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is an existing special order in Committee of the Whole, having been made such under a suspension of the rules; therefore the Committee of the Whole would have no power to set it aside. But the House prior to going into committee can order that the bill be temporarily laid aside. That the House has decided to do by a majority of two votes, the vote as reported by the tellers being ayes 74, noes 72.

Mr. NEGLEY. Is there objection to the arrangement I proposed?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COBURN,] chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, and the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. TYNER,] a member of the Committee on Appropriations, both object.

Mr. NEGLEY. Then I demand a further count.

Mr. COBURN. As the gentleman from Pennsylvania consents that his bill shall come after the diplomatic and consular bill, I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. TYNER,] who has charge of the post-office appropriation bill, objects.

Mr. TYNER. The Chair is right in that understanding.

Mr. NEGLEY. Then I insist on a further count.

Mr. TYNER. I trust I may be allowed a single word. The probability is that the appropriation bill, of which the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. SWANN] has charge, would take up a considerable part of the session of to-day. To-morrow the Committee on Appropriations desire to proceed with the deficiency appropriation bill, and immediately after that bill shall have been concluded the committee wish to take up the post-office appropriation bill. The committee deem it their duty to urge on the House the necessity of continuing the consideration of these bills one after another as rapidly as possible.

Mr. NEGLEY. I will insist on a further count, unless the House will kindly consent to an evening session for the consideration of this bill.

Several MEMBERS. O, no.

The SPEAKER. A further count must be by yeas and nays.

Mr. NEGLEY. Then I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CONGER. I raise this point of order, that the question of consideration cannot be raised upon two bills at the same time. It has been raised upon the steamboat bill, in favor of the bill proposed by the gentleman from Maryland.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. TYNER] was not raising the question except conversationally as to what might be done hereafter. It cannot be raised for more than one bill at a time; but when raised for a particular bill it applies to that bill, no matter how long it may be in committee. In other words, if the House votes to-day to lay aside the bill of the gentleman from Pennsylvania in order to give a preference to the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill, that laying aside will operate until that appropriation bill is disposed of.

Mr. CONGER. And then the committee could not take up any other bill prior to this one?

The SPEAKER. That could not be done in committee; but the committee could rise and the House could make the order.

Mr. NEGLEY. I ask to have the last count corrected by the tellers again taking their places. Several gentlemen have told me that they voted under a misapprehension.

The SPEAKER. That requires unanimous consent. Is there objection to allowing this question to be settled by a recount by the tellers.

Several members objected.

Mr. SENER. Then let us have the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. There is no other mode of settling it except by the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires that gentlemen may distinctly understand the position of business; and if members will give attention he will explain it. The bill from the Committee on Commerce, of which the gentleman from Pennsylvania has charge, is now a special order of prior date to any appropriation bill remaining in Committee of the Whole. Therefore if the House goes into committee without any special designation of its business, that bill of necessity comes up first. But it is competent for a majority of the House to order that that bill be laid aside and that the next appropriation bill or any other appropriation bill named shall be taken up instead. It is now to be determined by a yea and nay vote whether the House will direct the bill to be laid aside for the purpose of taking up the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I think an arrangement can be made that will save time. I do not think the diplomatic appropriation bill will take more than two or three hours.

Mr. SPEER. The steamboat bill will not take that long.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. The deficiency bill will probably be concluded in another half-day.

Several members objected to debate.

The SPEAKER. Debate is objected to. The question must be taken.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 62, nays 101, not voting 127; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ashe, Atkins, Barber, Beck, Blount, Bowen, Buffinton, Burchard, Caldwell, Cannon, Cook, Corwin, Crounse, Donnan, Dunnell, Durham, Eden, Eldredge, Field, Foster, Freeman, Gooch, Robert S. So the motion of Mr. SWANN to lay aside in Committee of the Whole the bill (H. R. No. 1588) was not agreed to.

SECURITY OF LIFE ON STEAM-VESSELS.

Mr. NEGLEY. I renew the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the House has already directed that the bill of the gentleman from Pennsylvania be considered in Committee of the Whole under the five-minute rule; so that no general debate whatever will be allowed. As soon as the House resolves itself into Committee of the Whole, the bill will be read for amendment.

The motion of Mr. NEGLEY was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. PARKER, of Missouri, in the chair,) and proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1588) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the better security of life on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, and for other purposes."

Mr. NEGLEY. I move that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. That order has already been made by the House. The bill will now be read by paragraphs for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. That every steamer shall be provided with wire tiller-ropes, or iron rods or chains, for the purpose of steering and navigating the vessel, and shall employ wire bell-pulls for signaling the engineer from the pilot-house, together with tubes of proper size so arranged as to return the sound of the engine-bells to the pilot-house, or other arrangement to repeat back the signal: Provided, That on any such vessel, navigated by the mariners' compass, so much of such wire rope or chain may be dispensed with and disused as shall influence or disturb the working of such compass; and on all steamers the steering apparatus shall be so arranged, when operated by a steering wheel, that the top or upper side of the wheel shall be moved in the direction toward which the course of the steamer is to be changed.

Mr. NEGLEY. It has been found by examination this interferes with the steering apparatus of some vessels now in use. I therefore move the following amendment:

After the letter "a" in line 12 insert the word "vertical," so it will read, "a vertical steering-wheel" and after the word "wheel" insert "set athwart ship."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. There is another amendment; after the word "wheel" insert "or if a horizontal wheel be used on the forward side of the wheel."

Mr. NEGLEY. I have already sent that amendment up.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 11. That upon the passage of this act the offices of all local inspectors who have not the qualifications prescribed in this act shall be deemed vacated, and that when any vacancy shall occur in any local board of inspectors now existing, or whenever local inspectors are to be appointed for a new district, the supervising inspector shall notify the collector or other chief officer of the customs for the district, and the judge of the district court of the United States for the district in which such appointment is to be made, who, together with the supervising inspector, shall meet together as a board of designators; and it shall be the duty of such board, or the major part thereof, one of which majority shall be the supervising inspector, when designating an inspector of hulls, to select a person of good character and suitable qualifications and attainments, to perform the services required of him by this act, who, from his practical knowledge of ship-building and navigation and the uses of steam in navigation, shall be fully competent to make a reliable estimate of the strength, seaworthiness, and other qualities of the hulls of steamers and their equipment deemed essential to safety of life in the navigation of such vessel, to be called the inspector of hulls; and when designating an inspector of boilers, to select a person of good character and suitable qualifications and attainments to perform the services required of him by this act, who, from his knowledge and experience of the duties of an engineer employed in navigating vessels by steam, and also in the construction and use of boilers, and machinery, and appurtenances therewith connected, shall be able to form a reliable opinion of the strength, form, workmanship, and suitableness of such boilers and machinery to be employed without hazard to life, from imperfection in the material, workmanship, or arrangement of any part of such apparatus for steaming, to be called the inspector of boilers; and these two persons, when approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall, from the date of designation, constitute a board of local inspectors, and shall be empowered and required to perform the duties herein specified, to wit:

First. Upon application in writing of the master or owner they shall, once in every year at least, carefully inspect the hull of each steamer within their respective districts, and shall satisfy themselves that every such vessel so submitted to their inspection is of a structure suitable for the service in which she is to be employed, has suitable accommodations for passengers, if the same be carried, and the crew, and is in a condition to warrant the belief that she may be used in navigation as a steamer, with safety to life, and that all the requirements of law in regard to fires, boats, pumps, hose, life-preservers, floats, anchors, and cables are faithfully complied with; and if they deem it expedient, they may direct the vessel to be put in motion, and may adopt any other suitable means to test her sufficiency and that of her equipment.

Secondly. They shall also inspect the boilers of all steamers before the same shall be used, and once at least in every year thereafter, subjecting them to the hydrostatic pressure prescribed by this act, and satisfy themselves by thorough examination that the boilers are well made, of good and suitable material; that the openings for the passage of water and steam respectively, and all pipes and tubes exposed to heat are of proper dimensions and free from obstruction; that the spaces between and around the flues are sufficient, and that the flues are circular in form, and the fire-line of the furnace is at least two inches below the prescribed minimum water-line of the boilers; and that the arrangement for delivering the feed-water is such that the boilers cannot be injured thereby; and that such boilers, and the machinery, and the appurtenances, may be safely employed in the service proposed in the written application without peril to life; and shall also satisfy themselves that the safety-valves are of suitable dimensions, sufficient in number, and well arranged; and that the weights of the safety-valves are properly adjusted, so as to relieve the boiler at the pressure prescribed by the inspectors' certificate; that there is a sufficient number of gauge-cocks properly inserted; and to indicate the pressure of steam, reliable and approved steam-gauges, one of which is to be placed in each fire-room and one in the engine-room, and which shall at all times be subject to the inspection of passengers; and reliable water-gauges, and a suitable steam-whistle; and that fusible metals are properly inserted, except on sea-going steamers, and steamers on the great lakes, so as to fuse by the heat of the furnace when the water in the boilers shall fall below its prescribed limits; and that adequate and certain provision is made for an ample supply of water to feed the boilers at all times, whether such vessel is in motion or not, so that in all boilers the water shall not be less than three inches above the top of the flues; and also that means of blowing out are provided so as to, so far as practicable, thoroughly remove the mud and sediment from all parts of the boilers when they are under pressure of steam: Provided, however, That no kind of instrument, machine, or equipment, for the better security of life, provided for by this act, shall be used on any vessel carrying passengers which shall be disapproved by the board of supervising inspectors.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move in line 69 to strike out the word "the" before "safety-valves," and insert after "are" these words: "of the best kind and construction;" so it will read "and shall also satisfy themselves that safety-valves are of the best kind and construction and of suitable dimensions, sufficient in number, and well arranged."

Mr. NEGLEY. I have no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GOOCH. I move in lines 72 and 73 to strike out these words: "adjusted so as to relieve the boiler at the pressure prescribed by the inspectors' certificate," and in lieu thereof to insert "adjusted so as to allow no greater pressure in the boilers than the amount prescribed by the inspectors' certificate."

Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment for this reason: The language of the law of 1871 is changed in that particular and the language in this bill is not so good as that of the law of 1871. I understand that a boiler may be relieved by the action of the valve, but at the same time not relieved to so great an extent as to overcome the amount of steam which is being generated, and therefore though there should be a literal compliance with this statute there might be a tax upon the boiler beyond that which is contemplated by the law and beyond that which can be permitted if the law of 1871 is complied with.

Under these circumstances it seems to me very strange that phraseology should be changed, and I do not believe this committee will consent to the change unless the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NEGLEY] having charge of the bill can show the House some good reason why the language of the law of 1871 should be changed.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that the amendment be again read.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. NEGLEY. The Clerk I think has not read the lines as they are in the bill. The new bill reads "so as to allow no greater pressure in the boiler."

Mr. GOOCH. The language in the bill is: "adjusted so as to relieve the boiler at the pressure prescribed by the inspectors' certificate."

Mr. NEGLEY. I understand the objection of the gentleman from Massachusetts would be applicable if the committee had not in a previous section enlarged the openings in the valves to meet the very requirements the gentleman speaks of. His objection does not lie against the restriction of the phraseology here, as it would if we had not enlarged the valves and provided amply for the escape of steam.

Mr. GOOCH. I should like to ask the gentleman a question. Does he propose under this bill to allow no greater pressure in the boilers than the amount prescribed by the inspectors' certificate?

Mr. NEGLEY. We do not propose to allow any greater pressure.

Mr. GOOCH. Why not say, then, there shall be no greater pressure there?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Either it means the same thing or it does not; and if it does not mean the same thing, it should be made to mean it.

Mr. CONGER. As it reads "so as to relieve the pressure," it relates to the action of the valves. Now the valve has no power to allow or disallow. But these are to be adjusted so that they shall relieve the boiler at the pressure prescribed. But you cannot adjust a valve so that it shall allow only a certain pressure.

Mr. GOOCH. You can. It is said that one cause of the disaster to the Westfield was the fact that the rise of the valve was not sufficient to relieve the boiler. You must have your valve of such size and so adjusted as not to permit a greater pressure on the boiler than the amount allowed by the inspector's certificate. If my amendment, which retains the language of the present law, is adopted and properly enforced, we shall then get the protection which we seek by this legislation.

Mr. CONGER. Another part of the bill is intended to provide, and does provide, for the size of the valves, and meets the objection of the gentleman from Massachusetts. This refers only to the mode of adjustment. It provides that that adjustment shall be in such a manner that it will relieve the pressure. That is all the safety-valve is good for. It has no power to control the steam in any other way; but we have provided elsewhere that the valve shall be of a sufficient size; and here we provide that its adjustment shall be such that it will relieve the pressure.

Mr. GOOCH. Would it injure the bill at all if it had two safety clauses in it, instead of one?

Mr. CONGER. If the gentleman will examine the two lines preceding those which he proposes to amend, I think he will see that they meet his objection. It is provided that the inspectors—

Shall also satisfy themselves that the safty-valves are of suitable dimensions, sufficient in number, and well arranged; and that the weights of the safety-valves are properly adjusted, so as to relieve, &c.

I think myself that it is perhaps immaterial, but I prefer the words as they stand.

Mr. GOOCH. Then if it is immaterial, let us have the language of the old law.

Mr. CONGER. If it is immaterial, let us have the language which the committee after careful consideration thought was the better.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I take issue with my friend from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] in regard to the language of the amendment. I should do it with a great deal of reluctance and doubt were I not fortified by the fact that the language of the amendment is exactly the language of the old law in the bill which the gentleman himself reported to the House and got passed through, and the language of which, therefore, I know must be exactly appropriate and correct.

The objection of the gentleman now is that a safety-valve cannot be properly adjusted so as to allow no greater pressure than is prescribed. But in 1871 his bill contained these words:

That the weights of the safety-valves be properly adjusted, so as to allow no greater pressure on the boiler than the amount prescribed by the inspector's certificate.

That is just what I want now; not that it shall be so adjusted as to relieve the boiler, but that it shall not under any circumstances allow greater pressure on the boiler than prescribed by the certificate. In that case you could not blow up a boiler. The difference is this: It is proposed here that the safety-valves shall be so adjusted as to relieve the boiler; but it is imperative now on the steamboat owner under the present law to see that there cannot be a greater pressure, under any circumstances, than that prescribed by the inspector's certificate. But suppose I am wrong, yet if there is a doubt on the subject, is it not best to have the benefit of the doubt on the side of safety? I think that is the question.

Here the committee informally rose, and Mr. SWANN took the chair as Speaker pro tempore to receive a MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. No. 2989) to authorize the trustees of the Massachusetts Museum of Fine Arts to import and retain for two years certain works of art free of duty.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 272) for the relief of Bishop & Co., bankers, of Honolulu, Hawaiian Islands, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a resolution, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, instructing the Committees on Public Buildings and Grounds to designate upon the Capitol grounds a site for an equestrian statue of Nathaniel Greene, in conformity with the resolution of the Continental Congress of the 8th of August, 1786.

SECURITY OF LIFE, ETC., ON STEAMBOATS.

Mr. CONGER. I move to strike out the last word.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] pays me too high a tribute when he supposes that my efforts in connection with the old law must necessarily have been perfect. At that time, Mr. Chairman, I was a new member of this House. I had not then had the advantage of the knowledge and experience and observation of my friend from Massachusetts, which I have treasured upon all the practical questions so carefully, and which have assisted me to a better use of language, because we all come here to a better use of language after listening to the correct language of my friend from Massachusetts.

It is believed by the committee that the language used in this bill is the proper language to be used. They have corrected the errors of the old law, and I think properly; but it is not very material. I would rather encounter my friend from Massachusetts on some question which is of some earthly consequence, and which would properly draw forth his powers. I do not care whether the amendment is adopted or not.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Then let us have our way about it.

The question was taken on Mr. GOOCH's amendment, and it was agreed to.

The Clerk read the twentieth section, as follows:

SEC. 20. That whenever any board of local inspectors refuse to grant a license to any person applying for the same, or shall suspend or revoke the license of any captain, mate, engineer, or pilot, any person deeming himself wronged by such refusal, suspension, or revocation may, within thirty days thereof, on application to the supervising inspector of the district, have his case examined anew by such supervising inspector, and the local board shall furnish to the supervising inspector, in writing, the reasons for their doings in the premises; and such supervising inspector shall examine the case anew, and he shall have the same powers to summon witnesses and compel their attendance, and to administer oaths, that are conferred on the local inspectors by the terms of this act; and such witnesses and the marshal shall be paid in the same manner as hereinbefore provided for; and such supervising inspector may revoke, change, or modify the decision of such local board; and like proceedings may be had by any master or owner of any steam-vessel in relation to the inspection of such vessel, or her boilers or her machinery, by any such local board; and in case of repairs, and in any investigation or inspection where there shall be a disagreement between the local inspectors, the supervising inspector, when so requested, shall investigate and decide the case.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I move to amend that section by striking out all after the word "machinery," in the nineteenth line, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

Any person feeling himself aggrieved may within ten days after the decision of the supervising inspector apply to the supervising inspector-general for a review of the case. The appellant shall at the same time notify the supervising inspector, who shall thereupon transmit without delay to the supervising inspector-general a certified copy of all testimony and evidence before him in the case, setting forth the reasons for his action in the premises. The supervising inspector-general shall thereupon examine the testimony and proceedings in the case, and may revise, modify, confirm, or annul the action of the supervising inspector.

Mr. NEGLEY. I have no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the twenty-third section, as follows:

SEC. 23. That in order to carry this act fully into execution the ten supervising inspectors now in office shall continue in commission; and whenever a vacancy occurs, from death, resignation, or removal, the President of the United States shall, with the advice and consent of the Senate, fill the vacancy by appointing a successor, who shall be selected for his knowledge, skill, and practical experience in the uses of steam for navigation, and who is a competent judge of the character and qualities of steam-vessels, and of all parts of the machinery employed in steaming. The said inspector-general and the supervising inspectors shall assemble together as a board, once in each year at least, and at such other times and places as the interests of the service may require, and the Secretary of the Treasury shall direct, for joint consultation, which meetings shall be open to all interested, and shall assign to each of the supervising inspectors, respectively, the limits of territory within which he shall perform his duties; and the said board shall establish all necessary rules and regulations required to carry out in the most effective and economical manner the provisions of this act for the safety of life; also rules and regulations for their own government and that of the several boards of local inspectors in the performance of their official duties: Provided, however, That the supervising inspector for the district embracing the Pacific coast shall not be under obligation to attend the meetings of the board unless the exigencies of the service require it; and when he does not attend such meetings, he shall make his communications thereto, in the way of a report, in such manner as the board shall prescribe. The supervising inspector-general now in office shall continue in commission, and whenever a vacancy shall occur from death, resignation, or removal, the President of the United States shall, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, fill the vacancy by appointing a successor, who shall be selected with reference to his practical knowledge of steam navigation and his fitness and ability to systematize and carry into effect all the provisions of law relating to the steamboat-inspection service, whose duty it shall be, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, to superintend the administration of the steamboat-inspection laws, preside at the meetings of the board of supervising inspectors, receive all reports of inspectors, and receive and examine all accounts of such officers, report fully at stated periods to the Secretary of the Treasury upon all matters pertaining to his official duties, and produce a correct and uniform administration of the inspection laws, rules, and regulations; and the said supervising inspector-general shall be paid for his services at the rate of $3,500 per annum, and all his reasonable traveling expenses, or milage at the rate of ten cents per mile, when on official duty.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I move to amend that section by striking out all after the word "steaming," in line 10, down to and including the word "consultation," in line 15, as follows:

The said inspector-general and the supervising inspectors shall assemble together as a board once in each year at least, and at such other times and places as the interests of the service may require and the Secretary of the Treasury shall direct, for joint consultation.

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the supervising inspector-general with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may, in their discretion, require the supervising inspectors to assemble together as a board in the city of Washington at such times after the close of the fiscal year as they may designate, for consultation and report and for the consideration of such matters relating to the execution of this act as the supervising inspector-general with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury may deem proper to lay before them.

I believe there is no objection to that amendment.

Mr. NEGLEY. I see no objection to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POTTER. I move further to amend that section by striking out, in line 48, "$3,500," and inserting in lieu thereof "$6,000" for the salary of the inspector-general. I wish to say to the House that the inspector-general is not paid from the Treasury at all. He is paid from the fees received from licenses and other matters connected with this service, and the amount derived from these sources more than suffices to pay his salary and that of the other inspectors. These fees were arranged with the view of paying the salaries, but they amount to more than enough for the salary at the present rate. The inspector-general has to go to every part of the United States. He has had to give up his own business and reside here when not traveling. He must be a man of first-rate experience and qualifications. It seems to me, therefore, that he ought to have, and especially as there is a fund on hand out of which to pay him, a larger salary than that now provided by law, and I suggest that for a fit man the sum I propose is not too much. I am satisfied that a thoroughly competent man cannot be got for a less sum, and I trust there will be no objection to the amendment.

Mr. CONGER. It is true the commerce of the country and the navigation interest pay by fees the expenses and salaries of these officers. I think myself that their compensation ought to be sufficient to command the very highest talent and ability in this direction, but I think the sum named by the gentleman from New York is higher than I should be willing to vote for. If he will propose to make it $5,000 a year I will not object. That sum seems to have been the judgment of those most interested in the matter.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I propose to offer that as an amendment.

Mr. CONGER. That seems to have been the judgment of the steamboat men, and I should have no objection to fixing the salary at $5,000.

Mr. NEGLEY. I will agree to the amendment if the gentleman will make the sum $5,000.

Mr. POTTER. I will not detain the committee by insisting on $6,000 if the gentleman from Pennsylvania will agree to $5,000. I happen to know about this officer, because he is a constituent of mine, and the only one of my constituents who holds a public office. He is an exceedingly competent man, and gave up a much more valuable business than this in order to accept the position, and when it was suggested to me to offer this amendment it gave me great pleasure to do it.

Mr. CONGER. I know that he is an excellent officer.

Mr. POTTER. I will modify my amendment so as to make the salary $5,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to oppose the amendment. I am very much surprised that the gentleman in charge of this bill [Mr. NEGLEY] should have consented to this amendment or acquiesced in it. Neither the sub-committee nor the Committee on Commerce have recommended any such change in this bill. The salary fixed by the bill now is ample, $3,500 a year and ten cents per mile for traveling expenses. In this instance, as in all others, this disposition to increase salaries beyond what is absolutely necessary to secure competent talent displays itself. I am surprised that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NEGLEY] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] should consent to allow advantage to be taken of a bill like this to increase a salary. In my judgment it is an unwarrantable and unreasonable thing. The salary of this officer should be no higher and no less because the commerce of the country provides the means to pay it.

You cannot secure proper talent simply by paying high salaries. Here as everywhere else is displayed the determination that Federal salaries shall be increased. It seems impossible to get a bill before Congress without an effort being made to get a higher grade of salaries than those we have been accustomed to pay heretofore. Here is an office connected with an important industrial pursuit of the country—with the commercial interests of the country. While every interest is suffering from heavy taxation, while every tax-payer in the country is feeling the weight of salaries already piled upon his shoulder, a proposition is made to increase this salary beyond what it has been before. The country does not require this to be done. Gentlemen of the same class of talent and ability and integrity will hold this office at a salary of $3,500 a year that would take it if you fix the salary at $5,000. Our experience has always demonstrated that an increase of salary neither secures increase of ability nor superior integrity of character. The very best places held in this country have always been held upon moderate salaries, such as correspond in some degree with the salaries paid in ordinary employments in our civil pursuits.

I object that this bill should be taken advantage of for the purpose of fixing a high salary, for the purpose of fixing this salary at $5,000, when a gentleman of equal capacity, of equal integrity, and equal experience can be secured at $3,500. Gentlemen must be aware that one of the crying evils of this period is the attempt everywhere to create an ungodly cupidity in public office and in public affairs; and that the country is demanding, not an increase of salaries, but a reduction of them. I would like to see gentlemen go before the country and talk about retrenchment and reform, after voting, whenever a bill came before this House in which a salary was involved, to increase it above what we have paid heretofore. We are paying $14,000,000 more now in the form of salaries than ought to be paid by the people of this country. We are paying $34,000,000 for salaries when $20,000,000 is a sum ample to meet all the salaries that should be paid by the people of this country.

Mr. CONGER. I move to amend by striking out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I have heard the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and the committee have heard him almost for the first time on this subject. The novelty of his argument has startled me. Why does the gentleman argue as he does, when he has heard the executive committee of steamboat-men, men representing the steamboat interests of this country from Maine to Georgia, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, urging before our committee an increase of this salary, a salary which they themselves pay in fees, urging this committee to increase the salary of the supervising inspector so that they might have the best talent in the country at the head of an office that supervises the entire navigation interests of the country? My friend has sat there in the Committee on Commerce for the last three years and heard the executive committee of the steamboat owners of this country urging upon the Committee on Commerce to increase this salary, telling us that they paid the fees and that they had a right to indicate what salary should be paid to the officer, in order that they might demand the best talent to fulfill its duties. Is it necessary in such a case as this that the old cry should be repeated here on this bill as on every other bill?

The very men who pay the taxes demand this increase, and the Committee on Commerce are willing to accede to their demand. They have the right, of all other men in the country, they who pay the taxes have the right to secure the selection of the proper person by fixing a salary which will secure proper services in this position.

The gentleman knows as well as I do that men have refused to accept this office, have refused to serve as inspector-general during the last three years because the salary was not sufficient; that good men have resigned the place and refused to continue to serve because they could not leave their other business for the salary given for this office. Now, when we have at length secured the services of as good a man as we ever had in that place, and have induced him to remain in the office in the expectation that his salary would be increased, what objection can there be to increasing it? It is not a question of reduction of salaries that are now too large or that are improper; it is a question of giving a sufficient salary to a man who, by the law which has just been read, is required to be above other men in qualifications for this office.

Mr. NEGLEY. I think the committee understand this subject, and I hope a vote will now be taken.

Mr. POTTER. I rise to oppose the amendment to the amendment. I recognize, as every other gentleman must who has served so long in the House, the fidelity of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] on the question of reducing salaries. I am myself a thorough State-rights democrat, but on the subject of salaries I have not the same feelings as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has. My experience has taught me that in private life if you want good service you must, as a general rule, pay a fair price for it, and I frankly avow it where everybody may hear it that I have often voted to increase Federal salaries, for I believe that in order to get fit service you must make something like fit payment. In every branch of life where ordinary private business is carried on it is found in order to get fit service men must pay fit prices. If you do not you have the alternative of unworthy men or men who will make up their pay out of their place by peculation and theft.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Sound price, sound goods.

Mr. POTTER. As the gentleman from Massachusetts says, sound price, sound goods; and the law which is true of goods is true of labor. If you want decent service you must pay a decent price for it. Therefore I have uniformly voted, since I have been in the House, whether salaries of judges or salaries of other employés, to give a fair day's payment for a fair day's service, but not more.

Now, what is the fact about this man? He was a steamboat proprietor in very large business and gave up a great work to come here. He will not stay for the price named here, and therefore the committee have been applied to by the steamboat-owners, who pay the money out of which his salary is to be paid—for it does not come out of the public Treasury at all—to increase the salary in order that a competent inspector-general, as he has proved himself, may be obtained, because it is alike to the interest of the public and to the interest of the men who run steamboats that the man in this important supervising position should be competent for his duties. So far from being good economy, in my judgment it will be the worst economy if we drive a competent man from this place and put in his place an inferior and subordinate man willing to work at less price.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend by striking out "five" and inserting "three." Now, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] did not deem it necessary a few years ago that these salaries should be $5,000, and I do not know what has occurred in the last two or three years to justify this increase of salary. I would be glad to hear from the gentleman from Michigan how it has occurred.

Mr. CONGER. I will tell the gentleman. It is because it is found this salary will not command the service of such a man as should be appointed to the office. As the gentleman knows, there has been resignation after resignation and failure to get good officers. That is the reason why I think the salary should be increased.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does the gentleman anticipate the present incumbent will go out of office if we leave the salary as it is? I do not think the gentleman anticipates that.

Now, the gentleman referred to by the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] holds the office now at the present salary. There is just where the evil and pernicious character of our legislation on the subject of salaries is to be found. Some gentleman happens to hold office who has friends here on this floor and at the other end of the Capitol and his salary is run up upon the ground of personal friendship, instead of adhering to the rule, a severe and rigid regard for the public concern. The other day the House was almost humiliated by the spectacle when we were told that we must increase a salary which had been paid to compentent officers during the whole war, or the present incumbent would go out of office. Are we to be told in a country of forty million people men cannot be found to hold this office at the price fixed?

Mr. CONGER. Men worthy of the place.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman holding this office heretofore still holds it. He has not resigned. This man has been holding his office for some time. He performs the duties of his office very well. On the strength of this we are told his salary must be increased.

Now my friend from Michigan says some committee has been here asking this salary be increased. Who was that committee? The gentleman knows very well it was not a committee of men who pay the tax—not the men who pay these salaries. On the contrary, it is a committee of a chamber of commerce or some organization of that kind who are everlastingly in favor of increasing salaries. It is not a committee of pilots and engineers and men who for twelve or fifteen hundred dollars perform the most laborious and faithful services to commerce. They are not the men who ask that these salaries should be increased.

Mr. CONGER. I refer to the executive committee of the Steamboat Association, comprising all the steamboat owners in the United States.

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir. They are not laboring men—not in a single solitary instance. I have seen all these gentlemen to whom my friend refers. I have heard them before the Committee on Commerce. They are not the laboring men who pay the taxes.

Talk, sir, of the laboring men insisting on high salaries! Why, sir, the cry is that the salaries should be reduced. While gentlemen here are laying the foundations for an increase of salary in every Department of the Government there is no petition here demanding that increase. Up to this hour I have never heard the voice of the laboring people of the country demanding an increase of salary. I have seen committees of gentlemen who are not engaged in laborious occupations, who do not pay the taxes—I have seen committees of such men here in the interest of increasing salaries. But no township meeting, no cross-road meeting, no township convention of any party in this country, or any other combination of the people of this country have ever asked Congress to increase these salaries. During the war, in time of great inflation, these positions were held by competent men, and now when we are coming down to a specie basis I protest against the salaries being increased.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question being taken on Mr. POTTER's amendment, as modified, to strike out "$3,500" and insert "$5,000," there were—ayes 44, noes 22; no quorum voting.

Mr. HOLMAN. I shall not consent to any increase of a salary here without a quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum not having voted the Chair will order tellers, and appoints the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. NEGLEY, and the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. HOLMAN.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 64, noes 63.

The CHAIRMAN. As a quorum has not voted the Chair directs the roll to be called, that the names of the absentees may be reported to the House.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, when the following-named gentlemen failed to answer to their names:

Messrs. Archer, Averill, Banning, Barnum, Barrere, Barry, Bass, Begole, Biery, Bland, Bundy, Cain, Cessna, John B. Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Clayton, Clinton L. Cobb, Cook, Cotton, Creamer, Crittenden, Crocker, Crooke, Crossland, Curtis, Danford, Darrall, Davis, Dawes, DeWitt, Dobbins, Duell, Eden, Elliott, Farwell, Freeman, Garfield, Hagans, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Hale, Hamilton, Benjamin W. Harris, John T. Harris, Havens, Hays, Gerry W. Hazelton, Hereford, Herndon, Hersey, George F. Hoar, Hodges, Hooper, Hoskins, Hubbell, Hunton, Jewett, Kelley, Killinger, Knapp, Lamison, Lansing, Lawson, Lewis, Lofland, Loughridge, Lowe, Luttrell, Marshall, Martin, Maynard, Alexander S. McDill, McJunkin, Mellish, Milliken, Mitchell, Myers, Nesmith, Niles, O'Brien, Orr, Page, Thomas C. Platt, Purman, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Ross, John G. Schumaker, Sheldon, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloss, Smart, George L. Smith, H. Boardman Smith, J. Ambler Smith, Sprague, Standiford, Starkweather, Stephens, St. John, Storm, Taylor, Charles R. Thomas, Christopher Y. Thomas, Thornburgh, Waddell, Jasper D. Ward, Wheeler, Whitehouse, Whitley, Wilber, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, Wilshire, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Wolfe, Woodford, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—119.

The committee rose, and Mr. PARKER, of Missouri, reported that the Committee of the Whole having had under consideration the bill to amend the act providing for the better security of life on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, and on a division finding itself without a quorum, he had caused the roll to be called, and now reported the names of the absentees to the House.

The SPEAKER. The roll-call shows the presence of 171 members and the absence of 119. There being a quorum, the Committee of the Whole will resume its session.

The committee accordingly resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The tellers will take their places, and the committee will vote on the question which was pending before the roll was called. The Clerk will report again the pending amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In section 23, line 48, strike out "$3,500" and insert "$5,000;" so that it will read: And the said supervising inspector-general shall be paid for his services at the rate of $5,000 per annum, &c.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 65, noes 82.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill. When section 29 was reached,

Mr. NEGLEY said: This section embodies the rules adopted by the board of supervising inspectors in regard to vessels meeting and passing each other. They are the rules now in use, and are the code of rules of England and of the maritime powers of the world generally. I ask that the reading of that section be dispensed with.

There was no objection; and the reading of the section was dispensed with.

Mr. WOOD. I move that the committee do now rise. I think we are all tired.

The question being taken on the motion that the committee rise, it was not agreed to.

The Clerk read section 36, as follows:

SEC. 36. That iron or steel plates to be used in the construction of steamboat boilers shall be inspected, and may be tested in such manner as shall be prescribed by the board of supervising inspectors and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, and no iron or steel plates shall be used in the construction of such boilers which have been found to be imperfect, rejected, or disapproved.

Mr. POTTER. I offer the following amendment:

In lines 2 and 3, strike out the words "may be tested" and insert the words "tested by the manufacturer and at his expense;" so that it will read: Shall be inspected and tested by the manufacturer and at his expense, in such manner as shall be provided by the board of supervising inspectors, &c.

The manufacturer has got all the machinery for testing at his works, and I think there can be no objection to this.

Mr. NEGLEY. There is no objection to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 41. That all steamers navigating the ocean, lakes, bays, inlets, sounds, rivers, harbors, or other navigable waters of the United States, when such waters are common highways of commerce, or open to general or competitive navigation, shall be subject to the provisions of this act with respect to inspection, construction, or equipment: Provided, That the same shall not apply to public vessels of the United States or of other countries.

Mr. NEGLEY. I move to amend that section by inserting after the word "vessels" where it occurs in the proviso the word "either;" so that it will read:

Provided, That the same shall not apply to public vessels either of the United States or of other countries.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the forty-third section, as follows:

SEC. 43. That the provisions and limitations of the act entitled "An act to limit the liability of ship-owners, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1851, are hereby extended and applied to all vessels required to be inspected by this act, and the owner or owners, charterer or charterers, officers and mariners thereof, and shall have the same force and effect as to such vessels, owner or owners, charterer or charterers, officers and mariners, respectively, as such provisions and limitations now have as to the ships or vessels, owner or owners, charterer or charterers, officers and mariners, respectively, to which or to whom the said act now applies; and such provisions and limitations are also extended and applied to all claims for loss of life or personal injury, both as against the owner or owners, charterer or charterers of the vessel, and the captain, mate, engineer, and pilot thereof.

Mr. GOOCH. I move to strike out that section; and I do it for the purpose of asking the attention of the committee to its peculiarity. I do not see so far any provision, excepting that which is contained in this section, for any redress in case of the loss of life or injury to person from the owner or charterer of one of these vesels. I would like to ask the gentleman who has the bill in charge if there is any, and if there is, I will ask him to point it out to me.

Mr. NEGLEY. This provision simply extends to the interior waters of the United States the law of 1851, which now applies to the ocean and the great lakes. It simply extends that provision to the interior waters, and I see no reason why that justice should not be accorded to that interest.

Mr. GOOCH. I understand the act of 1851 not to provide in terms any redress in case of loss of life or injury to the person.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to say to the gentleman that it includes more than that. All that part of the section following the word "applies," in line 12, is new, and was not part of the act of 1851.

Mr. POTTER. I understand that this section not only applies the act of 1851 to the interior waters, but goes further than that.

Mr. CONGER. I shall move to strike out that portion of the section to which I refer, and it is as follows:

And such provisions and limitations are also extended and applied to all claims for loss of life, or personal injury, both as against the owner or owners, charterer or charterers of the vessel, and the captain, mate, engineer, and pilot thereof.

Mr. GOOCH. Then what provision is there in this bill for redress for personal injuries?

Mr. CONGER. There is the usual liability at common law and by statute. I do not propose in this bill to make any limitations as to the liability for the loss of life.

Mr. GOOCH. Do you propose by this act to repeal the forty-third section of the act of 1871, or to leave it still in force? Do I understand your bill to repeal it or to leave it in force?

Mr. CONGER. The amendment to this section in the act of 1871, if I remember aright, was the addition which I propose now to strike out.

Mr. GOOCH. I will send to the Clerk's desk the statutes, and ask that the forty-third section of the act of 1871 may be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

And be it further enacted, That whenever damage is sustained by any passenger or his baggage from explosion, fire, collision, or other cause, the master and the owner of such vessel, or either of them, and the vessel, shall be liable to each and every person so injured to the full amount of damage, if it happen either by neglect or failure to comply with the provisions of law herein prescribed, or through known defect or imperfection of the steaming apparatus, or of the hull, and any person sustaining loss or injury through the carelessness, negligence, or willful misconduct of any captain, mate, engineer, or pilot, or his neglect or refusal to obey the provisions of law herein prescribed as to navigating such steamers, may sue such captain, mate, engineer, or pilot, and recover damages for any such injury caused as aforesaid by any such captain, mate, engineer, or pilot.

Mr. CONGER. I would say to the gentleman that that provision was in the former law, but even then I opposed its incorporation there. It limits the liability for injuries that may be received by an individual more than the common law does, or than the usual laws of the land do. I would extend the limitation of liability of the law of 1851 for damages to property to the vessel; I would extend that to the interior waters; but I would not provide, as the last part of this section does, to fix the limit of liability for loss of life from negligence. I think it is better with the law as it is now with regard to railroads. I believe it is a subject which in this particular bill we should not make any limitation in regard to. I repeat that I would extend the limitation of the law of 1851, the liability for loss of property or damage to vessels on the rivers the same as it is with vessels on the ocean and on lakes, but I would strike out the closing part of this section which I have read, for the reason that I do not believe that there should be a limitation of liability where life is concerned.

Mr. GOOCH. Do I understand the gentleman to claim that this bill does repeal the section which has been read?

Mr. CONGER. This section is a substitute for that, as I understand it. I will say, however, that the section of the act of 1871 does not meet my approval. I think it is a limitation against the security of life which ought not to have been put in that law. I opposed it then and I oppose it now, and I oppose that part of this section which makes a limitation of liability in cases of loss of life.

Mr. BROMBERG. Does the gentleman from Michigan move that as a substitute?

Mr. CONGER. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GOOCH] by striking out only the last portion of the section as I have indicated, leaving the liability clause of the law of 1851 to apply under this act. And I do so for this reason: the limitation clause of 1851 applies to vessels upon all the waters of the United States, except our inland rivers. It applies to ocean and coast navigation, within maritime jurisdiction of the ocean and the coast and the gulf, and by decision of our Supreme Court it applies to our inland lakes. I know of no reason why the same liability for the mere loss of property of the boat or cargo should not be extended to the Mississippi, Ohio, and other interior rivers.

Mr. NEGLEY. And thus make the law uniform.

Mr. CONGER. Yes; and thus make the law uniform in regard to the liability of the vessel, and especially as the courts have decided that the State laws in regard to such liability are unconstitutional; but I oppose here, as I did in the law before, a limitation of liability to any man, owner, engineer, captain, master, whoever he may be, for the loss of life occasioned by his negligence.

Mr. GOOCH. I merely asked the gentleman a question, and he has put in this amendment. I deem this a very important section in this bill; I think it is one of the most important. I think we should take care in our legislation now that we do not create confusion by the passage of this act. I must confess that I am a little surprised that this bill should be brought in here, undertaking to provide for the protection of persons or for the redress in the case of injury to persons for loss of life in the manner in which it does. If you should strike out the last provision of this section as the gentleman suggests an intention to move, then I do not understand that we know where we are; because you still have on your statute-book the forty-third section of the act of 1871. I suppose the committee intended to give us by this bill all the legislation necessary to cover this whole subject-matter.

Mr. NEGLEY. It was because it was in the law of 1871.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is not proposed to be re-enacted.

Mr. GOOCH. But, on the other hand, it is provided in this bill that the act of 1851 shall be extended and applied to all vessels herein described; and then it goes on to provide further that such provisions and limitations are also extended and applied to the claims for loss of life or personal injury. Now, if I read the act of 1851 aright, there is no provision in it for the loss of life or personal injury.

Mr. CONGER. Will the gentleman allow me to make one suggestion here?

Mr. GOOCH. Certainly.

Mr. CONGER. The limitation in the law of 1851 is a limitation of liability to the value of the vessel and the freight then pending, and it cannot exceed that. Now, if this last clause of the pending section should be adopted, then liability for loss of a life, or for the loss of ever so many lives, is limited to the value of the vessel and the freight then pending, which I oppose. That limitation should be in the discretion of the court. We should not limit the liability for the loss of one life or of a hundred lives to the value of the vessel and the freight then pending.

Mr. GOOCH. I only want to have this section put in the shape in which it ought to be. For that reason I suggest that this section be passed over for the present, so that it can be redraughted by the Committee on Commerce, and presented by them when the consideration of this bill shall be again resumed in Committee of the Whole in such shape as will meet their approval. It seems to me that it does not meet their approval now. I think that in order to come to a conclusion as to what this section should be, the committee will have to consider it in connection with the forty-third section of the act of 1871 as well as in connection with the act of 1851. And in order that the Committee on Commerce may have that opportunity, I move that the Committee of the Whole do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and, the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PARKER, of Missouri, reported that, pursuant to the order of the House, the Committee of the Whole had had under consideration the Union generally, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 1588) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the better security of life on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, and for other purposes," approved February 28, 1871, and had come to no resolution thereon.

TRANSPORTATION TO THE SEA-BOARD.

Mr. SENER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and under the law referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the House three thousand copies of the report and the appendix and evidence of the Select Committee of the Senate on Transportation to the Sea-board.

AFFAIRS IN ARKANSAS.

Mr. POLAND. I ask unanimous consent to offer for action at this time the preamble and resolution I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the contest for the office of governor in the State of Arkansas has evoked a condition of affairs in which the exercise of civil government is suppressed and ignored, and opposing armed bodies confront each other, holding absolute sway over the capital of the State; and whereas it is reported that armed forces from other States have invaded her borders; and whereas, owing to the turmoil and confusion attending the contest, it is difficult to ascertain the exact situation and status of the State government and the true necessities of the case: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That a committee of five be appointed by the Speaker, who shall have power to send for persons and papers or to go to Arkansas to inquire whether there is in that State a condition of things which calls upon the Government of the United States to exercise its warrant to guarantee to each State a republican form of government, or protect her from invasion or domestic violence, with power to report at any time.

Mr. BECK. I object to the adoption of that resolution at this time, but I do not object to its reference.

Mr. POTTER. I suggest that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. They have already before them the same subject under a previous resolution of the House.

Mr. COX. I object to referring any resolution to that committee. They never report. They never yet have reported in reference to Louisiana. Let the Executive take care of Arkansas.

Mr. BECK. Let it be referred.

Mr. HYNES. It is merely a resolution of inquiry, to ascertain what is the condition of affairs in the State of Arkansas.

Mr. POLAND. I do not object to the reference if the Committee on the Judiciary can have leave to report at any time. I make that request.

Mr. COX. I object to any such reference. That committee never does report anything.

Mr. POTTER. We never get a chance to report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Vermont asks leave to report at any time, and the gentleman from New York objects to granting leave.

JOAB SPENSER AND JAMES R. MEAD.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

The Clerk read as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I return herewith without my signature House bill No. 1331 entitled "An act for the relief of Joab Spenser and James R. Mead for supplies furnished the Kansas tribe of Indians." I withheld my approval of said bill for reasons which satisfy me the claim should not be allowed for the entire amount stated in the bill, and which are set forth in the letter of the Secretary of the Interior of the 7th instant, a copy of which, with the accompanying papers, is herewith transmitted.

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, May 12, 1874.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the letter accompanying the message of the President be read to the House.

The SPEAKER. It is very lengthy.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I ask that the accompanying papers be printed.

The SPEAKER. The question is whether it belongs to the Committee on Indian Affairs or the Committee on Claims.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. It is a bill reported I think by my colleague [Mr. LOWE] from the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The message and accompanying documents were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

CIRCULATING NOTES.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to a resolution of the House of April 25, 1874, in relation to how much of the $54,000,000 in notes for circulation has been issued under the act of July 12, 1870; which, on motion of Mr. MERRIAM, was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

HEIRS OF WILLIAM MORRISON.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in relation to the claim of the heirs of William Morrison for damage done to property by the firing of experimental guns; which was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

NAVY-YARDS ON THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. SHANKS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to present the proceedings of a mass meeting of the working people of the State of Indiana, held at Indianapolis, April 23, 1874, in relation to the establishment of navy-yards upon the Mississippi River; and I move that they be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHANKS. I ask, by unanimous consent, the proceedings be published in the RECORD. They are not long.

There was no objection.

The proceedings were as follows:

Whereas the report of the Naval Committee of the House of Representatives made to that body on the 2d instant, and its accompanying papers, show that the chief cause of distress to the working people, both mechanic and agricultural, is due to the loss of carrying trade in American ships on the ocean, and that carrying trade can only be reinstated by the means of building better ships than our competitors; that these means are in the establishment of iron ship-building works upon the Atlantic coast, and upon the Mississippi River, or one of its tributaries, and that "the creation of these yards will give to the United States—as similar creations have given to Great Britain—prosperity to its manufacturing and mechanic industries, the broadest and most economical means of cheap transportation for the productions of the farmer and planter, and secure constant employment to labor at remunerative wages." And that said committee present the proposals of the International Steamship Company to create these yards without subsidy or money aid from the Government, and upon condition that Congress shall create a trust into which the said company shall pay 5 per cent. annually upon the work done, to form a sinking fund which cannot be deviated from in the payment of interest upon its bonds, or their final liquidation; and whereas these yards will revive mechanic industry and employment along the coasts, and throughout the navigable interior waters, and afford relief to the producer and consumer by the reduction on freights upon the articles of life support: Therefore,

Resolved, That the thanks of the working people and the farmers are due to the members of the Naval Committee of Congress for procuring these measures, which open again the avenues to profitable returns for honest labor, and that their thanks are hereby given by the working people here assembled.

Resolved, That Congress is hereby earnestly urged to pass, at the earliest day, the said bill reported by the committee, to accept the proposals for and establish the said iron-ship and boat-building yards.

Resolved, That our fellow-workingmen throughout the country be, and they are hereby, invited to join in like action to this, that Congress may know the wishes of the working people, to secure that permanent employment which such yards cannot fail to create.

Resolved, That copies of this preamble and resolutions be sent to the President of the United States, and to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, with a request that the first be read to the Cabinet in council, and the others be read to the Senate and to the House of Representatives.

In accordance with the last resolution, I have the honor to forward the above copy, and to ask that the preamble and resolutions may be read in accordance with the expression given by the working people.

With great respect, I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

J. J. H. WRIGHT,
President of the Meeting.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. DARRALL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill (H. R. No. 420) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to discharge certain obligations of the United States to the creditors of the Upper and Lower bands of Sioux Indians; when the Speaker signed the same.

And then, on motion of Mr. HOLMAN, (at ten minutes to five o'clock p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. MAGEE: The petition of citizens of Cumberland County, Pennsylvania, for the repeal of the tax on notes put in circulation by banks doing business under State charters, to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. PERRY: The petition of S. H. Ransom & Co., of Albany, New York, and others, for the substitution of specific for ad valorem duties on tin plates, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. WOOD: Statement of John M. Bradley, of Arkansas, in relation to the election of Congressman at large from the State of Arkansas to the Forty-third Congress and the occupancy of the seat, to the Committee on Elections.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, May 13, 1874.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

On motion of Mr. TIPTON, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday's proceedings was dispensed with.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands:

A bill (H. R. No. 2019) to forfeit certain public lands granted to the Stockton and Copperopolis Railroad, in the State of California;

A bill (H. R. No. 3339) relating to the disposition of certain lands to be reclaimed in sections 14, 23, and 26, in township 16 north, of range 20, in the county of Sheboygan, in the State of Wisconsin; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3250) to confirm pre-emption and homestead entries of public lands within the limits of railroad grants in cases where such entries have been made under the regulations of the Land Department.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

The bill (H. R. No. 3006) authorizing the President to nominate Holmes Wickoff an assistant surgeon in the Navy—to the Committee on Naval Affairs;

The bill (H. R. No. 2545) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875—to the Committee on Appropriations;

The bill (H. R. No. 3338) to amend section 1 of an act entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the Army and Navy pension laws," approved March 3, 1873—to the Committee on Pensions;

The bill (H. R. No. 3335) authorizing the Secretary of War to grant a right of way across a corner of the Fort Gratiot military reservation to the city railroad company, Port Huron, Michigan—to the Committee on Military Affairs; and

The bill (H. R. No. 3281) to amend the act entitled "An act to amend an act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 2, 1864—to the Committee on Railroads.

The bill (H. R. No. 3168) making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works for rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title.

Mr. CHANDLER. Let that bill be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That bill, according to custom, goes to the Committee on Commerce in both branches, and afterward in the House it goes to the Committee on Appropriations; and I desire it to so go in this body this year. I desire it to go to the Committee on Appropriations after it has been to the Committee on Commerce, and I take this opportunity to say to the Senator from Michigan that I hope it will be convenient to that committee to consider it at as early a day as practical so that we may have it at their earliest convenience.

Mr. CHANDLER. That bill has ordinarily remained in the possession of the Committee on Commerce. As the Committee on Appropriations know nothing whatever about the subject, I rather think the Committee on Commerce is better adapted to consider it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. So I expected the Senator would say; but then the Senate will see that there is an object in having under one exact supervision and understanding all our appropriations.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am perfectly willing it shall be considered under the direction of the Committee on Appropriations when it passes; but all the papers connected with the bill are in the Committee on Commerce, and as a matter of course none of them have gone to the Committee on Appropriations. I do not care to have the bill interfered with by the Committee on Appropriations after the Committee on Commerce has got through with it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. When it comes back, I will make the motion I have indicated. I make no objection to the reference proposed now.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

CALIFORNIA CONGRESSIONAL ELECTION.

The bill (H. R. No. 2846) repealing the act entitled "An act fixing the time for the election of Representatives from the State of California to the Forty-fourth Congress was read twice by its title.

Mr. SARGENT. There is but one line in the bill, and I ask that it be now considered.

Mr. DAVIS. Let it be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, which repeals the act fixing the time for the election of Representatives from the State of California to the Forty-fourth Congress, approved March 3, 1873.

The bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What does that mean?

Mr. SARGENT. The Legislature of California memorializes for this bill, and the delegation of California in both Houses, without distinction of party, are for it. By a blunder in our State code last year the election of members of the next Congress was put at a period of over two years before the members take their seats, and it was necessary that Congress should intervene in order to prevent the operation of that law, or we should have had double sets of members in the next Congress. The act which this bill repeals was passed to meet that exigency. The remedy has been applied. The election, if it comes on this coming year, when we elect nobody else, will cost the State some $250,000. Next year we have the election of our governor and all the State officers; and our people desire that the election of Representatives to Congress take place at the same time. The Legislature memorializes for it, and the delegation in both Houses are for it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The effect of that would be to have the election for Congressmen on a different day in California from the other States.

Mr. SARGENT. That is very true; but on account of this trouble our present Legislature have fixed our law hereafter so that the general law of Congress, which will take effect with the Forty-fifth Congress, goes into operation and our laws will be in harmony with it.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. FENTON. I present the memorial of Andrew John, who signs himself as delegate of the Seneca Nation of New York Indians, remonstrating against the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 3080) to authorize the Seneca Nation of New York Indians to lease lands within the Cattaraugus and Allegany reservations, and to confirm existing leases, which has been referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. I am somewhat familiar with the subject to which reference is made, but I have not examined the provisions of the bill as it passed the House. Therefore I am not able to give any opinion in regard to the merits of this remonstrance or the bill itself.

I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GOLDTHWAITE presented the petition of James L. Pugh, of Alabama, praying for the removal of his political disabilities; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BOUTWELL presented a memorial of merchants of Boston, remonstrating against any change in the present system of compulsory pilotage; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the memorial of Henry L. Gurney, of Boston, on behalf of Boston pilots, remonstrating against the passage of any law changing the present system of compulsory pilotage; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN presented a petition of the civil-rights committee of the State of New Jersey, praying the passage, at this session, of Senate bill No. 1, supplementary to the act entitled "An act to protect all citizens of the United States in their civil rights, and to furnish the means for their vindication," passed April 9, 1866; which was ordered to lie on the table.

MARTHA E. NORTHUP.

Mr. FENTON. As there is not much to engross the attention of the Senate at this moment, I ask that House bill No. 1122 be taken up and acted upon. I will state, in one word, that I believe there is no objection to this bill now. My friend from California [Mr. SARGENT] who is in his seat, and the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. FERRY,] I understood to say that they withdrew all objection. It has been recommitted to the Committee on Pensions, and the report as amended again comes unanimously from that committee, and I ask that the bill may be now passed.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1122) granting a pension to Mrs. Martha E. Northup, widow of First Lieutenant Edward B. Northup, late of the Seventeenth United States Infantry.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE MINT LAWS.

Mr. ALCORN. I ask unanimous consent to take up the bill (S. No. 777) to amend the fifteenth and sixteenth sections of the act entitled "An act revising and amending the laws relative to mints, assay offices, and coinage of the United States," approved February 12, 1873, with a view to its reference.

Mr. SCOTT. I will not object to this if it is simply for reference; but that there may be no misunderstanding, I desire to give notice that as yesterday was set aside for the consideration of bills from the Committee on Claims, I shall ask the Senate to give us the residue of the morning hour, after the regular morning business is through, for the purpose of proceeding with those bills.

Mr. ALCORN. I move that the bill I have mentioned, No. 777, be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT. It had escaped my recollection just now when I gave notice that I would object to all other bills and ask to have the bills of the Committee on Claims taken up that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] gave notice that he would ask to be heard this morning after the expiration of the regular morning business on the subject of claims. I do not desire to interfere with the courtesy due to him or to deprive him of the opportunity to be heard, as he desires to speak this morning. I therefore withdraw the notice that I gave, and at the expiration of the morning hour or of his remarks, if I have the floor, I shall ask the Senate to proceed with the bills of the Committee on Claims for a limited time, or that another day be fixed for hearing them.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. THURMAN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill (S. No. 806) to extend the time allowed in and by the act approved June 8, 1872, for the redemption of certain lands therein named, and for other purposes; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 778) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide homes for the Pottawatomies and absent Shawnee Indians in the Indian Territory," approved May 23, 1872, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 735) for the relief of D. G. and D. A. Sanford, of Texas, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. WEST, from the Committee on Railroads, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 608) granting the right of way through the public lands to construct and maintain a railroad, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. GOLDTHWAITE, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 142) for the relief of Nathaniel McKay, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BOGY, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1924) for the relief of James L. Johnson, surviving partner of Beck & Johnson, authorizing payment for Indian depredations, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1925) for the relief of James Preston Beck, administrator of Preston Beck, jr., authorizing payment for Indian depredations, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 188) to authorize the issue of patents to lands in cases of private land claims, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. MERRIMON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Washington Crosland, praying payment for damages arising from the seizure and use of his property by the Government in the city of Saint Louis, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 807) for the relief of Washington Crosland.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of William H. Dempsey, surviving partner of the firm of Dempsey & O'Toole, stationers, of Washington, District of Columbia, asking to be compensated for damage incurred by the breaking of a contract between that firm and the Patent Office, in 1868, for furnishing bond-paper to the Patent Office, reported adversely thereon and asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. SPRAGUE, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1760) to secure homesteads to actual settlers on the public domain, reported it with an amendment.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CHANDLER (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 808) for the better protection of immigrants; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 809) to incorporate the Inland and Sea-board Coasting Company of the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHERMAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 810) to regulate commerce among the several States and with foreign nations; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Sea-board, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BAYARD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 813) for the relief of George R. Dennis; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HITCHCOCK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 811) for the relief of Jesse S. Fort; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. OGLESBY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 812) for the relief of Chickasaws and the adoption of the freedmen; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CHEAP TRANSPORTATION.

Mr. WINDOM submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Whereas cheap and ample means for the interchange of commodities between the different sections of our country constitute essential conditions of national advancement and prosperity; and whereas the Select Committee on Transportation, after full investigation of the subject, report that in their judgment cheap transportation can only be obtained through competition, under governmental control and operating through cheaper means of transport than are now provided; that such cheaper means of transport can only be provided by the construction of double-track freight railways, or by the improvement and creation of water-routes; and that after a most careful consideration of the merits of various proposed improvements, taking into account the cost, practicability, and probable advantages of each, the committee have come to the unanimous conclusion that the following are the most feasible and advantageous channels of commerce to be created or improved by the national Government in case Congress shall act upon this subject, namely:

First. The Mississippi River;

Second. A continuous water-line of adequate capacity from the Mississippi River to the city of New York via the northern lakes;

Third. A route adequate to the wants of commerce through the central tier of States, from the Mississippi River via the Ohio and Kanawha Rivers, to a point in West Virginia, and thence by canal and slack-water or by a freight railway to tide-water;

Fourth. A route from the Mississippi River, via the Ohio and Tennessee Rivers to a point in Alabama or Tennessee, and thence by canal and slack-water, or by a freight railway to the ocean;

And whereas the said committee express the opinion that among other benefits and advantages the completion of the system of improvements suggested by them will effect a permanent reduction of 50 per cent. in the cost of transporting fourth-class freights from the valley of the Mississippi River to the sea-board and a similar reduction in return freights, thereby insuring remunerative prices to the farmer of the West, cheaper food to the manufacturer and laborer at the East and the cotton-planter of the South, enhancement by many hundreds of millions in the value of western and southern lands, and a large increase in the exportations of cotton and cereal products; and whereas the report of said select committee recommends that careful surveys and estimates be made upon such portions of said routes as may be necessary to determine accurately the cost of each and to enable Congress at its next session to enter upon the said system of improvements, if upon the completion of such surveys and estimates the same shall be deemed practicable and expedient: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations be, and hereby are, instructed to report amendments to the pending river and harbor bill, making appropriations for completing the surveys and estimates for each of the improvements recommended by said select committee upon the four routes indicated in said report.

Mr. WINDOM. I wish to state that when the finance bill and the civil-rights bill shall have been completed I will call up the resolution for action. I move now that it lie on the table and be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 2343) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 420) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to discharge certain obligations of the United States to the creditors of the Upper and Lower bands of Sioux Indians; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

WEST VIRGINIA WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. DAVIS. If the regular morning business is through, I wish to be heard.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will proceed, if there be no objection.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, the chairman of the Senate Committee on Claims gave notice that he would to-day ask the Senate to consider bills reported from that committee. I, also, gave notice that I would ask the Senate to allow me to submit some remarks to-day after the regular morning business was concluded. I shall be as brief as the subject will admit. I invite the attention of the Senate to the bill I introduced early in this session providing for the payment to the State and people of West Virginia of the sum of $500,000 to reimburse them in part for losses sustained by them during the late war. The bill has been read a second time, is now pending before the Committee on Claims, and is as follows:

A bill to reimburse the State of West Virginia for losses incurred by reason of the destruction of its bridges, court-houses, school-houses, churches, turnpike roads, and other public property by Federal troops during the late war.

Whereas the State of West Virginia suffered heavy losses during the late civil war in the destruction of bridges, court-houses, school-houses, churches, turnpike roads, and other public property; and whereas said State was loyal to the Government of the United States, and contributed its full share toward putting down the late rebellion; and whereas the greater portion of said property was destroyed by Federal troops acting under the orders of their superiors; and whereas said State, by reason of its heavy losses as aforesaid and of its being yet young in years and having to endure a heavy expense in the erection of its public buildings, is unable to contribute toward the rebuilding of said works: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized, and hereby directed, to pay to the State of West Virginia, upon the order of the governor of said State, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $500,000, to be applied to the rebuilding of the bridges, court-houses, school-houses, churches, turnpike-roads, and other public property in said State destroyed by Federal troops by military orders during the late civil war.

My remarks, however, will apply to similar bills now upon the Calendar ready to be acted upon by the Senate.

SKETCH OF THE ORGANIZATION OF WEST VIRGINIA.

A large majority of the citizens of West Virginia were opposed to the ordinance of secession, and in favor of maintaining the supremacy of the Union and the Constitution, and signalized their devotion to the Government by setting up a reorganized government as soon as possible after the passage of the secession ordinance in Richmond, on the 19th day of April, 1861. A thrill of excitement shook the country from the Alleghanies to the Ohio River when the western delegates returned and announced the passage of the ordinance. Three days afterward, on the 22d, a mass meeting was called and held at Clarksburgh, where resolutions were adopted calling upon the people of Western Virginia to send delegates to a convention to be held at Wheeling on the 13th of May following, to determine upon such action as might be thought best.

The people responded to the call, and assembled in convention in Wheeling on the day appointed, and passed resolutions denouncing the ordinance of secession as an act of treason, and providing for a convention of all the counties of Virginia adhering to the national Government. This convention assembled in Wheeling on the 11th of June following, and proceeded to reorganize the lawful government of the State. This reorganized government was recognized by the people as the true government of the State, and Hon. F. H. Pierpoint was elected governor. This convention also issued a call for a new State constitutional convention, which body was elected on the 24th of October, 1861, and met in Wheeling on the 26th of November following.

The consent of the Legislature of reorganized Virginia was given to the formation of a new State on the 13th of May, 1862, and on the 31st of December following President Lincoln approved the act of Congress admitting West Virginia into the Union. The new State constitution, as amended, was adopted by the people on the 26th of March, 1863. A general election for the new State government was held on the 28th of May, and on the 20th of June, 1863, the State of West Virginia was inaugurated at Wheeling by Hon. Arthur I. Boreman, my present colleague on this floor, first governor of the new State, and the assembled Legislature. The validity of the new State was fully recognized by Congress admitting Senators and Representatives, and by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Virginia vs. West Virginia, for the possession of Jefferson and Berkeley Counties, which case was decided in favor of West Virginia.

SITUATION OF WEST VIRGINIA DURING THE WAR.

The people whose cause I advocate suffered much for the sake of the Republic. They are the men of the border, those men who during the rebellion were the living rampart of the States which adhered to the General Government. Some of them were soldiers of the United States Army, faithfully discharging their duty, while the Government, for whose preservation they fought, seized and used or destroyed their property.

West Virginia was one of the border States during the late war, and being so, had to bear the brunt of hard knocks and cruel blows from both of the then contending armies. She was the bulwark, the fortress, interposed between the loyal States of the North and the opponents of the Government. Her hills and valleys resounded with the march of hostile armies during the whole war, and on numberless occasions were the scenes of hard-fought battles, and were drenched with the blood of the best and bravest of both armies.

All the moral influence which she, as a State, could exercise was thrown in the cause of the Government. Being one of the principal theaters of action, and the Gibraltar of safety for the Northern States, a large number of troops was necessarily kept in this State all the time. Thus it was necessary, as one of the consequences of war, to use her school-houses, churches, and other public buildings as winter quarters, &c., to shield the soldiery from the wintry blasts, or else as hospitals, to protect and care for the wounded. As fuel was needed, fences, timber, and other movable property were consumed. As food was needed, the resources of the country were used to supply the wants of the Army. As transportation was needed, horses, mules, and wagons were impressed and sacrificed for the common cause. When it became necessary to transport the heavy artillery and other munitions of war, as was frequently, nay daily, the case, our roads and pikes had to suffer.

It was a misfortune both to the people of the South and the people of the North that this war broke out; but it did break out, and it raged like a flame upon the prairie, destroying everything within its reach. It swept over our State like a deadly hurricane. It was our lot to have visited upon us all the evils, all the horrors of war; all the effusion of blood, the desolation of families, the rapine, the acts of violence, the conflagrations incident to war. The two armies surged backward and forward through our State like the ebbing and flowing of the tide, first advancing, then retreating. Life, liberty, property, all went down before the storm. Ties of kindred—social, domestic, and religious ties—were snapped asunder. Our cultivated fields were laid waste, our homes destroyed, our industrial pursuits interrupted—nay, almost abandoned. Many of our people were driven away from their homes; their cattle, horses, and other stock were taken, their houses burned, and everything they had on earth destroyed. They were left without means, without homes, without household furniture, suffering for the necessaries of life, and in some cases utterly destitute. This is but a faint picture of some of the horrors of war. Our neighbors, who dwelt in affluence and safety while we stood sentry over their treasures and loved ones, little knew the sufferings and privations we were called upon to undergo. I am not painting harrowing scenes in order to work upon the sympathies of Senators, but am stating plain truths, which the history of the late war will fully corroborate.

CLAIM UNEQUAL TO THE LOSSES.

The amount claimed in the bill is not at all equal to the losses actually sustained, but being a young State, and consequently modest, and taking into consideration the present financial condition of our Government, we do not demand as large an amount as we are legally and justly entitled to; but simply ask for the comparatively small sum named in the bill as some slight compensation for losses sustained by our people at the hands of the Union armies.

I will not weary the Senate, Mr. President, with any attempt to give the losses suffered by loyal citizens in our State, at the hands of the Federal troops, in detail. Every Senator knows how large was the demand of the Army for buildings as store-houses, for hospitals, and for winter quarters for officers and privates. Every one knows how forests were felled, and the timber and fences used for fuel, fortifications, and bridges. Every one knows how often, in the case of a retreat, it became necessary to destroy costly bridges, the property of the State, and public buildings, in which commissary stores and ammunition were stored, in order to prevent their falling into the hands of and becoming useful to the enemy. The sufferings of our State, in these particulars, are matters of history with which, doubtless, every Senator in this Chamber is conversant.

WHO OUGHT TO PAY THE LOSSES?

The question presented for determination is, who ought to bear the losses incurred by loyal men at the hands of the Government in the prosecution of the late war, the Government who took property, and used it for its own advantage, or the loyal State or party from whom the property was taken, and who received no benefit or compensation therefor, save the benefit, in common with all others, of protection? Most unquestionably the Government ought to bear the loss. The sacrifice of property by the loyal State or owner for the benefit of his Government should be compensated for by that Government by all means, and at the first opportunity. The obligation to pay a faithful and a law-abiding citizen for property which the Government appropriates to its own use, and receives the benefit of, is an obligation as sacred in time of war as in time of peace; and no matter with whom the war is waged, it is not waged with the parties from whom you take it.

War authorizes a government to possess itself of what belongs to the enemy, by confiscation, appropriation, or what you like, and without compensation; but it does not authorize a government to confiscate or appropriate the property of its loyal citizens without due compensation therefor. All law, whether in time of war or time of peace, among civilized nations at least, recognizes the principle that he who wantonly does an injury to a friend is bound to repair the damage, or to make adequate satisfaction if the damage be irreparable.

It is a principle—a sacred principle—incorporated in the great fundamental law of this country, that the Government or its properly constituted agents or authorities shall in no case take private property for public use without due compensation. The Government can never, with honor, deprive a citizen of property so long as the citizen is faithful to his obligations to the Government, without paying him compensation therefor. While the citizen is faithful, while he holds to his allegiance, while he discharges the obligation of citizenship, the theory of our Government is, and the principles of justice and right are, that the Government shall bring to bear all its powers to the end that citizens receive no detriment that shall not be redressed. This obligation is as lasting as the Government, and as sacred as the eternal principles of justice.

LAW BEARING ON THE SUBJECT.

Let us examine into the law on this question for a few moments, and see what the recognized authorities say on this subject. Vattel, in his Law of Nations, says:

Such damages are of two kinds, those done by the State itself, or the sovereign, and those done by the enemy. Of the first kind some are done deliberately, and by way of precaution, as when a field, a house, a garden, belonging to a private person, is taken for the purpose of erecting on the spot a town rampart, or any other piece of fortification, or when his standing corn or his store-houses are destroyed to prevent their being of use to the enemy. Such damages are to be made good to the individual, who should bear only his quota of the loss.

Vattel, it will be seen, divides the damages into two kinds, accidental and designed. It is not the purpose of this bill or our people to demand compensation for accidental damages, because in a state of war the party clothed with the right to make war has to march his troops through the country by the best route possible to accomplish his purpose, and the accidental damages resulting from such march are the necessary consequences of the war, and must be borne by the people without compensation therefor. But when we come to consider the second division, it is an entirely different matter. While it is acknowledged that if it is necessary to march through a growing crop of grain in order to secure a legitimate end and thereby impair its value, no compensation can be justly or legally claimed therefor; yet if, on the other hand, the troops are in camp, and under orders confiscate the corn for provender, or else cut it down in order to keep an enemy from approaching under its cover, it must be admitted that damages lie. So it may be set down as one of the acknowledged legal maxims of war, that whatever the Government takes from a loyal subject for the more efficient prosecution of a war, whether it be forage, timber for fortifications, houses removed or destroyed, or anything else, should be compensated for.

Says Grotius, (page 348, volume 3, Campbell's Grotius:)

The property of subjects is so far under the eminent control of the state that the state, or the sovereign who represents it, can use that property, or destroy it, or alienate it, not only in cases of extreme necessity, which sometimes allow individuals the liberty of infringing upon the property of others, but on all occasions where the public good is concerned, to which the original framers of society intended that private interest should give way. But when that is the case, it is to be observed the state is bound to repair the losses of individuals at the public expense, in aid of which the sufferers have contributed their due proportion. Nor will the state, though unable to repair the losses for the present, be finally released from the debt, but whenever she possesses the means of repairing the damages the dormant claim and obligation will be revived.

And again he says:

The king may in two ways deprive his subjects of their right, either by way of punishment or by virtue of his eminent power. But if he does so in the last way, it must be for some public advantage, and then the subject ought to receive, if possible, a just satisfaction for the loss he suffers out of the common stock.

Mr. William Whiting has also discussed this subject with direct reference to the liabilities of the United States, growing out of the late war. He asserts the same doctrine, namely:

If the private property of loyal citizens, inhabitants of loyal states, is appropriated by our military forces for the purpose of supplying our armies and to aid in prosecuting hostilities against a public enemy, the Government is bound to give a reasonable compensation therefor to the owner.

Again he says:

When individuals are called upon to give up what is their own for the advantage of the community, justice requires that they should be fairly compensated for it; otherwise public burdens would be shared unequally.

Again he says:

Public use does not require that the property taken shall be actually used. It may be disused, removed, or destroyed, and destruction of private property may be the best public use it can be put to. Suppose a bridge owned by a private corporation to be so located as to endanger our forts upon the banks of a river. To demolish that bridge for military purposes would be to appropriate it to public use.

This view of the case is fully sustained by the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Mitchell vs. Harmony, (13 Howard, page 134.) This case originated out of a transaction during our war with Mexico. Mitchell was an officer of the United States Army in that war, and destroyed the property of Harmony, in the Mexican province of Chihuahua, to prevent it from falling into the possession of the enemy, and suit was brought by Harmony to recover the value of that property. Chief Justice Taney, in delivering the opinion of the court, says:

And where the owner has done nothing to forfeit his rights, every public officer is bound to respect them, whether he finds the property in a foreign or hostile country, or in his own.

There are, without doubt, occasions in which private property may occasionally be taken possession of or destroyed to prevent it from falling into the hands of the public enemy, and also where a military officer charged with a particular duty may impress private property into the public service or take it for public use. Unquestionably in such cases the Government is bound to make full compensation to the owner.

The same principles are enunciated in the case of Grant vs. The United States, (reported in first Nott and Huntington's Court of Claims Reports.) Judge Wilmot, the author of the famous "Wilmot proviso," in pronouncing the opinion in this case, says:

It may safely be assumed as the settled and fundamental law of Christian and civilized states that governments are bound to make just indemnity to the citizen or subject whenever private property is taken for the public good, convenience, or safety.

This was a case in which Grant brought a claim against the Government for property destroyed in Arizona by the United States troops, in July, 1861, to prevent it from falling into the hands of the enemy.

In the syllabus of the case the following principles are laid down:

There is no discrimination to be made between property taken to be used and property taken to be destroyed.

It is no defense that the circumstances must have rendered the property valueless to the owner if the officer had not destroyed it. It is the imminence of danger that gives the state a right to destroy property; but the certainty of the danger does not relieve the state from liability for the property which it takes to destroy.

The doctrines of law set forth by the foregoing eminent writers and learned judges are so plain and to the point, that it is needless for me to do more than announce them without comment. The essence of the opinions and decisions seems to be contained in the plain proposition of law, that the Government is bound to compensate its loyal citizens for all property taken from them by the Government, or used or destroyed by the Government in the prosecution of the war, of which the Government received the benefit. This is what the bill contemplates. This is all we ask for.

DAMAGES INFLICTED BY THE CONFEDERATES.

We do not claim that the Government is under any obligations to indemnify us for damages sustained through the act or actions of its enemies, though even in this case there is abundant precedent to justify a claim of this kind; and in the particular case of West Virginia compensation ought really to be made her for damages inflicted by the enemies of the Government; for she by her adherence to the Government thereby threw herself into the very heart of the conflict and saved to the loyal States many times the amount claimed in this bill. But I will not discuss this proposition, as West Virginia waives all right of damages accruing to her by reason of injuries at the hands of the enemies of the Government, and simply asks that the Government, which she helped by means and men to keep intact, shall pay for the property it took and converted to its own use or destroyed.

ACCIDENTAL CONSEQUENCES OF WAR.

Nor do we claim that losses incurred by general measures, such as the blockade, the act of emancipation, the march of an army, the destruction of crops, &c., on a field of battle while in the midst of conflict, or any other accidental consequence of war, should be made good to loyal men who happened to incur them. These are the misfortunes of war, which cannot be helped and of which a true patriot does not complain. For the accidents of war, for the destruction which may be occasioned by the march of armies, by battles, by the capture of towns, by the resistance of an enemy when you are endeavoring to capture a town, no nation in the world could be called upon justly to pay. They are like destruction by fire, by the lightning, by a flood, &c., and are likened in the law to the acts of God. On whomsoever these damages fall, whether loyal or disloyal, the person who suffers the loss must submit to his misfortune. It would be the extreme of foolishness to contend otherwise.

THE RIGHTS OF LOYAL CITIZENS IN INSURRECTIONARY STATES.

I will not attempt, Mr. President, to argue the proposition so often asserted and so elaborately discussed in this Chamber as to the right of the Government to appropriate for war purposes, without compensation, the property of any and all residents of the States declared in insurrection, regardless of their sentiments toward the Government; for I do not think it enters into the case I am now presenting. Yet, while not arguing the proposition, and while admitting that when in the midst of a great civil struggle, such as we have passed through, it is not incumbent upon the Government, nor is it expected of it, to pause to inquire who were its friends and who its enemies. I hold that a loyal citizen of Virginia, Louisiana, or any other insurrectionary State, was as much entitled to protection of life and property, and to be compensated for property taken or appropriated by the Government, as a citizen of New York, Massachusetts, or any other Northern State.

In this connection I desire now to call the attention of Senators to a case reported upon at the second session of the Forty-second Congress by the Committee on Claims, of which I had the honor to be a member, and I desire especially to direct attention to the letter and indorsement of then General, but now President, Grant filed with the papers in the case. The case was as follows: James Cameron was the owner of a lot of ground, containing about forty acres, located in the suburbs of Chattanooga, Tennessee, on which was a dwelling used as a family residence. When the Union armies, under command of Major-General W. S. Rosecrans, entered that city, this property was taken possession of by them and used for army purposes. Fortifications were erected on the land, the timber on the land cut off and used for fuel, and the out-houses and fencing destroyed. The committee found that the claimants, Mr. and Mrs. Cameron, were loyal, and had been damaged to the amount of $10,000, and reported a bill for the payment of that amount, recommending its passage. The bill afterward passed the Senate. The letter and indorsement of General Grant were as follows:

[Letter.]

HEADQUARTERS ARMIES OF THE UNITED STATES,
City Point, Virginia, August 9, 1864.

MY DEAR MADAM: Your letter of the 8th of July was duly received, but not so promptly answered. I know yours to be a case where prompt payment should be made, and am willing to so indorse your claim. I believe your property at Chattanooga has been appraised by a board of officers. If so, send me the proceedings of the board, and I will make my indorsement and return them to you. If you have no such evidence of the claim inform me, and I will order a board to assess it, and will indorse the proceedings. This will be the first step toward a collection.

Yours, truly,

U. S. GRANT.

Mrs. CAMERON,

[Indorsement.]

HEADQUARTERS ARMIES OF THE UNITED STATES,
City Point, Virginia, October 25, 1864.

I know the property within described and the parties owning it well. Mr. Cameron and his wife have been unflinching friends of the Government from the beginning of our troubles to the present day. There are no more thoroughly loyal people anywhere in the North, and they are entitled to protection and pay for their property converted to Government use. What is now known as Fort Cameron, Chattanooga, was the private property of Mr. Cameron. From its elevated and commanding position, it had to be taken and fortified. By this means the entire property, with improvements, has been entirely destroyed for private use. I would recommend that the property be purchased, at a fair valuation, for Government use.

U. S. GRANT, General.

It will be noticed that in this case the property was located in a State known as one of the insurrectionary States, and that General Grant indorsed the claim as a just one and recommended its payment.

This fully commits the President to the payment to loyal persons for property taken or damaged by United States troops in insurrectionary States, and the act for the relief of the Kentucky University and many other similar acts, signed by the President, fully commit him to such payment to persons in States not in rebellion.

But the question of damages to loyal persons in insurrectionary States has nothing to do with the claim of West Virginia. The loyalty of our section of country was recognized and acknowledged by the General Government in the early part of the war, even while our State was a part of the State of Virginia.

I do not understand that the late war was waged against States, as States in their sovereign capacity, but against such of the inhabitants only as were in a state of insurrection, resisting the laws. It is a historical fact that all through the war a distinction was preserved in the legislation of Congress and the proclamations of the President between the loyal and disloyal inhabitants of the States and parts of States in rebellion.

LOYALTY OF WEST VIRGINIA RECOGNIZED BY THE GOVERNMENT DURING THE WAR.

As to our own section of country, I will cite extracts from some of the proclamations of President Lincoln in regard to the States in insurrection. In his proclamation of August 16, 1861, he says:

In pursuance of an act of Congress, approved July 13, 1861, I do hereby declare the inhabitants of the said States of Georgia, South Carolina, Virginia, North Carolina, Tennessee, Alabama, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, Mississippi, and Florida, except—except the inhabitants of that part of the State of Virginia [the State of West Virginia was not formed until 1863] lying west of the Alleghany Mountains, and of such other parts of that State and the other States hereinbefore named as may maintain a loyal adhesion to the Union and the Constitution, or may be from time to time occupied and controlled by the forces of the United States engaged in the dispersion of the insurgents, are in a state of insurrection against the United States, &c.

President Lincoln also, in a proclamation dated July 1, 1862, in pursuance of an act of Congress passed June 7, 1862, in which it was made the duty of the President to declare, on or before the 1st day of July then next following, in what States and parts of States insurrection existed, expressly excepted the counties comprising West Virginia.

He also, in a proclamation issued April 20, 1863, revoking certain exceptions made in a former proclamation, expressly excepted the counties of Virginia designated as West Virginia.

So you will see that the President of the United States, in every proclamation of insurrection, was careful to make a distinction in favor of the State of West Virginia, and justly so.

PROMISES MADE TO OUR PEOPLE.

President Lincoln, in his proclamation of April 15, 1861, appealed to all loyal citizens, wherever situated, to lend their aid in maintaining the honor, integrity, and existence of the Union. He declared that in the effort to re-establish its supremacy the utmost care would be observed to avoid any devastation, any destruction of or interference with property, or any disturbance of peaceable citizens in any part of the country. This looked as if it was the intention of the Government to protect loyal persons in their property, no matter where located.

During the late war the Commander-in-Chief of our armies issued "instructions for the government of the armies of the United States in the field," from which I quote three sections:

34. As a general rule, the property belonging to churches, to hospitals, or other establishments of an exclusively charitable character, to establishments of education, or foundations for the promotion of knowledge, whether public schools, universities, academies of learning, or observatories, museums of the fine arts, or of a scientific character—such property is not to be considered public property in the sense of paragraph 31.

(This paragraph, (31,) recites what a victorious army may appropriate in time of war.)

37. The United States acknowledge and protect in hostile countries occupied by them religion and morality; strictly private property; the persons of the inhabitants, especially those of women; and the sacredness of domestic relations. Offenses to the contrary shall be rigorously punished.

38. Private property, unless forfeited by crimes or by offenses of the owner, can be seized only by way of military necessity, for the support or other benefit of the Army of the United States. If the owner has not fled, the commanding officer will cause receipts to be given, which may serve the spoliated owner to obtain indemnity.

These rules, it will be seen, are applicable to the country of an enemy; how much more so, then, to the country of a friendly subject? If an enemy is entitled to such consideration, why should not a loyal man expect to be protected in his rights?

General George B. McClellan, when he entered Western Virginia in May, 1861, at the beginning of the war, issued a proclamation and address "to the Union men of Western Virginia," dated May 26, 1861, from which I take some brief extracts to show the specific promises made by the Government to our people:

You have now shown, under the most adverse circumstances, that the great mass of the people of Western Virginia are true and loyal to that beneficent Government under which we and our fathers have lived so long. * * * I have ordered troops to cross the Ohio River. They come as your friends and brothers, as enemies only to the armed rebels who are preying upon you. Your homes, your families, and your property are safe under our protection.

Again, in a proclamation and address "to the inhabitants of Western Virginia," dated June 23, 1861, among other things he said:

The proclamation issued by me under date of May 26, 1861, (referring to the above proclamation,) will be strictly maintained. Your houses, families, property, and all your rights will be religiously respected. We are enemies to none but armed rebels and those voluntarily giving them aid.

He also issued an order to his soldiers dated Grafton, Virginia, June 25, 1861, in which he said:

Bear in mind that you are in the country of friends, not of enemies; that you are here to protect, not to destroy. * * * Remember that I have pledged my word to the people of Western Virginia that their rights in person and property shall be respected. I ask every one of you to make good this promise in its broadest sense. We come here to save, not to upturn.

The Government has committed itself in this matter, and it is a late day now to say, "Well, we thought it necessary and wise, in order to establish our supremacy, to assure those of you in the border and Southern States who remained loyal, especially those of you who acted as the breast-works, as it were, of the Northern States, that you should be protected in your liberties and property; but now that the war has been waged, and we have come out of the conflict victorious, we choose to ignore your sufferings, your loyalty, your services, your sacrifices; we choose to forget our manifold promises of protection and redress. It was all very well when the Union was in danger, when the fate of the nation was trembling in the balance; but now that the affair has been decided, what matter to us what you have suffered or sacrificed; what matter to us whether you gave your all to help save us? You can be of no further use to us; therefore we ignore and disclaim you. What matter to us that, for the sake of your devotion, you braved insolence, outrage, and persecution; what matter that you endured confiscation, conflagration, exile, and often death?" Is this the policy that will make this nation the shining light in the galaxy of nations that its founders intended it should be? I think not.

HOW THE LOYALISTS OF THE SOUTH SUFFERED.

The mission of war is to kill, capture, and destroy. It aims to inflict upon the enemy the greatest amount of mischief possible. To do this it sometimes becomes necessary to ruthlessly destroy the property of friend and foe alike, as in the memorable march of General Sheridan through the valley of the Shenandoah in 1864, and the march of General Sherman to the sea-coast.

As an apt illustration of the manner in which the loyal people of the border had to suffer, I will refer to the raid through the valley of the Shenandoah during the fall of 1864. General Sheridan, in his letter to General Grant, dated "Woodstock, Virginia, October 7, 1864," says:

On moving back to this point, the whole country, from the Blue Ridge to the North Mountain, has been made untenable for a rebel army. I have destroyed over two thousand barns filled with wheat and hay and farming implements; over seventy mills filled with flour and wheat; have driven in front of the Army over four thousand head of stock, and have killed and issued to the troops not less than three thousand sheep. This destruction embraces the Luray Valley and Little Fort Valley, as well as the main valley. A large number of horses have been obtained, a proper estimate of which I cannot now make.

The historian tells us that "whatever of grain and forage had escaped appropriation or destruction by one or another of the armies which had so frequently chased each other up and down this fertile and productive valley was now given to the torch. Some of it was the property of men who not only adhered to the Union but were fighting to uphold it."

JUSTICE OF THE CLAIM.

The losses of private property on the part of citizens faithful to the Government, and of which the Government has received the benefit, ought to be borne, as the expense of raising and supporting armies is borne, not by the few who are forced by the fortunes of war temporarily to sustain them, but by the whole people. Certainly no one will deny that it is the spirit and intent of the organic law of the land that the burdens of Government shall be borne alike by the whole people, and that its benefits shall be shared alike by all who bear it true allegiance.

I cannot see wherein the forcible taking of property from a loyal man in a border State, at a time when the necessities of the Army demanded it, differs from the peaceable taking of the property of a man in a Northern State, in so far as compensation is concerned. If the supplies had not been taken from the country through which the troops were passing they would have to have been purchased elsewhere, because an army cannot be maintained without means of transportation, food and shelter for the men, forage for the horses, &c. If purchased, most undoubtedly vouchers would have been given and payment made. If not purchased, if not on hand in the commissary or quartermaster department at the time needed, they would have to be procured from the surrounding country. The only difference, if any exists, is that in one case there is an express promise to pay, and in the other case the promise is implied in the taking. I take it our Government does not claim to be a freebooter, and the obligation to pay is as binding in honor and in law in one case as the other.

But the question may be asked, Where are your vouchers? Did not the United States officers give the loyal parties from whom they took this property something to show for it, some paper or voucher by which they could prove their claims when they came to receive payment? No; in most cases they did not. In the nature of the case the emergencies of the Army often forbade the delay of a formal requisition, while they equally necessitated an immediate supply of its wants. And frequently, when supplies had been formally taken, the sudden movement of the Army prevented the execution of proper vouchers. The needs of a large army in active movement brooked no delay. On a forced march the cavalry, for instance, could not afford to wait until fresh horses could be regularly bought or impressed, or proper receipts given. And property was often taken when there was no one present authorized to give a voucher.

The value of such private property appropriated, used, or destroyed by the Government, and of which the whole country received the benefit, is as much a part of the public debt as if it were a five-twenty or seven-thirty bond of the United States, and the obligation is as binding, morally and legally, to pay it. A proposition to repudiate the national debt would be scorned by this nation, and, in my opinion, the national honor would in the end suffer just as much, if the just war claims of loyal people are repudiated.

It is to be remembered, sir, that the citizens of our State contributed of their money, in the shape of taxes and otherwise, for the support of the Government in the prosecution of the war; they were subject to draft and to do military duty, as were the citizens of the Northern States, and in all respects occupied the same position toward the Government as did the citizens of New York or Massachusetts. Why, then, should they be discriminated against?

It is simply preposterous to say that there is any justice in refusing to pay a loyal man in the South for his property deliberately taken by the Government, where, under the same circumstances, we would pay a man living in the North, without raising the question of loyalty or disloyalty, for his property. For my part, I cannot subscribe to any such doctrine.

The Government, in its relations to the people, may be likened to a parent in his relation to a child. It is as much the duty of the Government to see that the people who recognize its authority and give it their allegiance are protected in "life, liberty, and property," as it is the duty of a parent to provide for and protect a dutiful child. No government can expect to maintain its sway in the hearts of the people unless it exercises a watchful and fostering care over them. And no government can expect its people to do justice toward it, unless it metes out equal and exact justice to its people.

This is a just claim, a legal claim, a moral claim against the Government of the United States for property it has taken, and the obligation to pay this and similar claims is as strong and binding as the obligation to redeem the Government's promises to pay, or an individual's. It is no answer to the justice of the claim to say that the Government cannot afford to pay. The Government ought only to inquire if the claim be just and right, and if so, to allow it, and provide the means of payment; and if the means are not at hand now, let it be acknowledged now and paid when means are at hand.

PRECEDENTS.

As to precedents, they could be cited in abundance, and to sustain a much weaker claim than the one I am now presenting. As my remarks will be more protracted, I cite but a few.

It is a well-settled principle in law and justice that if a part of a cargo of a vessel is thrown overboard or destroyed, to save the balance, the entire cargo must pay the loss. Again, if during a fire in a city or town, a house or houses are blown up or in any way destroyed, believing this might save other property, by stopping the fire, the city or town must pay for the house or property destroyed, though it is certain the same property would have been burned if not destroyed.

Congress, in 1816, passed "an act to authorize the payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed by the enemy while in the military service of the United States, and for other purposes." (Statutes at Large, volume 3, page 261,) in which it was provided (section 5) "that where any property has been impressed or taken by public authority for the use or subsistence of the Army, during the late war, and the same shall have been destroyed, lost, or consumed, the owner of such property shall be paid the value thereof, deducting therefrom the amount which had been paid or may be claimed for the use and risk for the same, while in the service aforesaid."

But the principle I am contending for was recognized long before the passage of this act. On the 13th day of April, 1792, an act was passed granting compensation to the trustees of the public grammar school and academy of Wilmington, Delaware, for the use and occupation of the said school, and damages done to the same by the troops of the United States during the revolutionary war. (Statutes, volume 6, page 8.)

An act was passed on the 16th of April, 1800, for the relief of Rhode Island College, for injuries done to and compensation for the occupation of the edifice of said college from the 10th of December, 1776, to the 10th of April, 1780, by the troops of the United States, and from the 20th of June, 1780, to the 27th of May, 1782, by the troops of France, co-operating in the defense of the United States; in the first instance as a barracks, in the second as a military hospital. (Statutes, volume 6, page 40.)

The relief granted in this act was recommended by Alexander Hamilton, then Secretary of the Treasury, who in his report thereon, dated January 31, 1795, said:

It is the opinion of the Secretary, as expressed on former occasions, that in this and all similar cases affecting the interests of literature, indemnification and compensation ought to be made. (Claims, page 198.)

March 1, 1815, an act was passed to compensate William H. Washington for the value of a house situated near the west end of the Potomac bridge, which was used as a depot for public stores, and was destroyed by order of a United States officer to prevent the stores falling into the hands of the British during the war of 1812. (Statutes, volume 6, page 151; Claims, page 445.)

April 26, 1816, an act was passed to audit and settle the claim of the supervisors of the county of Clinton, New York, for the destruction of the court-house of said county by order of a Federal officer. (Statutes, volume 6, pages 164, 165.)

April 7, 1830, an act was passed appropriating money to pay Hubert La Croix, of the (then) Territory of Michigan, for the destruction of his dwelling-house by the British and Indians while in the military occupation of the United States. (Statutes, volume 6, page 412.)

March 2, 1833, an act was passed to compensate the heirs of Thomas Frothingham, deceased, for certain buildings in Charlestown, Massachusetts, which were burned during the revolutionary war, by order of General Putnam. The baildings were burned to prevent their being used as a shelter by the British troops. (Statutes, volume 6, page 547.)

July 2, 1836, an act was passed to remunerate the heirs of Nathaniel Canada for the burning of a toll-house and bridge across the Niantic River, in Connecticut, in 1814, by the British, while they were occupied by the troops of the United States. (Statutes, volume 6, page 659.)

April 20, 1838, an act was passed appropriating $3,000 to Calvert County, Maryland, to indemnify her for the destruction of her court-house by the British in the war of 1812, while the same was in the occupancy of the United States. (Statutes, volume 6, page 711.)

In June, 1872, an act was passed allowing Joseph Segar $15,000, the balance due him after deducting what he had heretofore received for the use and occupation of his farm in Elizabeth County, Virginia, by the Army of the United States during the late rebellion. (Statutes, volume 17, page 670.)

In January, 1873, Congress passed a law authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the heirs of John Minor Botts the sum of $1,990.16, in full of balance for injuries done or committeed by the troops of the United States to the land of John Minor Botts, deceased, the timber, fences, and other fixtures thereon. Mr. Botts had been paid $14,870.63 June 1, 1865, by the Quartermaster's Department. (Statutes, volume 17, page 719.)

And so I might go on until I both wearied myself and exhausted the patience of the Senate. The cases resulting from the late war and acted on from time to time by this body and the House of Representatives are fresh enough, doubtless, in the mind of every Senator present, and it would be but an unnecessary waste of time for me to enumerate them. I believe these acts to have been right in principle and sanctioned by law, and commend Congress for their passage. While I believe our bill is strong enough in its own merits to insure its passage, yet I cite these precedents to show that I am contending for no new principle, but for an old established one, such a one as it has been the uniform practice of this Government to conform to from time immemorial. It will be noticed that most of the cases cited are similar to the class of cases for which compensation is claimed in the bill.

Let us glance for a moment at what has been done by some other nations toward compensating those who befriended them in their wars, and then I will have done with this branch of the subject.

During the war of the Revolution the tories, as they were commonly called, or the adherents of the British Crown, suffered at the hands of the Continental Army. Some were driven from their homes and their estates confiscated. The war terminated in favor of the Americans. The injured tories appealed to Parliament for compensation. The result of their appeal is thus told by Sabine, in his American Loyalists, (page 111:)

The amount of losses, according to the schedules rendered, was £8,026,045, of which the sum of £3,292,455 was allowed. From this sum the deductions which have been mentioned (made from claims exceeding £10,000) were about £180,000; leaving for distribution nearly $15,500,000. The loyalists then were well cared for. * * * Besides the allowance of fifteen and a half million dollars in money numbers received considerable annuities, half-pay as military officers, large grants of land, and shared with other subjects in the patronage of the Crown.

It will be noted that this relief was granted, not for property of which their own government had despoiled them, but for property which had been taken from them or destroyed by our troops and people.

Even France, although almost impoverished at the close of the Franco-Prussian war, made provision for such of her subjects as had been injured. We quote from a learned and distinguished jurist, a member of this body, Judge HOWE, who as the then chairman of the Committee on Claims of the Senate, in February, 1873, submitted an able and exhaustive report—one that in my opinion is unanswerable—reviewing the objections of President Grant to the act passed for the relief of J. Milton Best.

Judge HOWE in his report says:

In September, 1871, immediately upon the close of the Franco-German war, France, although defeated and subjected to the payment of a fine of 3,000,000,000 francs to her conquerors, did not ask to avoid the obligation of making compensation to her despoiled subjects. Accordingly the National Assembly provided not only for the payment of all private damages inflicted by the French authorities, but also provided for the repayment of all exactions made upon French subjects in the name of taxes by the German authorities. The same decree appropriated 100,000,000 francs, to be placed at once in the hands of the ministers of the interior and finance, to be apportioned between the most necessitous victims of the war, and appropriated a further sum of 6,000,000 francs, to be distributed by the same ministers among those who suffered the most in the operations attending the attack made by the French army to gain entrance into Paris.

AMOUNT OF THESE WAR CLAIMS.

Some say that the recognition of such a claim as this and similar claims will open the flood-gates of the Treasury, and that the nation will be bankrupted. When a war claim is presented, they put on their magnifying glasses, and conjure up similar claims to the amount of hundreds of millions of dollars. I do not think, from my observation and research into this matter, that the amount of these claims will be so enormously large. I think when we talk about thousands of millions and an infinite draft on the Treasury, we are talking at random. But even admitting the truth of the assertion, I still hold that the justice of my position is not affected by it. While I favor economy in all directions and in all matters pertaining to disbursements from the public Treasury; while I favor an impartial and rigid examination into every claim, of whatever nature, presented against the Government, yet I am not one of those who contend that we are to refuse to do justice because it involves the expenditure of money.

I believe, however, that $25,000,000 will cover, and more than cover, every legitimate claim, from all sources, for property taken or used by the Federal Army belonging to loyal citizens and appropriated for the use of the Army, or used or destroyed for the benefit of the Government, especially after the close scrutiny to which this class of claims is subjected. And I think, if I have the attention of the Senators, I can demonstrate that I have overstated the amount. I have prepared, in tabular form, a statement showing all claims now pending, and the amount of them, as well as the number of claims acted on and their amount. The figures are as follows:

	Number of claims presented.	Amount.	Number allowed.	Amount.	Number rejected.	Amount.	Number pending.	Amount.
Commissary-General	6,096	$3,312,757 68	1,406	$317,448 54	4,443	$2,682,644 18	247	$190,527 44
Quartermaster-General, (up to close of fiscal year)	31,126	21,319,180 02	6,257	2,741,961 67	13,522	9,048,044 57	11,347	7,822,829 55
Quartermaster-General, (since beginning of fiscal year)	1,000	700,000 00					1,000	700,000 00
Commissioners of claims, (southern claims commission)	22,298	60,258,150 44	5,254	1,794,580 55			17,044	50,033,764 12
Senate United States	104	3,500,000 00					104	3,500,000 00
House of Representatives	500	16,300,000 00					500	16,300,600 00
Yet to be presented		10,000,000 00						10,000,000 00
Totals	61,124	115,390,088 14	12,917	4,853,990 76	17,965	11,730,[illegible]32 75	30,242	88,547,121 11

The figures given in the above table are official, as far as the reports of the Commissary-General, Quartermaster-General, and southern claims commission are concerned, with the exception of the amount filed in the Quartermaster's Department since the beginning of the fiscal year. The Quartermaster-General estimates the number of claims received since the beginning of the fiscal year at one thousand, but does not give the amount of them. I have estimated the amount by taking the claims heretofore presented in that department as the basis. The amount of claims pending in the Senate and House of Representatives have been prepared by the clerks of the Claims Committees, and have been estimated as well as they could be from the data at command, and I have no doubt are very nearly correct. I have also allowed $10,000,000 for claims yet to come in, and I think that is a full estimate, for it must be remembered that it is now some years since the acts were passed allowing these claims to be presented.

It will be seen by reference to totals in the report, that 30,882 cases have been acted upon, leaving about one-half (30,242) yet to be acted upon. The amount of the cases acted upon was $27,033,494.47, and of this amount $4,853,990.76 have been allowed; a little less than one-fifth. Of the $88,547,121.11 yet remaining to be acted upon, it is fair to remark: First, that of the 11,347 claims pending up to the close of the present fiscal year in the Quartermaster-General's Department, General Meigs says "about three-fourths of them have been suspended for want of additional evidence, (which, in the majority of cases, is tantamount to rejection,) which may or may not hereafter be furnished." This would reduce the amount remaining to be acted on in his office to $1,955,707.39. Second, of the claims pending in the House of Representatives, $5,000,000 are for property taken, occupied, and destroyed by the United States as a military necessity in the so-called Confederate States, and I am credibly informed that the major part of this amount is claimed by those who acted with the confederacy, one claim alone, of that character, being for $1,000,000. Also, $2,000,000 of those claims are for the use of railroads and damages to the same, which are not allowed by the laws now in force. This would reduce the amount of claims now pending in all quarters and yet to be presented, as estimated, to some $75,000,000.

And just here I would like to direct the attention of the Senate to a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury to Hon. JAMES G. BLAINE, Speaker of the House, dated February 18, 1874, (Executive Document No. 146,) from which it will be seen that—

The amount covered into the Treasury of the United States, from the sale of captured and abandoned property during the war, has been	$20,910,656 44
Of this there has been expended in payments to claimants and costs	6,500,227 27
Leaving in the Treasury	14,410,429 17

There has been allowed by the Court of Claims something over $1,000,000, which has not yet been paid, which comes out of this amount.

Now, taking the proportion of claims allowed to the amount claimed, and we have about one-fifth. Applying this same proportion to the amount yet pending—some $75,000,000—and we find we have some $15,000,000, which is but little more than the amount in the Treasury resulting from the sale of captured and abandoned property in the Southern States. But even allowing the whole amount of claims yet pending to be such as can properly be considered, and applying the proportion as before, we find we will probably have to pay but some $17,700,000 in round numbers, which is far below my estimate of $25,000,000, and to meet which there are nearly $14,000,000 now in the Treasury belonging to that fund. So, if there is any reliance to be placed in figures, and it is said "figures never lie," the fair inference is that $20,000,000 will more than pay every legitimate and proper claim of this nature against the Government, and surely this is not an amount sufficient to deter a government from doing what is just and right toward its people.

Most of the above claims can be considered under present laws by the southern claims commission, the Quartermaster-General and the Commissary-General. It is estimated that to the present time not more than ten millions has been claimed by loyal citizens or States for property taken or destroyed by United States troops or agents. Apply the rule and basis heretofore acted upon, three or four millions will pay all such claims.

Some say the Government cannot afford it. What an answer that to make to a man who has suffered and lost at the hands of the Government he was endeavoring to maintain and uphold! What an answer to make to a man who asks, not pay for the spoliations of the enemy; not compensation for losses incident to the war, but indemnification simply for what his own Government has appropriated or destroyed! Sir, no nation can afford to be unjust, least of all ours. This Government wants the respect and good will of its own citizens as well as a good credit abroad. The war is over; the effects of the war almost obliterated; industry has resumed its pursuits, and the whole country seems to be advancing to a high state of prosperity. Is it not time to look into these matters I have so feebly attempted to describe? We have waited long and patiently. Is it not time to give us our reward?

DUTY OF THE GOVERNMENT IN THE PREMISES.

The duty of this Government is to protect, and it owes protection where it exacts allegiance. The fundamental basis of all republican governments is the mutual compact between individuals and the people in a collective capacity, represented by the government.

While it is true that the citizen owes allegiance to the government of which he is the subject, the converse of the proposition is equally true, that the government owes protection to the subject. This common unity of interest, these mutual and reciprocal obligations, are what constitute and cement the Union of States. Break this strong chain that binds the governed and the governor together, and the name of government becomes a mockery, a nonentity. You might as well attempt to run an engine without a driving-wheel as to attempt to run a government without this reciprocity of interest. And, on the other hand, the driving-wheel without the "governor" would soon play sad havoc and destruction with the machinery of the engine. A government, without a people acknowledging their allegiance and claiming its protection, is nothing, and a people without a government to protect them and exact their allegiance amount to nothing. Each depends upon the other for existence and perpetuity.

As representing the moral sense of the nation, Congress is bound to do what is just, what is equitable, and what is becoming our Christian civilization. While we are the custodians of the national treasure, we are also the guardians of the national honor. While we are bound to protect the Treasury from the payment of illegal claims, we are bound to see that the honor and interests of the people do not suffer. When a great and magnanimous nation like this takes from one of its loyal citizens his property, and applies it to its own use and benefit, that citizen ought to be paid every cent of the value of the property so used.

Wherever the people in the Southern States preserved their fidelity to their Government, they were as free from the rebellion as a loyalist residing in any Northern State, and with much more merit, because the temptation and forces that operated so terribly upon them were so much greater.

Congress has passed several laws; notable among them is the act of July 27, 1868, relieving officers or agents of the Army from liability to owners of property taken, used, or destroyed during the late war. This transfers from the officers or agents to Government all liability to pay, &c., for property taken or destroyed by United States troops or agents.

When supplies for the Army, or munitions of war, or anything else wanted by the Government, were procured or appropriated in the Northern States, they were paid for. Nor was any account taken of the loyalty or disloyalty of the party from whom they were procured. I cannot see how any distinction, either in law or morals, so far as the obligation of payment is concerned, can be made between a purchase and an appropriation from the loyal owner without a direct purchase, where the Government received the benefit of the thing purchased or appropriated. This, in my opinion, would be a matter of much more serious contemplation if, by the passage of this act, we were establishing a precedent; but this is not the case. We have precedent after precedent, of a remarkable uniformity of decision, antedating to the earliest history of our own Government, and in older countries going back to the time whence "the memory of man runneth not to the contrary." I contend that by every principle of justice, by every principle of equity, by every principle of honor, by every principle of common honesty, we cannot escape the obligation to pay for property we have taken, used, or destroyed, belonging to a loyal citizen or State, and have received the benefit of its use in the support of the cause of the Union.

SPECIAL CLAIMS OF WEST VIRGINIA ON THE GOVERNMENT.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that a more equitable claim could not be presented to Congress. The State of West Virginia responded patriotically and manfully to the call of the President for troops. She sent to the field some of the best soldiers that were ever enrolled in any army. She complied with every requisition that was made upon her. The heroic deeds of her soldiery are written upon the annals of history, and of their exploits she may well feel justly proud. They were ever found where duty called them, and many of her brave sons lie buried where they fell in the discharge of their duty to their country. By reference to the records of the War Department it will be seen that West Virginia furnished troops to the Federal Government during the war to the number of 32,003—as large a number, in proportion to her able-bodied population, as any Northern State.

The loyal people of our State, under all their losses and troubles and sufferings, never murmured or complained, because they had faith in the proclamations of the President and the published addresses of the generals of the Union armies that they were considered the friends of the Government, and as such were entitled to protection and to remuneration for all property appropriated and used or injured or destroyed by the Government, of which the Government received the benefit.

West Virginia, although destined when her hills and valleys are densely populated and her dormant wealth, now lying undeveloped, shall be unearthed, to be one of the brightest stars in the crown of States, is yet in her infancy. She has had to incur a heavy expense in the erection of necessary public buildings, many of which have been destroyed by the Union armies. Being a comparatively new State she needs development. But although she is in this condition; although she has been subject to the ravages of both armies; although she has had to undergo toils, privations, and dangers innumerable, she does not come here as an object of charity. She comes, asking as a right that where the Government has received the benefit of the subsistence stores, the horses, the cattle, corn, and other articles of food, the houses, timber, &c., taken from loyal persons in her borders by its armies, and where they have used, injured, and destroyed our macadamized roads, churches, school-houses, bridges, court-houses, and other public buildings for military purposes, they ought to pay a just compensation for the property so taken, used, destroyed, or injured. I feel that my position in this matter is true and impregnable, however unable I may be to do the case justice or to convince those of the Senators who may differ with me in the views I have expressed.

CLOSING REMARKS.

It was easy enough to be true to the Government where the storm and fury of battle did not rage, where your homes were undisturbed by the shock of arms, where it cost nothing to be loyal; but in our country, especially in the earlier days of the war, it required principle and moral and physical courage and love and devotion to the Union to oppose the rebellion. Do we not owe something to the persons who were faithful amid such fiery and terrible trials?

I say, Mr. President, and I feel that the country is not only able but will give its hearty sanction to the payment of claims of this class. All that will be required of us is that we carefully scrutinize these claims and see that none but just claims are paid; and I am willing that the merits of this bill shall be submitted to the closest and most careful scrutiny.

I wish it distinctly understood that our people are willing not only to bear their just and equitable proportion of the war debt, but any other expenditure necessary to maintain and keep inviolate a republican form of government. But we do not think it fair to bear more than our just proportion. We think the losses sustained by our loyal people during the war at the hands of the Federal Government should be equitably borne by all the States, and not left to fall upon us alone.

Why is it that during the entire period of the war, from the firing on Fort Sumter to the surrender at Appomattox Court-House, we were led to believe by the practice of the Federal Government, and by the proclamations of its President and generals, that we were considered friends of the Government, and that our constitutionally guaranteed rights of protection of our lives and property were sacred in the eyes of the Government? Ah! the Government was in need, and when in need it made bountiful promises. But now the war is over, now that the victory has been won, now that the perpetuity of the Union is more firmly established, if possible, than ever, now that our services, our money, our sacrifices are no longer needed, are we to be told that the promises made to us were but delusions—promises made to the ear to be broken to the hope? Are we to be told that we have no rights which this nation we helped to save is bound to respect? For the honor of its good name, I trust not.

We ask the passage of this bill by virtue of our loyalty, tested and proven under the most adverse and trying circumstances; by virtue of our sacrifices and sufferings on behalf of the Government; by virtue of our having borne our full share of the burdens of the Government during the whole war and since; by virtue of the pledges given us at the commencement of and during the war; by virtue of the Constitution and the law of the land; by virtue of the Articles of War; by virtue of the laws of war which prevailed among the civilized nations of the earth; by virtue of the brave men of our State who laid down their lives a willing sacrifice on the altar of their country; by virtue of the precedents established at the time of our national independence, and recognized up to the present day; by virtue of right and by virtue of justice.

And now, Mr. President, I owe an apology for the length of my remarks, which are more lengthy than I had intended to make them, but I found there was so much ground to cover, and the subject one in which the people I have the honor in part to represent are more interested than perhaps any other, I could not do my constituency, the merits of the bill, or myself, justice in less time. I feel that the bill has not only intrinsic merit, but is an eminently just one; and if I have failed to present its merits in a proper and convincing light, the default must be attributed to the imperfect manner in which I have laid the facts before you. I trust that Senators will give the subject of this bill, and similar bills, and the law bearing upon them, their careful and earnest attention, so that justice may be done to the people of the border and the South, and not let the few bear the burdens that belong to the many.

BUSINESS OF COMMITTEE ON CLAIMS.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, unless the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] who has given notice of his intention to move the consideration of the finance bill, deems it his duty to insist upon the consideration of that bill to-day, I shall now ask the consent of the Senate to proceed to the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Claims, yesterday having been assigned to that committee, and it having been displaced by the then unfinished business.

Mr. SHERMAN. I deem it my duty to move to take up House bill No. 1572, in regard to the currency. I will state to the Senator from Pennsylvania that I am in hopes this bill will not occupy more than to-day and to-morrow, and then I shall be very glad indeed to see his motion adopted, so as to expedite the business he has in charge. It was understood all around in the Senate that to-day, after the passage of the Geneva award bill, the finance bill should be taken up, and it seemed to be assented to by Senators on all sides. I gave notice that I should move to take it up, and Senators are here at some discomfort to carry out that understanding. I will therefore move, if it is now in order, to take up House bill No. 1572.

Mr. SCOTT. Before the Senator makes that motion, if he insists upon it, I ask that the Committee on Claims shall have the privilege and the right immediately after the disposition of the finance bill to proceed to the consideration of their bills, and that the day following the disposition of the finance bill be fixed for that purpose. I will make that motion.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the motion?

Mr. SCOTT. That immediately upon the disposition of the finance bill the Senate will proceed to give a day to the consideration of bills from the Committee on Claims.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. WEST in the chair.) The Senator from Pennsylvania moves that at the conclusion of the finance bill, as indicated by the Senator from Ohio, the Senate proceed to the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Claims.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is that motion in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of opinion that under the objection of the Senator from Vermont the motion is not in order, but that the Senate would receive a notification to that effect from the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not make the point of order in opposition to the Senator having claims bills considered, but I make it from a long-time conviction that it is not just to the Senate, just to the claimants, or safe for the Government to separate the business of any one committee—and I include the Judiciary and the Library and every other committee, if there is any other, to which I belong in the number—from the General Calendar of the Senate. It leads to a very thin attendance always; whereas, on the other hand, if you take up the Calendar and take up the reports of all the committees in the order in which they are made, confining debate, if you like, to five minutes, you get just as much business done, and you get it done when all Senators are present, and when if any just criticism can be made or doubt suggested about the propriety of any legislation every Senator will be present to consider it. I beg the Senator from Pennsylvania to believe that it is not because I do not wish to expedite his bills, but upon the principle that I have named that I make the point that I do.

Mr. SCOTT. Of course, the motion not being in order at this time, I shall have to content myself with giving notice that at the conclusion of the finance bill I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of bills from the Committee on Claims.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. HOWE, it was Ordered, That Joanna W. Turner have leave to withdraw her petition and papers from the files of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. BAYARD, it was Ordered, That Frances Ann McCauley have leave to withdraw her petition and papers from the files of the Senate.

ENGRAVING FOR PROFESSOR BAIRD'S REPORT.

Mr. ANTHONY. I offer the following concurrent resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That Spencer F. Baird, United States commissioner of fish and fisheries, be authorized to have the engraving for his report executed under the direction of the Joint Committee on Public Printing.

Mr. SHERMAN. That may involve a pretty large expense.

Mr. CONKLING. How many copies are to be printed?

Mr. ANTHONY. The work has already been ordered to be printed. The engraving itself has been ordered, and the cost of it will be about $1,000. Professor Baird desires, and he has convinced the committee that he is quite right, to have it done by a peculiar process, which cannot be done under the law without this resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

FREE BANKING—THE CURRENCY.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now submit my motion to take up House bill No. 1572.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1572) to amend the several acts providing a national currency and to establish free banking, and for other purposes.

The Committee on Finance reported an amendment, to strike out all of the bill after the enacting clause, in the following words:

That section 31 of the act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved on the 3d day of June, in the year 1864, be so amended that the several associations therein provided for shall not hereafter be required to keep on hand any amount of money whatever by reason of the amount of their respective circulations; but the moneys required by said section to be kept at all times on hand shall be determined by the amount of deposits, in all respects as provided for in the said section.

SEC. 2. That section 21 of the said act, and the several amendments thereto, so far as they restrict the amount of notes for circulation under said act, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and that section 1 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870, be amended by repealing the second proviso in said section contained. And the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide a national currency secured by pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof,'" approved on the 3d of March, 1865, be, and the same is hereby, repealed; and section 21 of the original act to which the act last aforesaid is an amendment be, and the same is hereby, re-enacted.

SEC. 3. That every association organized or to be organized, under the provisions of the said act, and of the several acts in amendment thereof, shall at all times keep and have on deposit in the Treasury of the United States, in lawful money of the United States, a sum equal to 5 per cent. of its circulation, to be held and used only for the redemption of such circulation; and when the cirulating notes of any such association or associations shall be presented, assorted or unassorted, for redemption, in sums of $1,000 or any multiple thereof, to the Treasurer or to any assistant treasurer of the United States, the same shall be redeemed in United States notes. All notes so redeemed shall be charged by the Comptroller of the Currency to the respective associations issuing the same, and he shall notify them severally on the first day of each month, or oftener, at his discretion, of the amount of such redemptions; whereupon each association so notified shall forthwith deposit with the Treasurer of the United States a sum in United States notes equal to the amount of its circulating notes so redeemed. And when such redemptions have been so reimbursed, the circulating notes so redeemed, or if worn, mutilated, or defaced, new notes instead, shall be forwarded to the respective associations: Provided, That each of said associations shall reimburse to the Treasury the costs of redemption and of supplying new notes in place of those redeemed. And the associations hereafter organized shall also severally reimburse to the Treasury the costs of engraving and printing their circulating notes: And provided further, That the entire amount of United States notes outstanding and in circulation at any one time shall not exceed the sum of $400,000,000 now authorized by existing law.

SEC. 4. That any association organized under this act, or any of the acts of which this is an amendment, desiring to withdraw its circulating notes, in whole or in part, may, upon deposit of lawful money within the meaning of said acts, in sums of not less than $10,000, with the Treasurer of the United States, withdraw a proportionate amount of bonds deposited in pledge of such circulation; and he shall redeem, cancel, and destroy an amount of the circulating notes of such association equal to the amount issued upon such bonds.

SEC. 5. That sections 31 and 32 of the said act be amended by requiring that each of the said associations shall keep its lawful-money reserves within its own vaults at the place where its operations of discount and deposit are carried on. And all the provisions of the said sections requiring or permitting any of the said associations to keep any portion of its lawful-money reserves elsewhere than in its own vaults, or requiring or permitting the redemption of its circulating notes elsewhere than at its own counter, except as provided for in this act, are hereby repealed.

SEC. 6. That upon all circulating notes hereafter issued, or hereafter to be issued, whenever the same shall come into the Treasury, in payment or deposit for redemption or otherwise, there shall be printed, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, the charter numbers of the associations by which they are severally issued.

And in lieu thereof to insert the following:

That the act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved June 3, 1864, shall be hereafter known as "the national-bank act of 1864."

SEC. 2. That section 31 of "the national-bank act of 1864" be so amended that the several associations therein provided for shall not hereafter be required to keep on hand any amount of money whatever by reason of the amount of their respective circulations; but the moneys required by said section to be kept at all times on hand shall be determined by the amount of deposits, in all respects as provided for in the said section; and each national banking association, now organized or hereafter to be organized, shall keep and maintain, as a part of its reserve, one-fourth part of the coin received by it as interest on bonds of the United States deposited as security for circulating notes or Government deposits.

SEC. 3. That sections 31 and 32 of the said act be amended by requiring that each of the said associations shall, within ninety days after the passage of this act, keep its lawful-money reserves within its own vaults at the place where its operations of discount and deposit are carried on. And all the provisions of the said sections requiring or permitting any of the said associations to keep any portion of its lawful-money reserves elsewhere than in its own vaults, or requiring or permitting the redemption of its circulating notes elsewhere than at its own counter, except as provided for in this act, are hereby repealed.

SEC. 4. That section 22 of the said act, and the several amendments thereto, so far as they restrict the amount of notes for circulation under said acts, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and the proviso in the first section of the act approved July 12, 1870, entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per. cent temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes," prohibiting to banks hereafter organized a circulation over $500,000; and the proviso in the third section of said act, limiting the circulation of banks authorized to issue notes redeemable in gold coin to $1,000,000; and section 6 of said act relating to the redistribution of twenty-five millions of circulating notes, be, and the same are hereby repealed; that every association hereafter organized shall be subject to, and be governed by, the rules, restrictions, and limitations, and possess the rights, privileges, and franchises, now or hereafter to be prescribed by law as to national banking associations, with the same power to amend, alter, and repeal provided by "the national-bank act of 1864."

SEC. 5. That every association organized, or to be organized, under the provisions of the said act, and of the several acts in amendment thereof, shall at all times keep and have on deposit in the Treasury of the United States, in lawful money of the United States, a sum equal to 5 per cent. of its circulation, to be held and used only for the redemption of such circulation; and when the circulating notes of any such association or associations shall be presented for redemption, in sums of $1,000 or any multiple thereof, to the Treasurer of the United States, the same shall be redeemed in United States notes. All notes so redeemed shall be charged by the Comptroller of the Currency to the respective associations issuing the same, and he shall notify them severally on the first day of each month, or oftener at his discretion, of the amount of such redemptions; whereupon each association so notified shall forthwith deposit with the Treasurer of the United States a sum in United States notes equal to the amount of its circulating notes so redeemed. And all notes of national banks worn, defaced, mutilated, or otherwise unfit for circulation, shall, when received by any assistant treasurer, or at any designated depository of the United States, be forwarded to the Treasurer of the United States for redemption as provided herein. And when such redemptions have been so reimbursed, the circulating notes so redeemed shall be forwarded to the respective associations by whom they were issued; but if such notes are worn, mutilated, defaced, or rendered otherwise unfit for use, they shall be forwarded to the Comptroller of the Currency and destroyed and replaced as now provided by law: Provided, That each of said associations shall reimburse to the Treasury the charges for transportation, and the costs for assorting such notes; and the associations hereafter organized shall also severally reimburse to the Treasury the cost of engraving such plates as shall be ordered by each association respectively; and the amount assessed upon each association shall be in proportion to the circulation redeemed, and be charged to the fund on deposit with the Treasurer.

SEC. 6. That any association organized under this act, or any of the acts of which this is an amendment, desiring to withdraw its circulating notes in whole or in part, may, upon the deposit of lawful money with the Treasurer of the United States in sums of not less than $9,000, take up the bonds which said association has on deposit with the Treasurer for the security of such circulating notes; which bonds shall be assigned to the bank in the manner specified in the nineteenth section of the national bank act of 1864; and the outstanding notes of said association, to an amount equal to the legal-tender notes deposited, shall be redeemed at the Treasury of the United States, and destroyed as now provided by law: Provided, That the amount of the bonds on deposit for circulation shall not be reduced below $30,000.

SEC. 7. That the Comptroller of the Currency shall, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, cause the charter numbers of the association to be printed upon all national-bank notes which may be hereafter issued by him.

SEC. 8. That the entire amount of United States notes outstanding and in circulation at any one time shall not exceed the sum of $382,000,000. And within thirty days after circulating notes to the amount of $1,000,000 shall, from time to time, be issued to national banking associations under this act, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to retire an amount of United States notes equal to 50 per cent. of the circulating notes so issued, which shall be in reduction of the maximum amount of $382,000,000 fixed by this section; and such reduction shall continue until the maximum amount of United States notes outstanding shall be $300,000,000. And for that purpose he is authorized to issue and sell at public sale, after ten days' notice of the time and place of sale, a sufficient amount of the bonds of the United States of the character and description prescribed in this act for United States notes to be then retired and canceled.

SEC. 9. That on and after the 1st day of January, 1877, any holder of United States notes to the amount of $1,000, or any multiple thereof, may present them for payment at the office of the Treasurer of the United States, or at the office of the assistant treasurer at the city of New York; and thereupon the Secretary of the Treasury shall, in exchange for said notes, deliver to such holder an equal amount of coupon or registered bonds of the United States in such form as he may prescribe, of denominations of fifty dollars, or some multiple of that sum, redeemable in coin of the present standard value, at the pleasure of the United States, after ten years from the date of their issue, and bearing interest, payable quarterly, in such coin, at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum. And the Secretary of the Treasury may reissue the United States notes so received, or, if they are canceled, may issue United States notes to the same amount, either to purchase or redeem the public debt at par in coin or to meet the current payments for the public service. And the said bonds, and the interest thereon, shall be exempt from the payment of all taxes or duties of the United States, as well as from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority; and the said bonds shall have set forth and expressed upon their face the above-specified conditions, and shall, with their coupons, be made payable at the Treasury of the United States: Provided, however, That the Secretary of the Treasury, in lieu of such bonds, may redeem said notes in the gold coin of the United States.

SEC. 10. That nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize any increase of the principal of the public debt of the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is not my purpose, Mr. President, to open any general financial debate on this bill. Every topic embraced in the bill was very fully discussed during the early part of the session, and I would deem it a violation of my public duty to detain the Senate long on this bill. I shall confine myself to a simple, brief statement of the terms of the bill, without any attempt to discuss the various propositions contained in it.

The central idea of this bill, or rather of the substitute reported by the Committee on Finance, is to make the business of banking free to all on the same terms and conditions and with the same limitations and restrictions embraced in the general popular phrase "free banking." If the business of banking was confined simply to contracts of loan and exchange, there could be no objection to free banking. The business would be simply the relation of debtor and creditor, resting entirely upon contract and confidence, and needing no franchise partnership or corporation except such as is authorized by law or would be freely granted by any State to promote any business or any enterprise. But the term "banking" in common parlance includes the power to issue circulating notes as money. This power is in no proper sense necessary to the business of banking. If I had my way I would grant it to no State corporation and to no individual, but confine it solely to the United States and use it merely to facilitate domestic exchanges, and only to an amount that at any time could be converted at the will of the holder into gold coin. Such, I believe, was the design of the framers of the Constitution, who, fresh from the disasters of paper money, desired to cut up and supposed they had cut up this evil by the roots. The prohibition to the States to issue bills of credit, fairly construed, prohibits all paper money issued by a State or by any corporation authorized by a State, while the power to borrow money by the United States implies that this power must be by a contract freely entered into by two consenting parties, payable alone in gold and silver coin.

If we were in a condition now to deal with this question solely upon principle, I would gladly join in prohibiting all paper money except such as may be issued by the United States for coin values and redeemable in coin only. But, sir, we must deal with this question as practical men. We know that during our whole history paper money has been issued by corporations, that the business of our people has been founded on it, that it has proven a convenient agency in developing our resources; and, whatever theory may prevail, that in practice some form of paper money has been and will be used in the United States either under the authority of the United States or of the States. We now have nearly two thousand banks authorized to issue $354,000,000 of paper money. Shall the restriction of the amount be now repealed and banking be made free to all? Section 4 of the substitute contains a repeal by name and description of every clause in the banking law which limits the amount of circulating notes. The first act of 1863 and that of 1864 limited the amount to $300,000,000. In 1870 that was extended to $354,000,000. This bill proposes to repeal the restriction upon the amount of bank circulation that may be issued provided the banks will comply with the terms of the banking law.

The first objection to free banking without coin redemption is that it is a novelty, an experiment, which though plausible will endanger that whole system. Other systems of free banking are based entirely upon coin redemption. There is no system of free banking in the world that I know of which is not redeemable in gold and silver coin. Consequently we meet the objection at the outset that if we now authorize free banking upon a currency basis without coin redemption, we are the only nation in the world that has done so to this time. Other systems of free banking are based upon coin redemption. For instance in New York, which was the first example of free banking, every note was redeemable at the counter of the bank and also in the city of New York in gold and silver coin. The State of Ohio followed the example of New York and established a very excellent system of what was called free banking. The notes were redeemable in coin. I am not familiar with the principle that prevailed in New England under the Suffolk Bank system, whether the banks were by charters granted by the States or whether there was any limit as to the amount of circulation or not.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. The latter part of the time they were limited.

Mr. SHERMAN. At all events, if they had a free-banking system in New England it was always on a coin basis, and wherever in New England there was free banking it was upon coin redemption. So in England, the Bank of England has practically the power to issue an unlimited amount of paper money; but after issuing a certain amount authorized by the charter of the Bank of England, every dollar of the Bank of England notes is based upon coin or bullion in the vaults of the bank, so that after all a Bank of England note is nothing but a certificate of coin or bullion on hand. I repeat again that while we now propose free banking, it is an experiment that has not been tried in other countries, but which we are willing to try upon the terms and conditions proposed by this bill.

Banks without coin redemption have always been carefully limited in amount. For instance in France, the Bank of France now has authority to issue paper money without the burden of coin redemption; but the amount is carefully limited to 3,200,000,000 francs. They have never gone up above twenty-nine hundred and odd millions, and are now reducing the amount; and the subject of restricting still more the limit of bank paper occupies the attention of the Legislative Assembly of France. So in the United States, we have authorized banking without coin redemption; but hitherto we have always done it upon a carefully limited basis. As I stated before, the first banking act carefully limited it to $300,000,000, and the act of 1870 to $354,000,000. These are the only examples I know of, in great commercial nations at least, of banking without coin redemption, and in these cases they have been carefully limited in the amount of circulation.

It has been urged very often that if we make the redemption of these notes secure by requiring absolute security in the hands of the Treasurer of the United States, this would dispense with coin redemption. That such a provision cannot be a substitute for redemption is shown by this simple fact, that to-day every bank in the United States has securities in the hands of the Treasurer of the United States worth one hundred and fifteen dollars in gold for ninety of notes; and yet the very notes thus secured are only worth eighty-nine cents in gold. The question of the security of the bank paper does not at all affect this question. It is a question as to whether it is payable or not, or whether a person who holds it can convert it into that which is superior in value, either coin or its equivalent. As a matter of course, if the bank paper could be converted at the will of the holder into the securities which are now held by the Government for its payment, that would make the notes at once worth par in gold. I say, therefore, that the objection to free banking which I have thus named is fatal, unless there is some provision either for coin redemption now or in the future at such time as the people will have reasonable confidence that that redemption will be observed.

The second objection to free banking is that the business of issuing paper money is a Government franchise; that the Government should have the profit of it. As I said a moment ago in opening my remarks in theory that is true, but in practice it is found entirely inconvenient. The power is to stamp paper money and practically to compel everybody in the United States to use it, because the power to refuse bank-paper money, although it is not a legal tender, is practically nugatory. Every individual must take it. It would seem that that ought to be a Government franchise, and that the Government alone should have the benefit of any profits that are made out of it; but in practice it is found that Government paper money cannot in all respects supply the place of bank-paper money, and I may very briefly point out the reasons and the difficulties in the way before I get through.

In the first place, here we have the fact that these national banks are in existence scattered all over the United States; that any attempt to withdraw bank-notes and substitute in their place greenbacks would disturb a business so enormous that the mere statement of the amount that would be affected by it would deter any prudent man from making the attempt. The nineteen hundred and seventy-six banks now organized have loaned to the people of the United States $944,220,000 in money. They have on hand to secure their circulation and their deposits $388,339,000 of bonds to be sold. If, therefore, the Government of the United States assumes, as it has the right to assume, the power to issue all the paper money in this country, one of two things must occur: either all the bonds now held as security for the circulation should be sold for money, thus depreciating the value of the bonds and deranging our financial affairs; or, what is still worse, the banks would be compelled to draw in from the people of the United States enough greenbacks to replace the notes they have outstanding, to collect all their bills receivable, and all the banks under their present organization would be compelled to retire from business. So that the practical effect of any attempt to change our system from the national banks to a paper money issued alone by the Government of the United States would be the withdrawal of loans to the amount of $944,000,000 and a sale of bonds to the amount of $388,000,000.

It is also sometimes complained that the Government of the United States loses money by the authority granted to the banks. Let us look at that for a moment in view of a few simple figures. The gains to the Government I will compute at the largest sum that has ever been claimed by any one. The circulation is now $354,000,000. There is now an actual currency reserve held under the law, and which is not very materially diminished, not merely a deposit reserve in the banks, but a currency reserve for this circulation of $92,500,000, making the amount of bank paper in addition to the greenbacks which by law they are compelled to hold and do now actually hold in the vaults of the banks $261,500,000. Now, if United States notes were at once to assume the place of all the bank-notes in the country to the amount of $261,500,000, the interest at the rate of 5 per cent. saved to the Government upon a coin basis would be $13,075,000. That is the highest amount that could be saved to the Government, without counting the fact that there is a depreciation now of the paper money, and consequently the interest would not be so high. Counting the interest on the whole at 5 per cent. in coin, the saving to the Government by withdrawing this circulation and substituting its own would be $13,075,000. But, on the other hand, look at the loss the Government would at once sustain. The taxes now imposed by the United States and by the State governments, all inuring to the benefit of the people of the United States, on the national banks are $18,000,000, increasing gradually with the increase of taxation in this country. If it may be supposed that one-half of this taxation is on the deposits of the banks and on the business of the banks which would be conducted under any circumstances, say $9,000,000, it would reduce the amount to $9,000,000, and this at once the Government of the United States and the people of the United States would lose because the bonds held by these banks are not taxable, and if the bank-notes are withdrawn, of course their bonds would not be taxed and there would be no circulation to be taxed. Under the present system we tax the circulation of national banks and we tax their capital in the form of bonds; and the amount of taxes thus levied upon property which, if the banking system were wiped out, would not be taxable per se in the absence of the national-bank system is probably about equal to 5 per cent. on all the circulation issued by the banks. The Comptroller of the Currency, who has gone into the calculation very carefully, thinks it is more, but I have taken the lowest figure any one has suggested.

Besides that, if the Government should assume this business of issuing notes, there would be the cost of maintaining resumption, because I take it that no man would propose that the Government should step in and issue United States notes unless it would also assume the burden of redeeming those notes in some form or other, either in the form of bonds or in the form of coin. The time has gone by, and I have not heard in all this long debate any Senator claim that he would be in favor of issuing greenbacks, actual promises to pay, and compelling the people to take them, without supplementing them and supporting them by some plan of redemption, either in some form of bond—and a three sixty-five interest bond is the lowest any one has named—or in actual coin.

There is another difficulty in regard to the substitution of United States notes for bank-notes. United States notes can only be paid out for Government dues. If a person has a claim against the United States and presents it to the Government, the Government may pay it in United States notes; but Government notes have not that quality of flexibility which is indispensable to a circulating medium, because Government can only pay out its notes in payment of dues against itself. The Government cannot loan money; it cannot promote private business; it cannot move the crops; it cannot do anything of that kind. No man is so wild in this country as to propose that the Government of the United States should become a banker to deal in negotiable bills, to make loans and discounts. It is simply contrary to the theory of our Government, and would embark the Government of the United States in a business for which it is ill-adapted. Indeed it is totally inadmissible to even think of such a thing. Therefore, on a system of United States notes alone without bank currency, you cannot have that quality of flexibility, the ebb and flow of loans and discounts which is necessary to transact business, the payments sometimes requiring more, sometimes less. That function of a currency cannot be supplied by Government notes. It must be supplied by bank paper or by private credit or private capital employed either by corporations or by individuals.

Then there is another thing. Under a system which would have only one kind of currency, and that a currency of United States notes, there is no possibility of a distribution of banking capital. We know the great value of the banking system is the fact that a bank is located in every considerable town of the United States and that that bank furnishes a center of capital where money can be borrowed, where money can be loaned, where money can be deposited, where drafts can be purchased, where exchanges can be conducted. On a system of United States notes alone it would be impossible to distribute the benefit of those notes so as to secure loans and to promote discounts and exchanges.

These are objections which have been stated over and over again, and I sum them up here all together to show that a system of currency depending alone upon United States notes, even if it had not other objections to it, would not be practicable in this country; and the experience of the country from the first organization of the Government to this time only bears it out. So, while in theory it would seem to be best that all notes intended to circulate as money should have the stamp of the Government upon them and that the Government should derive profit from their circulation, yet I believe after all that the mixed system which we adopted under the pressure of war—a system of notes issued by the United States redeemable practically in coin as the basis of our paper money, and then other notes equally secure, equally valuable, issued by the United States but also issued by banks—furnishes the best system of paper money that has yet been devised in the history of man; and I think that is the judgment of most of the statesmen and financiers of Europe who have given attention to this matter. While the Government may properly issue its notes in the ordinary course of its business to meet its demands, to meet the exigencies of war, and now since the war is over to meet the ordinary arrangements of peace, provided they are maintained at coin, banks also, in some form or other, may issue paper money, and those banks may be wisely distributed over the whole country and their notes may be increased or diminished as the wants of the community may require; and that combination furnishes us as good a system of paper money as can be devised.

It is said sometimes, and this remark is very commonly made, that at all events banks would be organized, even if the Government issued all the notes, as banks of exchange or deposit. All I can say is that the right to issue circulating notes is a great inducement to the organization of banks of exchange and deposit. There is no agency of civil life, there is no agency or convenience of our day more useful for all business of every kind than convenient mediums of exchange and deposit called banks. They are indispensable in manufacturing communities; they are convenient in agricultural communities. Without them commerce cannot be conducted in any large transaction. Therefore banks are necessary, whether they are conducted by private individuals or corporations. How they shall be governed is another thing. The right in a bank to issue bank-notes and to redeem them promptly, so as to be able under the pressure of want, when there is a necessity to loan money, to increase its power to loan, to give it facilities to meet the ebb and flow of business, is eminently beneficial to every community; and therefore it is that there is a complaint in certain sections that they have not their share of banking facilities. They want banks for their convenience, not for the money made out of them, because it is shown clearly that very little money is made by the circulation of bank-notes, but because it is convenient and important in the transaction of all business—farming, planting, manufacturing, mining—to have convenient mediums of exchange by means of banks; and it is a great aid and inducement to organize banks and distribute them over the country, if the banks can add to their means the power to issue their notes to circulate as money.

I have compared these two systems, and there are one or two qualities in which the two are alike. There is no difference between a bank-note and a Government note in these respects. They are alike printed by the Government and guarded against counterfeiting; and that is an invaluable advantage. In 1863 when the national bank-note system was first proposed, I introduced in the Senate—it has so long gone by now that people have forgotten it—statistics on the amount of counterfeiting and counterfeit notes and the number of bank-bills that then existed. I showed that more than one-fifth of the currency was counterfeited or suspected of being counterfeited. I produced, I remember, a large book called a counterfeit detector, and the number of counterfeit notes that were described in that book was as multitudinous almost as the sands of the sea. The present system has undoubtedly supplemented and greatly improved the old. All the notes, whether issued by the United States or for the benefit of the banks, are printed by the Government. They are guarded against counterfeiting. In these two qualities both are precisely alike. There is no more danger of counterfeiting the bank-note than there is of the United States note. They both rest upon the public faith. The United States promises to pay its notes at the earliest day practicable in coin. The bank-note contains a similar promise to pay in United States notes; and in addition to that, being a private corporation, the bank secures that promise by Government bonds. So that both rest upon the public faith and neither can be violated without public dishonor.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Will the Senator allow me to make a statement which is in connection with the observations which he is now making?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The United States notes since the new paper was introduced have never been counterfeited, that is the dollar notes and those larger than a dollar, so as to obtain any circulation whatever since 1869; but as matter of fact, although the law is the same concerning the counterfeiting of bank-notes, they are counterfeited and counterfeits are in circulation. That is due, I think, to the neglect of Congress in not providing for a new issue.

Mr. SHERMAN. And one of the great benefits of this bill is that it will provide for the rapid but gradual withdrawal of the present bank-notes and the substitution of new ones. There ought to be no difference between United States notes and bank-notes in any of the qualities I have mentioned, guarding against counterfeiting and security in every way, and there is the additional fact that these notes are of uniform value throughout the United States. United States notes or bank-notes travel everywhere, wherever the flag floats or our jurisdiction extends, without any doubt or question as to their solvency.

In these three particulars it does not make any difference to the people whether the currency is in the form of bank paper or in the form of United States notes. The question as to whether it is best to issue United States notes or bank-notes depends upon the convenience of the people, and the argument in favor of the bank-notes is, first, that the banks may be distributed throughout the country so as to do the ordinary daily business of the country; then they furnish a medium of taxation to support not only the national, but the State and local governments, and they are convenient agencies for the transaction of the ordinary business of the people, and United States notes cannot be made in any way as convenient agencies for that purpose. And yet, notwithstanding all this, I say in theory there is no reason in the world why the Government of the United States should not issue its notes, provided only that it will maintain them at par in coin, and if they make subsidiary to this power the power of banks freely to issue their notes upon terms and conditions equal and exact to all.

Now, Mr. President, this is the purpose of this bill, to make free banking subject to these conditions. If, on the other hand——

Mr. MERRIMON. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. MERRIMON. I beg to ask the chairman of the Committee on Finance a question before he passes from this point in his speech. He has told the Senate that his bill, or rather the bill reported by the committee, provides free banking, and that it is free because there is no limit in terms upon the volume. It provides, however, for the reduction of the volume of greenbacks to $300,000,000. The question I desire to propound to him now is, if the volume of greenbacks stands at $300,000,000, what volume of bank currency will that authorize? And if he answers that question, then I ask him whether that does not amount to a limitation upon the privilege of banking?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will come to that point very soon. I wish to examine a few points here upon which we all agree before I reach those upon which there is controversy. I shall call the attention of the Senate to them.

I would say further, in connection with the point that I have already made, that if the United States notes are to continue irredeemable, as a matter of course there is no reason in the world why all the notes should not be issued by the United States rather than by the United States and banks. It is perfectly idle, perfectly farcical, to require the banks to file bonds to secure the redemption of their notes to the amount of one hundred and fifteen dollars for ninety dollars, and yet at the same time talk about redemption. As long as the United States notes are irredeemable the whole ought to be in that form.

But I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the important fact that when the national-bank system was started, it was declared by every person who voted for it and by every member who spoke in that debate, which continued for some three or four weeks here, that the national-bank notes were intended to replace the greenbacks at the close of the war; that under the provisions of the law as it then stood on the day the first banking act passed in 1863, the notes and the bonds were convertible one into the other and would stand always upon the same level, and as the bonds rose to par in gold the notes necessarily rose to par in gold; and then the very right that is conferred by this bill, not to take effect, however, until the 1st of January, 1877, was conferred upon the note-holder. But it was then supposed, when the first banking act was passed, that at the close of the war, as soon as our bonds would sell at par in gold, the United States notes would be par in gold, and then the burden of redemption would fall upon the banks. There is no argument in favor of the banking system unless the banks assume the burden of redemption. If they do not redeem the national banks should fall, and I never have and never will stand up before the people of the United States and insist upon giving to the banks the right to issue irredeemable paper when the whole theory and purpose and object of the national banking system was to relieve the United States at the close of the war from the necessity of maintaining actual coin redemption. The notes it was supposed would then be converted into bonds, and the national banks would then step in and maintain their notes at par in gold and subject to the most rigorous coin redemption; and the acts of 1863 and 1864 contained the most positive provisions requiring redemption in coin.

There is another objection to free banking, which I will mention very briefly, that without redemption every additional issue of notes inevitably depreciates the whole mass of notes. I take it, this is so clear an axiom that it is scarcely worth while to discuss it. In the absence of redemption every additional note added to the volume of paper currency will depreciate its purchasable power. That is a proposition so plain that it cannot be proven any more than you can prove that twice two make four, unless you take two blocks and put two more blocks to them and count four. That is the very nature of an axiom; you cannot prove it. Why is a bank-note depreciated? Not because it is not secure, not because the ultimate payment is not provided for. Why is a United States note depreciated? Not because anybody believes the United States will not pay it eventually in coin; but it is depreciated simply because there is too much of that paper to be maintained at par in gold. By the judgment of the world its market value is sunk below par in gold; and therefore that is the best evidence in the world that there is too much of it to be maintained at par in gold, and every addition to the volume of it would necessarily sink it lower and lower. You cannot make the proposition plainer.

This, therefore, involves the question of public faith. If we provide for the issuing of more paper money to any extent without counteracting provisions looking to its redemption, we do violate that pledge of the public faith made by the act of March, 1869. That act provides that we will redeem the United States notes in coin "at the earliest practicable period." Any one who undertakes to prove that you fulfill that promise or pledge by depreciating the purchasable power of these notes by your own action, by act of Congress, without violating the public faith, it seems to me will have a very difficult task. It is not sufficient to say in reply to this that we intend always to keep that promise in view, we intend at some time to make it good. The promise itself implies that we will steadily pursue a policy that will gradually but surely advance us to the standard of coin. Therefore the issuing of more paper money without some provision for redemption inevitably depreciates it, and that just as inevitably violates, pro tanto, the public faith pledged by the United States.

Now, Mr. President, I have stated the objections to free banking as they are made not only by the popular voice, but as they have been made here and probably will be made again. I know that many Senators who now hear me, and who will probably vote with some hesitation for free banking, feel afraid of it. They are afraid that free banking may operate injuriously and disastrously; that the amount of paper money will be issued so rapidly as to affect the public credit and endanger it; and I admit it. I admit that there is that danger, and we have endeavored in this bill to guard against it.

But there are some advantages in free banking that I must not pass by, and one is that it repeals the monopoly of banking. If there is anything in the world that the people of the United States hate it is a monopoly; a right conferred upon one man and not upon another; a right conferred upon one corporation and not upon another; a right enjoyed by one community and not enjoyed by another. It is the Anglo-Saxon feeling of hatred to monopoly. The word "monopoly" is one of the most odious words in the language. Therefore the idea of free banking is not only popular, but it is just. The only reason why the monopoly was provided in the beginning was because we were afraid to embark in an unlimited amount of these paper issues without some restriction as to the amount, and we could not abolish that restriction as to amount until we had changed the character of these notes so as to make a uniform rule entirely safe to the people of the United States. It is a great advantage, I say, to our system of currency to abolish all monopolies, to put all people upon the same footing, so that there will be no further controversy about it.

Accompanied therefore by proper measures of redemption we may avoid the danger of depreciation, and it will enable us to reach specie payment at the earliest practicable period.

I know that here I am met with an objection to free banking—and I am speaking now of those who voted with me, and perhaps I might say I have seen it also in a document from another branch of the Government—that we might safely postpone free banking until we had actually reached coin resumption. In my judgment, that would not be wise; nor is it necessary. It is only necessary to show to the people of the United States, to convince every man who is engaged in the business of banking, that it is our determination to redeem these notes in coin, and, secondly, that we have the ability to redeem them, and then we can make banking free. When we declare, on the one hand, that all restrictions on banking are abolished, and at the same time that all banks are subject to certain conditions which will inevitably as fate redeem the promise of the United States to pay its own notes, and also throw upon the banks the obligation that rests upon them to redeem their notes in coin or its equivalent, I think free banking is perfectly safe; and when we show that we have the ability to maintain it, that we have the means on hand to maintain it, that every provision of our bill can be without doubt or danger and with certainty be carried out, and that it is within the power of the United States to redeem in the bonds proposed by this bill, we have relieved every objection that could be reasonably made to free banking now in advance of actual coin redemption. But, sir, free banking in advance of a disposition to redeem, a willingness to redeem, or an ability to redeem, is simply a delusive promise and a delusive hope; and therefore free banking should be accompanied by measures which will certainly bring us up to the standard of gold, according to the terms and stipulations contained in the bill.

Now, Mr. President, I wish very briefly (for I have already spoken longer than I intended) to call attention to the provisions for redemption contained in this bill; and without some such provisions I am free to say that I will not vote for free banking, nor for any enlargement of paper money. It is no use for us to discuss our fixed convictions on this point. My purpose in the preparation of this bill has been, and the Committee on Finance have been governed by the same idea, to go just as far as they dare go according to their conscientious conviction of public duty, to make this operation as easy as possible, and yet to secure redemption, to provide for free banking and redemption, always keeping in view the pledges of the public faith; and, for one, in these provisions I have gone only so far as was absolutely necessary in my opinion to show our ability to redeem and our willingness to redeem.

The first feature which looks to redemption is contained in section 5. If Senators will do me the kindness to look at these sections as I refer to them, it will save me the trouble of reading them. Section 5 provides that every banking association organized or to be organized shall deposit in the Treasury of the United States the sum of 5 per cent. of the amount of its circulation, and shall redeem all its notes presented there for redemption. This is a currency redemption, a redemption in greenbacks. I have not any idea that this section will operate very much for a while, except to bring in the mutilated, torn, defaced, and otherwise injured notes to be replaced by others. I cannot see in the present condition of affairs that there will be any motive for presenting these notes for redemption except the motive of securing clean, nice paper money instead of ragged, mutilated money, and that is a motive of a very proper character. Our bank paper money now has become so defaced and in some places so soiled and so injured that it is unfit to pass in circulation, and this measure will have a most beneficial effect in that way without too great a burden to the banks.

As a corresponding benefit to the banks, so as not to make the bill too oppressive, we have relieved them from the necessity of maintaining a reserve for circulation. There is no argument in favor of a reserve for circulation. The circulation is amply secured by bonds, and there is no necessity for maintaining a reserve of 15 per cent. for circulation when in fact no money is, has been, or will be presented for redemption. I doubt very much whether 1 per cent. of the notes of any bank since its organization has been presented to that bank for redemption. In lieu of the 15 per cent. reserve maintained for redemption, we require them to maintain this 5 per cent. in the Treasury of the United States to maintain actual and practical redemption and to secure the ebb and flow of this paper money.

In order to avoid all practical difficulties in the way, the Committee on Finance took the pains not only to inquire of bankers and business men throughout the country as to the effect of this section, but also to inquire of General Spinner, Treasurer of the United States, and Comptroller Knox their view of it, whether it would be difficult, expensive, or impracticable, and we have the hearty assurance of every one, bankers, citizens, and officers of the Government, that the section could not be oppressive to anybody. Indeed General Spinner estimated the cost of this process I think at only $60,000; but the very highest estimate that was put upon it by any one was one-fifth of 1 per cent. upon the amount of notes that were redeemed. If $100,000,000 should be presented for redemption within a year, and I should hope that much would be, because there is $100,000,000 of it that is unfit for circulation, it would at once be exchanged for the new notes, and they would be sent back to the banks and sent out among the people in the course of the year, and the whole cost according to the highest estimate, which was one-fifth of 1 per cent., would be $200,000 a year, and it is not probable that more than $100,000,000 could be presented in any one year. But whatever the cost may be, however, the bill provides that it shall be paid by the banks to be assessed in proportion to the amount redeemed. This would be practical redemption in greenbacks, and that is what we have never had heretofore.

The next clause which looks to some provision for redemption is contained in section 2, which has been somewhat modified by the committee since the bill was reported, and the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOTT,] who has it in charge, will offer that amendment. That is to require one-fourth of the amount of the gold paid to the banks to be retained as a reserve in the banks in lieu of so much currency. That has been already debated and passed and received the sanction of the Senate, and is also contained in substance in the House bill. Indeed nearly all the provisions I now refer to are provisions contained in the House bill. The Senator from Pennsylvania intends to offer an amendment which meets my approval, and perhaps will meet that of the Senate, for a way in which this gold may be utilized temporarily until final resumption is attained, which he will explain.

The third provision which looks to redemption is the eighth section, which I regard as the vital section of the bill providing for the redemption of these notes; and that is that section which requires that as $1,000,000 of circulating notes shall have been issued for thirty days among the people, half a million of United States notes shall be retired and canceled. So vital do I regard this provision of the bill that I certainly cannot vote for any enlargement of paper money without it. In order to make the basis of a fair and just compromise, if that word is not out of date and out of fashion, to show that while we were willing to extend to the people of the United States every facility in the amount of paper money without restriction, we adopted one-half as the basis of a compromise; and here, Senators, is the point upon which this bill is probably to fail or not. Why retire the greenbacks? The people are in love with the greenbacks, we are told. The reason is because they are depreciated below par in coin; and if you pass this bill without making any provision whatever to increase the value and purchasable power of the greenbacks, you actually depreciate their purchasable power by adding to the volume of paper money the amount that would be added by a system of free banking, and you violate the public faith, you violate the public honor, you turn your back upon the pledges of parties and the pledges of Congress. There is a fatal objection to commence with, but that is not all.

Every dollar of these notes retired necessarily adds value to the whole mass. It is the greenback that is not redeemed. It is not the bank paper that is in the way. The bank paper never was in the way. If it were not for the greenbacks the banks could be compelled to pay their notes in coin to-day, or to-morrow, or at any time; and the material is on hand to pay them in their bonds in the Treasury. Therefore by retiring the greenbacks you necessarily add to the value of the mass of paper, because you retire that which is the cause of the depreciation. This is the principal provision of the bill that looks to the maintenance of these notes at or near par in gold. This operation goes on until the amount of United States notes is reduced to $300,000,000. So far as I am concerned I would very much like to see that restriction of $300,000,000 repealed, and let the process go on to the extent that bank-notes may be issued. But I take it, as a matter of practical belief based upon the opinion of many experienced men, that if the amount of greenbacks was reduced to three hundred millions, that amount could be maintained at par in gold. At all events the other provisions of the bill will undoubtedly in the course of two or three years maintain them in par at coin. This provision has already been discussed so often in the Senate that I do not propose to comment further on it now.

The fourth provision in this bill, looking toward redemption, is the provision in the ninth section, which has been debated here so often that I need not enlarge upon it. However, in order to avoid any sudden or violent change in value, in order to give time for the operation of this bill, the Committee on Finance have postponed the operation of that provision until the 1st of January, 1877. On that day we now promise to do precisely what we promised to do when the greenback was issued. We promise the holders of the greenbacks, if they want it and desire it, that they may then present them to the Treasury of the United States and receive a 5 per cent. bond. This section is somewhat changed in its phraseology since it was reported before, but it is in effect the same. It provides for an alternative redemption either in bonds or coin, the alternative being with the Treasury of the United States; and there is nothing new in it. All that it does is to restore that feature and privilege given to the greenback when it was first issued, a privilege and feature that were always maintained until the close of the war; never departed from until we chose by our legislation to advance the bond at the expense of the greenback and dissolve the marriage that had always existed between them until the close of the war. But this is a section familiar to the Senate, and it is not necessary for me to discuss it.

There is one provision, however, which I will take this opportunity to explain. It is said, "Why reissue these notes for current expenses; will not this necessarily increase the public debt?" I say not at all. The necessity of maintaining that provision grows out of this fact, that we now have a deficiency of currency revenue. Our currency revenue is only about $100,000,000; our gold revenue is nearly $200,000,000. The result is, that now we are compelled to sell our gold in order to get currency to pay the current expenses of the Government. If we were not compelled to sell the gold received by us from customs, we could use in redeeming bonds all the surplus gold, amounting to $60,000,000, or more than that perhaps, the interest on the public debt being $100,000,000 and the sinking fund $30,000,000. We might use our excess of gold directly for the payment of the 6 per cent. bonds of the United States at par, without discount, without commission, and without the use of agent or syndicate. All the surplus gold that comes into the Treasury might be used directly, surely, monthly, in the liquidation and payment of the 6 per cent. bonds of the United States, and to the extent that currency flows into the Treasury for the 5 per cent. bonds that currency might be used for the payment of the current expenses, instead of meeting them by the sale of gold, and to the extent that those notes are presented for redemption, to the full extent that anybody claims they will be presented for redemption, we can convert our 6 per cent. bonds into 5 per cent. bonds without costs, commissions, or exchange.

But this is only an incident to the general feature; and the reason why bonds instead of coin ought to be stipulated for is because we cannot now say that we can actually promise beyond all danger or doubt to pay coin at the time named. If Congress were willing to pass the requisite taxes we might maintain a system of actual coin redemption, although I think it would not be desirable to do it. I certainly would not vote for actual coin redemption at any fixed period. But instead of coin, we can promise to do what we have the power to do, give our bond.

It is said that we lose interest; that if a man gives up a note not bearing interest and takes our note or bond bearing interest, we thereby lose interest. Ought we not to do so? Why should the United States, or any bank, or anybody, have the power to force its note into circulation as money when it refuses to pay interest on it to those who desire interest on their money? There is no reason for it in the world. This also fixes a time after the next presidential election, so that I hope that will not mingle in this contest—the 1st of January, 1877, when we shall have reached practical coin redemption.

Mr. President, these are the general features of the bill, and in my judgment, with due deference to the opinions of the Senate, it ought to be taken as a whole. It is manifest that here are two provisions, one providing for an increase of paper money, the other providing for its increased value; one providing for more money, the other providing for better money. You cannot have more money without making provision to make that money better, unless you violate the public faith. Therefore I submit to the Senate in all candor and sincerity that they ought to take this bill as a whole, and not tear it to pieces and compel those who are friendly to the system of free banking to vote against it, because there is not accompanied with the provision for free banking such a system of redemption as will prevent the depreciation of the notes.

Mr. LOGAN. Before the Senator takes his seat I desire to ask him a question. I do not want to discuss this proposition. I have not heard his remarks as to the immediate effect of this bill on the country, as to whether it is contraction or expansion immediately.

Mr. SHERMAN. I always avoid as far as I can the use of phrases which deceive and mislead. The use of "contraction," and "expansion," and "inflation," and all those words, does not convey distinctly any meaning which ought to guide us in the consideration of a practical measure of legislation. But, to come nearer to the point, I will say to the Senator from Illinois that each section of this bill may have a different tendency; and if I were to answer him specifically I would say that the first section of the bill at once places in circulation all the reserves now held by the banks as a security for circulation. There is another section of the bill which, on the other hand, by withdrawing the reserves for deposits from the banks in New York and requiring them to be maintained in the vaults of the respective banks, would tend, in the first instance, to contract the currency; that is, it would transfer currency from where it is admitted to be superabundant to regions of the country where it is claimed to be insufficient. So I should have to go over, section by section, the whole bill.

Mr. LOGAN. I am only asking, as a whole, what the immediate effect of the bill will be.

Mr. SHERMAN. As a whole, undoubtedly the effect of this bill is to increase the volume of paper money, and it cannot be otherwise, because it has no effect to cancel a single dollar of the paper now outstanding except as twice as much more is issued. Therefore the immediate effect and the effect of the whole must necessarily be to expand the currency, but with such qualifications and with such provisions and with such pledges in the future as will prevent its depreciation.

Mr. LOGAN. I hope the Senator will not understand that I am disposed to catechise him or to make any particular criticism; I merely wish to understand the bill for myself. If I am incorrect, I shall be very glad to be corrected by the Senator; but I understand the second section of the bill to release all reserves on national-bank circulation. Is that the effect?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. That, then, I understand to be a release of that money and putting it into circulation which is now withheld from circulation, amounting to about $42,000,000 taking the three-fifths. Is there more than $42,000,000 as reserve now on the circulation which is not in circulation?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think the Senator could, and I certainly cannot, draw the distinction now between the reserve on circulation and that on deposits except by a computation.

Mr. LOGAN. A computation is what I am talking of.

Mr. SHERMAN. We know very well that the whole currency reserve now for circulation is about 19 per cent.—15 per cent. for the country banks and 25 per cent. for the city banks.

Mr. LOGAN. Twenty per cent., taking the average.

Mr. SHERMAN. Three-fifths of that may be held in the banks in the redemption cities, so that the actual currency reserve for circulation is about 10 per cent., as near as I can calculate.

Mr. LOGAN. It makes no difference about the percentage; but here is the point I want to get at. I will state it because we ought to understand what we are to vote for; and I know the Senator has no disposition not to give the information. Let us make the calculation on 20 per cent., the banks in the redemption cities being required by the banking law to have a reserve of 25 per cent., and the banks outside of the redemption cities being required by law to have 15 per cent.; but by the same law they are permitted to have three-fifths of this in circulation in the redemption cities. Taking the average at 20 per cent., there would be in round numbers over $70,000,000 reserve on circulation. Three-fifths of that $70,000,000 are already in circulation under the law. If you take two-fifths of that reserve on circulation which is in the banks locked up as we may say by the law, and what is it? It is $35,000,000 at the Senator's computation; call it that, though it is about $42,000,000. Put it at $35,000,000. That amount, then, will be released by this bill. But right following that is section 3, which requires that the reserve of three-fifths on deposits, instead of remaining in circulation, shall be withdrawn from circulation and locked up in the banks.

Mr. SHERMAN. The reserve on deposits the Senator now refers to.

Mr. LOGAN. Yes; the deposits in the national banks of the United States are reported by the Comptroller at about $940,000,000, I think.

Mr. SHERMAN. The entire aggregate is eight or nine hundred million dollars.

Mr. LOGAN. The deposits on which a reserve is required are certainly over $600,000,000; I will take the lowest figure. I know from computations and from examinations which I have made that that is the least figure, and I will take that figure, $600,000,000. You then by this third section lock up three-fifths of the reserve on $600,000,000 of deposits to-day locked up, while you let out two-fifths of the reserve on circulation. That lets out $35,000,000, and then you lock up the three-fifths of the reserve on $600,000,000. Put that at 20 per cent. and it would be $120,000,000, and three-fifths of $120,000,000 you lock up, and you let out two-fifths of $70,000,000. That is the difference. By these two sections, comparing them, an immediate contraction of over $40,000,000 is effected. These two sections, the second and third, have that effect, and no man with the figures before him can compute it in any other way.

I make this suggestion not for the purpose of making opposition to the bill or of catechising the Senator, but to let the Senate understand the facts in connection with the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have the tables before me.

Mr. LOGAN. I will take the Senator's statement for what I want, though I have the book. I want to know the effect of the measure.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am perfectly willing to answer the question. The amount of legal-tender reserve held on the 12th of September, when it was about what it is now, was $92,347,663, of which I think about $40,000,000 would be on circulation and the balance, $52,000,000, would be the reserve on deposits; and the release from circulation will be of the whole of that balance, but the banks will be required to maintain at home the whole of the reserve on deposits.

Mr. LOGAN. The whole of the three-fifths of the reserve on deposits, which three-fifths is now in circulation.

Mr. SHERMAN. Would the Senator like to see a bank conducted anywhere in this country with less than 19 per cent. of reserve, money on hand, of the amount of its deposits to meet them?

Mr. LOGAN. The question is not whether I would like to see that or not. I voted for that once. But the question that I asked was for the purpose of getting the immediate effect of this bill on the country. The point is not what I should like; but I want to understand what it will do. I say that according to the Senator's own answer these two sections, 2 and 3, do immediately contract the amount of reserve now in circulation on the deposits and on the circulation. There is no question about that. No man can look at it for a moment without seeing that that is the effect.

I am not disposed to make an argument or a speech during this discussion, and I do not intend to do so. I said all I wanted to say on the subject of currency long ago. I only want to get at the facts so that I may know how to vote understandingly. There is then in these two sections an immediate contraction. Any man can calculate the amount with his pencil. I say it amounts to about forty millions. It may be less; but I have figured on it, and that is the least I can make it.

Now I want to ask the Senator a question which I hope he will answer as frankly as he did the other, in reference to the 50 per cent. contraction of United States notes which are commonly called greenbacks. I want to get at how much contraction of greenbacks or United States notes will occur under that particular section which requires a contraction of 50 per cent. of greenbacks on the amount issued of national-bank circulation. Under the section that contracts the greenbacks 50 per cent., how much in excess of that in circulation would the country get under this bill if it were passed?

Mr. SHERMAN. That will depend entirely upon how many banks are organized.

Mr. LOGAN. Suppose we say fifty millions of national-bank circulation are issued under the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. If fifty millions of national-bank circulation were issued, half of that would be twenty-five millions; but so far as the authority of this bill is concerned, there may be five hundred millions of bank-notes issued.

Mr. LOGAN. I understand that; but we are fixing an amount so as to get at the actual contraction.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the Senator ought not to call me to my feet to answer so plain a question as that.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator then says it would be twenty-five millions on the basis of the issue of $50,000,000 bank-notes. Now let me make a suggestion to the Senator that he may see whether he is not mistaken. I say under this section (and I put it to the Senator to answer whether I am correct or not) requiring with the issue of national-bank currency a contraction of 50 per cent. of greenbacks, with other provisions in connection with it, your fifty millions will not give you five millions of actual circulation. Let me see whether I am not correct. You issue fifty millions of national-bank circulation and you contract 50 per cent. of greenbacks on its issue. That is twenty-five millions contracted, is it not? Then you put away 25 per cent. of the $50,000,000, and lock it in the banks, because you close up the privilege allowed under the present law.

Mr. SHERMAN. They can issue the whole of the circulation without reserve.

Mr. LOGAN. I understand that, certainly; but there is this proposition in banking that every man understands: no national bank can run profitably without deposits equal to the circulation. The Senator laughs; he may be a banker and understand it better than I do; I do not know. My impression is, and I think my evidence is as good perhaps as that of anybody else, and I am sure you cannot call a banker to the stand who will deny the simple proposition, that there is not a bank in the United States that is running to-day and making money which has not a larger amount of deposits than it has of circulation.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. May I suggest to the Senator that I think it has been conceded on the part of those who are arguing in favor of the bill as it is now printed that circulation pays but 2 per cent. profit? I think the chairman of the committee has so said.

Mr. LOGAN. I was going on with this proposition now. We have a circulation of $354,000,000 of bank-notes. The lowest estimate of deposits is $600,000,000, or nearly double the circulation; hence a bank as it stands to-day has double the amount of deposits that it has of circulation, and I say here without any fear of contradiction by any man who understands banking that no bank can run profitably unless its deposits are equal to or more than its circulation. Taking that for granted, then you issue $50,000,000 circulation and withdraw $25,000,000 of United States notes. The banks then, under this bill, in order to comply with the law, on their deposits must withdraw what? They must withdraw from the circulation that is now out 25 per cent. more of the circulation in order to hold a reserve on their deposits. If the deposits equal the circulation, then you have 75 per cent. contraction of your circulation, have you not?

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator from Illinois permit me to ask him a question? Is he not falling into this mistake? As soon as $50,000,000 of national-bank notes are issued the $25,000,000 of legal tenders are retired. That leaves an excess of $25,000,000 of national-bank circulation as soon as the banks are organized. Now he assumes that that national-bank circulation is withdrawn in some manner or other when the deposits are made. But the bank is not required to keep any reserve until it gets deposits; and its own circulation put out is supposed to be added to the volume of the currency in the country, and can only get back in the form of deposits.

Mr. LOGAN. I understand that; but the Senator mistakes what I was driving at entirely. He says I am under the impression that the banks withdraw a portion of their circulation. I am under no such impression. I am under the impression that this bill requires them to put 25 per cent. of United States notes on their deposits in their vaults and lock them up, and not on their circulation. I say then that when the deposits grow, as deposits do grow, they must take 25 per cent. of United States notes and lock them up as reserve. Is not that true under this bill and under all the laws? As the deposits grow, there is a withdrawal of greenbacks to the amount of 25 per cent. from the time the first dollar is deposited. Hence from the time the first dollar is deposited in these banks, there is withdrawn 25 per cent. from circulation, not of your bank circulation but from the general circulation of greenbacks. Is not that true? Then if a bank's deposits equal its circulation, you have 75 per cent. of greenbacks withdrawn from circulation.

Then in your bill you provide further that 5 per cent. in excess of this must be deposited in the Treasury for redemption purposes. That makes 80 per cent.

Thus, on your issue of $50,000,000, bank-notes, you have an issue of $50,000,000, and you have 80 per cent. of the $50,000,000 in greenbacks withdrawn; so that you have 20 per cent. of the issue in circulation. That is all you have under this bill. Further, the Senator says with free banking you may go on ad libitum. True, you may go on to any extent; but until $82,000,000 of greenbacks are absorbed by the issuing of national-bank currency, you get but 20 per cent. addition, and probably less than that. If the deposits exceed the circulation, as they do in nearly every bank in the United States that is worth a copper, you will withdraw all or nearly all that is issued up to the time you issue $164,000,000 of national-bank notes under this bill. Nobody pretends that $164,000,000 of national-bank currency will be issued in any very great haste. Of the men on this floor who have been denounced bitterly on account of their desire for an increase of the currency, not one has ever said that national-banks would grow up like mushrooms. We know better. Every man knows better than that. It is a slow process, and will be. Then, up to the time that you get your $164,000,000 of bank currency issued under this bill, you are withdrawing, if the deposit amounts to anything, 80 per cent. of the United States circulation; I mean 80 per cent. of the amount you issue of national-bank notes; and you cannot figure it up in any other way. If you can, your mathematics are different from mine.

I put this question and give these figures for the purpose of showing, if I am correct, that this bill does a great deal more than it pretends to do. It is not a bill that gives an increase of circulation rapidly or even slowly to amount to anything. My purpose in rising was merely to call the attention of the Senate to the facts that exist in connection with it; and I say when this bill requires a withdrawal of 50 per cent. with all the machinery that there is connected with it, there is not a thing of value in the bill. One thing in it stands off against the other, and there is nothing in it except the mere name of free banking. I merely say this, not by way of making a speech, but by way of calling the attention of the chairman of the committee to the figuring I have done on the bill. If I am not correct, of course I shall be very happy to be corrected.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, the charm set out in this bill is the idea of free banking, so called. Before we go into a general discussion of the merits of the bill, I want to see whether in fact we have in it free banking in principle. The end of the bill is to reduce the volume of greenbacks to $300,000,000, and the purpose to be attained is an unlimited amount of circulation of bank currency predicated upon these $300,000,000 of greenbacks. The question I propounded to the honorable Senator from Ohio a while ago, and which he declined to answer, suggesting that he would do it again, though I believe he did not, was this: If the volume of greenbacks is $300,000,000, what volume of bank circulation will that authorize?

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator asks me that question now, I will answer him. The present amount fixed by this bill is $382,000,000. If the amount is reduced to $300,000,000, there must be then $164,000,000 of national-bank notes above the present amount.

Mr. MERRIMON. How is that, when there is no clause in this bill which provides that you shall issue two for one, or three for one, or four for one, or five for one?

Mr. SHERMAN. There is no limit on the right to issue bank paper money, but there is a limitation on the reduction of greenbacks.

Mr. MERRIMON. So I understand.

Mr. SHERMAN. After $164,000,000 of bank-notes shall have been issued, if they are issued, then there is no further reduction of greenbacks, although I would go for a still further reduction.

Mr. MERRIMON. This bill provides for a contraction of the Treasury-note circulation until it is reduced to $300,000,000. It provides in terms that the circulation of bank currency may be unlimited. But how, I ask, can that be when the bank currency is convertible into greenback currency, and is always so convertible? There is no provision in this bill or in the existing law that a bank shall have the right to issue two dollars in currency for one of greenbacks; and according to the theory of this bill the banks may issue two for one, three for one, four for one, ten for one, twenty for one; but, I take it, that is not contemplated. What would be the state of the country if the banks were to multiply under the stimulus that would be given to enterprise and trade by this system of currency, similar to that which was given to enterprise and trade by the inflated state of the currency immediately after the war? What would be the condition of the country when such a state of things as that has intervened? You might have ten dollars of bank-notes out for one of greenbacks. It would be impossible in that case for the banks to redeem their currency, and they would have to go into liquidation, and when they went into liquidation and the bonds of the Government were sold to redeem the bank currency, I ask where would be the greenbacks with which to redeem them? I do not think the honorable Senator has answered my question, which was a very plain one, how great a volume of bank currency will $300,000,000 of greenbacks allow?

Mr. WRIGHT. I am not sure whether it is the wish of the Senator from Ohio that the bill should be taken up by sections, or whether the bill should be considered as before the Senate in Committee of the Whole and that we proceed to suggest such amendments as may occur to Senators.

Mr. SHERMAN. The bill is open for amendment now. But I desire to offer from the committee an amendment of a merely verbal character. On page 5, section 3, line 4, after the word "act," I move to insert the words "and thereafter;" so that it will read:

That sections 31 and 32 of the said act be amended by requiring that each of the said associations shall, within ninety days after the passage of this act and thereafter, keep its lawful-money reserves within its own vaults, &c.

Mr. WRIGHT. There will be no objection to that.

Mr. SHERMAN. It does not change the meaning at all, but is simply to carry out the idea of the section.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. I send an amendment to the desk.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator from Iowa permit me first to offer an amendment reported from the committee?

Mr. WRIGHT. Let my amendment be read at the desk, and then as the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania is reported by the committee, I will give way to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. THURMAN in the chair.) The amendment of the Senator from Iowa will be reported for information.

The Chief Clerk read the proposed amendment, which was in section 8, line 8, to strike out "50" and insert "25," so as to make the clause read:

It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to retire an amount of United States notes equal to 25 per cent. of the circulating notes so issued, &c.

Mr. WRIGHT. Having given notice of that amendment, I now give way to the Senator from Pennsylvania to offer an amendment from the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SCOTT. I now ask to have the amendment which I reported from the committee read and disposed of.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, which was to strike out all of section 2, after the word "section" in line 8; in the following words:

And each national banking association now organized or hereafter to be organized shall keep and maintain, as a part of its reserve, one-fourth part of the coin received by it as interest on bonds of the United States deposited as security for circulating notes or Government deposits.

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

And each of said associations shall keep and maintain, as part of its lawful-money reserves, one-third of the coin received by it as interest on bonds of the United States deposited as security for circulating notes or Government deposits; unless such association shall elect to exchange such proportion of coin for bonds of the United States of the character herein provided for, which shall thereupon, until the 1st day of January, 1878, be delivered to them by the Secretary of the Treasury, marked upon their face as "Bonds authorized for reserve," and which may afterward be held by such association and considered as part of its reserves; 3 per cent. only of the interest upon which bonds shall be paid to such association, or to any holder thereof, and the remaining 2 per cent. shall be retained by the Secretary of the Treasury, and the whole amount of gold thus received shall be applied by him exclusively to the payment of the 6 per cent. five-twenty bonds of the United States.

Mr. SCOTT. I desire to say a very few words in explanation of this amendment. It will be noticed that the part of section 2 proposed to be stricken out requires each bank to keep as a part of its reserve one-fourth part of the coin received by it as interest on bonds of the United States deposited as security for circulating notes or Government deposits. This amendment changes the amount the banks are required to keep from one-fourth to one-third, and then provides that that one-third of gold thus required by them to be retained may be exchanged by the banks for the bonds which are by this act authorized to be issued, namely, ten-year 5 per cent. bonds, but provides that when those bonds are to be issued they are to be marked as "Bonds authorized for reserve," and that 3 per cent. only of that 5 per cent. shall be paid to the banks or to any holder of those bonds; the other 2 per cent. to be retained by the Government. It will thus be seen that if the bonds thus marked were to be parted with by the bank under any circumstances, the holder of the bonds could receive but 3 per cent. interest on those bonds.

The amendment further provides that the gold thus received from the banks shall be applied by the Secretary of the Treasury exclusively in the redemption or payment of the 6 per cent. five-twenty bonds of the Government.

The operation of this amendment in brief is this: The Government gets this amount of gold for a 3 per cent. bond, and at once applies it in the redemption of a 6 per cent. gold interest-bearing bond; so that while the banks are to a certain extent benefited by this amendment by permitting them to receive 3 per cent. interest on that much of their reserves, the Government is benefited to a larger extent. It is alleged on the one hand that the entire withdrawal of the reserves which the banks are now permitted to keep in the redemption cities is a hardship upon them. It is argued that the locking up of this much gold in their vaults, and which they would not use under any circumstances so long as they had other funds in which to pay their depositors, would be an additional hardship upon them. The amendment then would give to the banks the benefit of this 3 per cent. interest during the time they are permitted to receive it, while legal-tenders to the extent of that gold are released, as they would be by the bill as it stands to the extent of one-fourth, and the gold is thus utilized and also put in circulation.

Mr. President, I have submitted this amendment to the Comptroller of the Currency, and asked from him a calculation which will show its actual results. The calculation itself is much more complicated than the amendment. In order that every Senator before he shall vote upon the bill finally may have an opportunity of examining it in full, I present this calculation of the Comptroller as a part of my remarks:

MAY 1, 1874.

The United States bonds deposited by national banks with currency circulation are as follows:

Kind.	Amount.	Yearly interest.
Six per cent. bonds, (gold)	$146,343,350	$8,780,601
Five per cent. bonds, (gold)	244,522,950	12,226,147
Total		$21,006,748

At the end of one year (May 1, 1875) the banks will have accumulated one-third of this sum, or $7,002,249. Assuming that this sum will be exchanged for the bonds proposed by the amendment, the Treasury will have $7,002,249 of coin. for which it will have an equal amount of given bonds bearing interest at 5 per cent. per annum, which interest for the succeeding year (May 1, 1875, to May 1, 1876) will be distributed as follows: 3 per cent. paid to the banks, and 2 per cent. retained by the Government—equal to $210,067.47 paid to the banks, and $140,044.98 retained by the Government.

At the end of two years (May 1, 1876) the banks will have accumulated an additional amount of coin equal to one-third of the interest on their bonds, (or another $7,002,249,) and assuming that this amount will also be exchanged for the bonds, the Treasury will then have issued $14,004,498 of the bonds, the interest on which for the succeeding year (May 1, 1876, to May 1, 1877) will be distributed as follows: 3 per cent. paid to the banks, and 2 per cent. retained by the Government—equal to $420,194.04 paid to the banks, and $280,089.96 retained by the Government.

At the end of three years (May 1, 1877) the banks will have accumulated a further additional amount of $7,002,249, and assuming that the exchange for bonds will be continued, $21,006,747 of the bonds will then have been issued, the interest on which for the succeeding year (May 1, 1877, to May 1, 1878) will be distributed: 3 per cent. to the banks, $630,202.41, and 2 per cent. to be retained by the Government, $420,134.94.

At the end of four years (May 1, 1878) there will of course be another accumulation similar to those described above; but as the assumption is that redemption in specie would be effected by that time, the Government would gain no advantage by exchanging bonds for the last year's accumulation, for which reason the last year's accumulation is not taken into consideration. The effect of the amendment may be summarized as follows:

Coin to be exchanged for bonds, which amount would be at the disposal of the Government to be sold.

During the year ending May 1, 1875	$7,002,249
During the year ending May 1, 1876	7,002,249
During the year ending May 1, 1877	7,002,249
Total	21,006,748

Coin to be realized by retaining 2 per cent. interest on the bonds exchanged to be applied to payment of United States 6 per cent. bonds.

Year from May 1, 1875, to 1876	$140,044 98
Year from May 1, 1876, to 1877	280,089 96
Year from May 1, 1877, to 1878	420,134 94
Total	840,269 88

Coin paid to banks for 3 per cent. interest on bonds received by them.

Year from May 1, 1875, to 1876	$210,067 47
Year from May 1, 1876, to 1877	420,134 94
Year from May 1, 1877, to 1878	630,202 41
Total	1,260,404 82

RECAPITULATION.

Coin to be received by Government in exchange for bonds between May, 1874, and May, 1878, which may be sold at a premium	$21,006,748 00
Less amount of coin required to the bank's share of interest on the bonds	1,260,404 82
Net amount placed at the disposal of Government for sale	19,746,343 18
Coin to be realized from retaining 2 per cent. interest on bonds, and applied to the payment of United States 6 per cent. bonds	840,269 88

ADDENDUM.

In one year, May 1, 1875, the Government would have $7,002,249 received for the new bonds, applicable to the purchase of 6 per cent. bonds, and the interest on this amount would amount to $420,134.94 yearly.

In another year, May 1, 1876, the Government would have $14,004,498 received for the bonds; $140,044.98 for the 2 per cent. interest retained, and $420,134.94 for one year's interest saved on the 6 per cent. bonds previously purchased; in all, $14,564,677.92 applicable to another purchase of 6 per cent. bonds, on which the yearly interest would be $873,880.67.

In another year, May 1, 1877, the Government would have $21,006,748 received for the bonds; $280,089.96 for the 2 per cent. interest retained; two years' interest on the first purchase of 6 per cent. bonds, $840,269.88, and one year's interest on the second purchase of 6 per cent. bonds, $873,880.67; in all, $23,000,988.51 applicable to a third purchase of 6 per cent. bonds, on which the yearly interest would be $1,380,059.31.

During the next year—May 1, 1878—the Government would receive for the 2 per cent. interest retained $420,134.94; for three years' interest saved on the first purchase of 6 per cent. bonds, $1,260,403.82; for two years' interest on the second purchase of 6 per cent. bonds, $1,747,761.34; and for one year's interest on the third purchase of 6 per cent. bonds, $1,380,059.31. Assuming that the premium on gold during the period (May, 1874, to May, 1878) would average 8 per cent., the foregoing would give the following results:

Coin received for new bonds		$21,006,748 00
Coin received for 2 per cent. interest		840,269 88
Coin received for interest saved on purchases of 6 per cent. bonds		4,387,924 47
Total coin received		26,234,942 35
To which add for premium at 8 per cent		2,098,797 39
		28,333,739 74
And from this sum must be deducted the 3 per cent. interest to be paid to banks from May 1, 1875, to May 1, 1878	$1,260,404 82
And 8 per cent. premium on same	100,832 38
		1,361,237 20
Net amount realized at May 1, 1878		26,972,502 54
Leaving the Government then responsible for the payment of new bonds which would mature May 1, 1885	$21,006,748 00
And interest on said bonds to be paid to banks for seven years at 3 per cent. per annum	4,411,417 08
		25,418,165 08
Net gain to the Government for the whole operation		1,554,337 46

I believe I have now stated the substance of this amendment. For this gold thus retained by the national banks they would get a 3 per cent. bond, and with that gold the Government would redeem a 6 per cent. bond.

Mr. MORTON. Will the honorable Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. I confess I do not understand this amendment. I think I understand it as far as it goes; but it leaves some things unexplained. It provides that the banks shall reserve one-third of the gold interest they receive upon their bonds; that they shall keep that as a part of their reserve. They have the option, however, of selling that gold to the Government for a ten-year 5 per cent. bond. The Government reserves 2 per cent. out of the 5 per cent.; the other 3 per cent. is paid to the bank. What becomes of this 2 per cent. reserved? When does the bank get that, and how is the bank subsequently to use this bond?

Mr. SCOTT. The bank never gets the 2 per cent. It is expressly provided that the Government is to pay the bank but 3 per cent. and retain 2, and apply the whole 5 per cent. in the redemption of 6 per cent. bonds. The bond remains in the hands of the bank as a part of its reserve, and at its maturity the bank would receive the money upon it, or any other holder of it would receive the money upon it; but during the time it has to run neither the bank nor any other holder could receive more than 3 per cent. upon it.

Mr. MORTON. I submit to the Senator, who has studied this matter much more thoroughly than I have, that no bank could afford to do this, because it virtually requires the bank to part with its gold for a 3 per cent. bond. This is to be a 3 per cent. bond in the hands of the bank, and it is to be retained as a part of the reserve. If the bank is required to pay out its deposits or to redeem its circulation and thus to use its reserves, this 3 per cent. bond cannot be sold at par; it cannot be sold for more than sixty-five or seventy cents on the dollar. Therefore the bank must make that sacrifice if it has occasion to use its reserves, as it did have occasion last fall. Now, have we any right to ask the banks to make such a sacrifice as that? We can require the banks, as the other bill did, to retain a portion of their gold interest as a part of their reserve, to enable them to resume specie payments; that is to say, when the time comes to redeem their own bills in coin; but then they have the gold on hand dollar for dollar. Now, they are to have a bond on hand which in their hands or in the hands of any person to whom they sell it is a 3 per cent. bond and worth sixty-five or seventy cents on the dollar.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, treating that as an inquiry put to me, as I understand the Senator, we are not requiring the banks to do this thing.

Mr. MORTON. I know that.

Mr. SCOTT. We are giving them the option of doing it, and I think so far from the national banks not being able to stand this operation, they will be very glad to avail themselves of it. If we do not give them this option, they must retain the gold in their vaults. If we do give them this option, it is for them to determine whether it will be to their advantage to take this bond and run the risk of being able to get dollar for dollar for it when they run short of other funds with which to meet their depositors. I think I can see that this amendment will operate to some extent to the benefit of the banks; it will not endanger the depositors; and it will inure to the benefit of the Government, because the banks will be very glad to exchange gold, which otherwise we require them to lock up and not use, for a bond upon which they will get 3 per cent.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. May I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania if he does not think it is inevitable that after 1878, when these bonds are no longer to be issued, the banks would require their funds, and they would have to sell the bonds for whatever they could get in the market?

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, as I have already said, if the directors and officers of the banks of this country are to be intrusted with affecting its national interests at all, they may be safely trusted to take into their consideration the calculation which the Senator from Vermont proposes to me; and if it be true that by 1878 the legal-tender notes of the Government will be at par with gold, then I take it the credit of our Government will be good enough to assure the officers of these banks that they will not run any great risk in turning these 3 per cent. bonds into available funds to meet the claims of their depositors.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Does the Senator think that in 1878 a 3 per cent. bond of the United States will be worth par in gold?

Mr. SCOTT. I think this: that as the national banks will continue in operation after 1878, and as the law which requires them to keep a reserve will be still operative, they will be very glad to hold on to these 3 per cent. bonds as a part of their reserve, and there is not much probability that they will be called upon to part with them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. JOHNSTON in the chair.) The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. HOWE. Is that motion divisable?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not.

Mr. HOWE. Can we not take the vote first on striking out?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No, sir; a motion to strike out and insert is indivisable.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I am aware that this amendment is proposed in good faith for the profit of the Government and the convenience of the banks; but I think it is altogether too complicated to be embraced in this bill; and besides I think it is not near as valuable as it would be if instead of issuing bonds it authorized the old-fashioned 3 per cent. certificates to be paid by the Government on demand. If these bonds are issued they go on for seven years beyond 1878, and as we all hope ere that time that we shall have resumed specie payments, of course if the banks shall invest in these bonds for the three or four years that will transpire before 1878, they must take their risk about these bonds being of any sort of use to them whenever specie resumption shall take place, and they will be compelled to sell them in the market, if they are in want of coin, for the most they will bring; and I agree with the Senator from Indiana in thinking that they would not bring, if they were forced upon the market, more than sixty or seventy or seventy-five cents on the dollar; perhaps seventy-five cents, as the time is so short in which they are to be redeemed.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Pennsylvania to what seems to me to be a conflict between his amendment and the second section of the bill. The first clause of the amendment provides that each bank shall keep as part of its reserves "one-third of the coin received by it as interest on bonds of the United States deposited as security for circulating notes or Government deposits." We propose to abolish reserves for circulating notes, as I understand.

Mr. SCOTT. But we do not propose to abolish the bonds which are deposited as security for their circulation.

Mr. WRIGHT. Then you provide that one-third of this coin, or bonds in its place, shall be kept in the banks as a reserve for the security of the circulating notes.

Mr. SCOTT. O, no; the Senator is confounding two distinct things. This is one-third of the interest received upon the bonds deposited as security for circulating notes.

Mr. WRIGHT. I see the distinction.

Now, I want to call the Senator's attention to another thing. Of course we understand not only that the reserve is to be kept as a security to the depositors, but also that it may be available. It is necessary that it should be available for the benefit of depositors. Now, by this amendment it occurs to me that you provide that the bank may at its option, instead of having one-third of this reserve in gold, have what is in effect a 3 per cent. bond. Now, while in view of the guarantee of the Government that may be a security, it may occur that it would not be available at all to the depositors at the time they needed it; and I think it is quite as important that the reserves shall be available at any and all times when needed as that the security shall be perfect. This reserve being for the security of depositors, if there should be a run upon the banks as there was last fall, if they are required to hold greenbacks or gold as a reserve, then they can use that at once, because it is at once available, but they might not be able to turn these bonds into money; they might not be available, and therefore the reserve would be of little or no effect.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I think, as the Senator from Vermont has stated, that this is a very complicated proposition. If I understand it, it proposes to compel the banks to hold one-third of the coin which they receive as interest on their bonds, for the sake of having a reserve. That reserve is wanted for the security of the depositors. Supposing it to be in such a position that it will be a benefit to the depositors, the United States proposes to hire it at 3 per cent., to compel the banks to hold it as a reserve, and then induce them to loan it at 3 per cent., so that they shall not have any reserve. That is about the effect of the amendment, as I understand it.

Mr. SCOTT. A word in answer to the suggestions made. The Senator from Iowa thinks that this 3 per cent. bond would not be available as a reserve for the purpose of paying depositors. Many persons advocate the doctrine that it is no part of the business of the Government to take care of depositors at all; that that is a bargain between them and the banks; and that if they see proper to leave their money there it is not our duty to protect them. However, this bill does assume, or rather it continues the assumption heretofore made, that the Government will to some extent endeavor to secure depositors. We require a certain amount of reserves to be kept, the same amount heretofore required upon deposits, 15 per cent. in the country banks, and 25 per cent. in the redemption-city banks. That is a very small proportion of the deposits, and whenever a state of things occurs in which any bank is so far reduced as that it only has 15 per cent. to pay its depositors, no depositor will ever refuse to take a 3 per cent. interest-bearing bond and discharge the bank. It only happens that the reserve is necessary when there is a panic, and when all the resources of a bank have been drawn down to 15 per cent. of the whole deposits. I do not think any constituents of the Senator from Iowa will ever go away from a national bank leaving his deposit behind him if he can get a 3 per cent. interest-bearing bond to take in its place. I do not think there is any trouble on that score at all. It is only 15 per cent. remember that we are endeavoring to secure to the depositors, not the whole amount, and I can see no possible difficulty in this matter so far as the depositors are concerned.

Now, as to the objection of the Senator from Vermont that this is a complicated arrangement, I see no complication in the arrangement itself. It is the simple exchange of gold for the bond, and the application of the gold to the redemption of a bond of a higher rate of interest. What is the complication when the bond is in the vaults of the banks? You require them to keep it there; it is part of their reserve; they cannot keep it any place else. If they dispose of it they must replace it with an equivalent amount of gold or legal tenders. If anybody else gets it into his hands, he can only get 3 per cent. upon it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The bank has a bond bearing 5 per cent. interest upon which it receives but 3. Is not that a little complicated?

Mr. SCOTT. It is marked upon its face, "Authorized for reserve," and the gentlemen who keep their tables before them, counting the rates at which bonds sell in the market, will never overlook the words in red ink on the bond, "Authorized for reserve." I do not think there is any complication about that.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. There are several other points, but I do not desire to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. SCOTT. That brings me to the second objection the Senator made, that it would be better to issue a 3 per cent. temporary certificate instead of this bond. It was to obviate that very objection that I deemed it better, and it received the sanction of a majority of the committee, to provide that we would not authorize a new security to be issued. That would have been a complication by introducing into the money market and into our reports a new security, a 3 per cent. temporary certificate. It was deemed better, to preserve the series, to provide for the same kind of bonds, the same bonds that are authorized to be issued by the act of July 12, 1870, and by this act, and by stamping upon the face of the bond that which characterizes it as a reserve bond, to permit but 3 per cent. of that 5 to be paid to the person holding it.

Mr. ALLISON. May I call the attention of the Senator from Pennsylvania to the fact that in the loan act of 1870 we did provide for a gold certificate to an unlimited extent, bearing 2¼ per cent. interest?

Mr. SCOTT. For a gold certificate?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir; for a gold deposit in the Treasury of the United States, bearing interest at 2¼ per cent. That certainly is my recollection of that law. I remember it was discussed very fully at the time.

Mr. SCOTT. But that is not authorizing it to be issued as one of the securities of the Government to go upon the money market.

Mr. ALLISON. It would be very easy, however, to provide that national banks might be allowed to keep their reserves in those certificates.

Mr. SCOTT. That only goes to the form of the certificate. That is a mere matter of convenience. I can see no difficulty whatever in using this form rather than either of the others which have been suggested, and I can see no advantage in either of them over that which is provided.

Mr. MORTON. I do not think there is any danger in the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania. I hardly think any bank would be willing to sell its gold for a 3 per cent. bond. If that amendment were adopted, it would present rather a curious anomaly in this bill. In one section we offer the banks a 3 per cent. bond at par in gold, and in another section we offer the people a five per cent. bond at par in greenbacks.

Mr. SCHURZ. Mr. President, I think there is another objection to the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania which goes to the bottom of the matter. It has already been hinted at by the Senator from Iowa. The provisions of our laws which make it obligatory upon banks to keep a certain sum of money as a reserve to secure their depositors mean something or they mean nothing. If these provisions mean anything they must mean that the sum of money so held in reserve to be paid out to the depositors in case of need should be in such a condition as to be paid out on demand to depositors, and to this end consist in the current money of the country, in which payments are usually made. Unless the reserve consists of that kind of money it will not answer its object. You might just as well authorize that the bank have a certain amount of real estate in reserve and when the depositors come and ask for the money due them the bank will offer them a lot of ground, which the depositors would be glad to take rather than get nothing at all. That is the argument we have heard here.

Mr. HOWE. The Government having made the banks poor, they will be glad to get that.

Mr. SCHURZ. Precisely. Now the same argument which applies to the bonds proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania applies to the gold also. Gold is not current money of the United States at the present moment, and therefore gold ought not to form part of the reserve of a bank, because that reserve ought to consist of that kind of money which is ordinarily used in payments. I should therefore vote for an amendment striking out that whole portion of section 2 for which the Senator from Pennsylvania has offered a substitute.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Will the Senator from Missouri permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SCHURZ. Certainly.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I desire to ask the Senator whether he does not recognize the fact that with the gold in the bank, it is always exchangeable for even more than its face value in current money?

Mr. SCHURZ. Certainly it is.

Mr. MORTON. I suggest to the Senator that the provision requires the bank to keep the gold. The gold of course could be converted by the bank in stress of weather; but under the section reported by the committee the bank is to keep the gold, no difference what may be the demand by the depositors.

Mr. CONKLING. But it releases a corresponding amount of greenbacks from the reserve.

Mr. SCHURZ. Precisely; it releases a corresponding amount of current money of the United States from reserve.

Mr. MORTON. But that does not diminish the necessity of being able to meet the demands of depositors.

Mr. SCHURZ. True, it does not diminish the necessity of being able to meet the demands of depositors; but what I was saying is this: You can undoubtedly exchange gold for more than its face in greenbacks, but you have got to sell the gold as you sell any other merchandise, for what it will bring.

Mr. CONKLING. Just as you would sell barrels of flour.

Mr. SCHURZ. Precisely. For this reason I affirm that gold, as long as we have not returned to specie payments, using gold as current money, has no business in the reserves of a bank, kept there for the purpose of securing the depositors; neither do I think that we shall get one single step nearer to specie payments by keeping this deposit of gold in the national banks of the United States. That is not the way to bring on specie payments. When we come to specie payments the national banks may take care of themselves, and I am sure the responsible concerns among them will be amply able to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SCOTT. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KELLY, (when his name was called.) Upon this question and upon all questions relating to the currency bill I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. NORWOOD.] I do not know how he would vote on this particular amendment, and therefore I refrain from voting.

Mr. INGALLS, (having first voted in the affirmative.) Upon the general financial question I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN.] I suppose on this amendment he would vote "nay," but I am not positive. With that understanding I withdraw the vote that I cast in favor of the proposition.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator will indulge me, I think I ought to say that the Senator from New Jersey who is absent committed in some sense his interest to me. The Senator from Kansas thinks the Senator from New Jersey would vote in the negative on this question. I am not prepared to say that; and of course the Senator from Kansas takes his own course about withdrawing his vote. I think it due to the Senator from New Jersey that I should say this, as in going away he asked me to see to it that his position be stated upon questions hereafter. I make no statement about it on this question, except that I am not authorized to say that he would vote in the negative on this proposition.

Mr. INGALLS. I made the statement I did upon the understanding that Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN would vote in the negative. If that is not the understanding, as he left his views with the Senator from New York, I should prefer to have my vote recorded. I desire to carry out the agreement that I had with the Senator from New Jersey in perfect good faith.

Mr. CONKLING. May I inquire of the Senator, is his understanding on this subject derived from the Senator from New Jersey himself?

Mr. INGALLS. In no sense whatever.

Mr. CONKLING. So I thought possibly; and therefore I wish to state that I am not authorized to say that the Senator from New Jersey would vote in the negative on this proposition.

Mr. INGALLS. In speaking with the Senator from New Jersey in relation to the affair, I mentioned the difficulty that might possibly arise from not understanding how he would vote, and he advised me that he would commit his sentiments to the Senator from New York.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas desire to withdraw his vote?

Mr. INGALLS. No, sir. I desire to have my vote recorded.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 16, nays 37; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Anthony, Bayard, Chandler, Conkling, Davis, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Gilbert, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamlin, Ingalls, Jones, Scott, Sherman, and Stockton—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Bogy, Boreman, Bontwell, Buckingham, Carpenter, Clayton, Cooper, Dennis, Fenton, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hager, Hamilton of Texas, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Johnston, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Patterson, Pratt, Ramsey, Sargent, Schurz, Sprague, Tipton, Wadleigh, Washburn, West, Windom, and Wright—37.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brownlow, Cameron, Conover, Cragin, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Connecticut, Frelinghuysen, Kelly, Lewis, Mitchell, Norwood, Pease, Ransom, Robertson, Saulsbury, Spencer, Stevenson, Stewart, and Thurman—20.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WRIGHT. I now ask that the amendment I sent to the desk some time ago be taken up and acted upon.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, which was in section 8, line 8, to strike out "50" and insert "25;" so as to make the clause read:

It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to retire an amount of United States notes equal to 25 per cent. of the circulating notes so issued, &c.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to say just one word. I concur most heartily in the wish expressed by the Senator from Ohio this morning that all questions in connection with this bill may be disposed of as speedily as possible, and with as little debate as possible. We have been in session five months, and more than half the time has been taken up in debate on this currency question. I think we understand all these measures pretty well, and probably as well as we shall after the most elaborate debate. I have in connection with this some two or three other amendments that I propose to offer, and I shall content myself with submitting them with perhaps a single remark.

I am justified in saying, after the remarks of the Senator from Ohio this morning, that perhaps this amendment goes to the marrow of the bill. It is a question upon which we differ here as to the rate of retirement. I desire to say in advance that, if left to myself, I am opposed to the retirement of greenbacks. If left to my own convictions of what would be right to the people I represent, I should oppose this section entirely. There are those, however, who believe that there ought to be a retirement of dollar for dollar. Others think there ought to be a retirement of 70 per cent.; others think there ought to be a retirement of 50 per cent. Some there are who think we ought to come to specie payments at once. Others think we can safely provide for a return to specie payment at some time to be named in the future, 1878, 1879, or 1880. Others think that it is unwise and impolitic to provide any day for a return to specie payments.

In this contrariety of views, it must necessarily follow perhaps that each one shall surrender somewhat his views upon this vexed question, and as I had occasion to say here once before, using a very trite remark, I think the true philosophy of legislation, as of statesmanship, is, if you cannot get what you want in all particulars and accomplish all the ends you desire, then approach it as near as possible, because there must be some surrender of views if we expect to do anything on this question. Now I am unwilling to go home or that this session shall adjourn without the passage of some bill on this subject, and the sooner we pass it in my judgment the better.

As I have said, I am opposed to any retirement of greenbacks whatever, and if the proposition were presented to me whether I would have any retirement as provided in this bill, I should vote against any; but it is proposed by the committee, and this bill proposes, that there shall be a retirement of 50 per cent. Now, entertaining the opinion that there should be no retirement, I propose that there shall be a retirement of 25 per cent., and upon this to compromise. I think it is a fair ground upon which we can stand and upon which we can meet.

I do not understand the Senator from Ohio to say, certainly, that if this amendment shall be adopted he will regard it as fatal to the bill, according to his views of what we should do. I can say to him in all frankness that if it is adopted and 50 per cent. shall be retained, I shall regard it as fatal to the bill so far as I am concerned. After what has been said by the Senator from Illinois this morning with reference to the inevitable effect of this bill and the contraction it must necessarily produce, and as you increase your national-bank circulation the effect of it upon the greenback currency, I think it is but right to us that those opposed to us shall be willing to stand upon the 25 per cent.

Mr. President, I stand in favor of this proposition. I might say I stand opposed to all retirement of the greenbacks, for the reason that I do not at all concur in the views of the Senator from Ohio, when sometimes on the one side and sometimes on the other, as I conceive, he insists that it were better for the country that we have our currency uniform in national-bank circulation rather than in greenbacks; and his argument all the way through went upon the ground that the people insisted and expected and demanded that there should be some retirement of the greenbacks. I do not believe a word of it. I believe the people of this country are better satisfied with the greenback circulation than with any currency they ever had. I believe they are better satisfied with it than they possibly ever will be with the national-bank circulation. I believe they would prefer to let the greenbacks stand where they are rather than to replace them dollar for dollar with the national-bank circulation. But inasmuch as it is deemed needful and proper that we shall have some legislation on this subject, legislation that shall tend to relieve the people and give confidence to the business interests of the country, I am willing to meet gentlemen upon this ground and stand upon a 25 per cent. reduction. I therefore offer the proposition that instead of retiring 50 per cent. we shall retire 25 per cent.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I cannot but admire the liberality of my honorable friend from Iowa. He states the case clearly and distinctly, so that every one can understand it. He says there are different opinions as to the policy to be pursued with our greenback circulation; some are in favor of retiring dollar for dollar. I am one of that number. Others are in favor of retiring 70 per cent., others 50 per cent., and others nothing. Now, the Senator in a spirit of great liberality says: "If you will give me 75 per cent. I will give you 25; if you will give up your hundred cents on the dollar I will give you a pistareen." Sir, while I appreciate the offer, I cannot accept it; and if this amendment is to pass, I take it for granted that it is intended to kill the bill. I should certainly vote against the bill the very moment this amendment should be adopted. I am willing to meet the gentlemen who are in favor of inflation upon the exact line of demarkation between where I stand and where they stand. I will vote for the bill as it is, retiring fifty cents in greenbacks for every dollar of national-bank currency issued. It makes banking absolutely free all over the United States. The banks have nothing to do with this retiracy. It is the Government that is to retire fifty cents on the dollar, or $500,000 of greenbacks for every $1,000,000 of national-bank currency issued. I do not suppose there is a Senator on this floor who expects the bill to become a law if it should be restricted to twenty-five cents on the dollar. The policy that has been announced in the veto message would show that it is extremely doubtful——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is out of order in alluding to the Executive or what course he may pursue on this subject.

Mr. CHANDLER. I simply alluded to his late message. I think I have a right to discuss a message of the President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator was not speaking of the message, but predicting that the same thing would follow on this bill if it should pass at 25 per cent. The Chair thinks that is out of order.

Mr. CHANDLER. Well, sir, perhaps Senators may have drawn that inference, and I may or may not. However, that is a mere question of taste. I trust that if this bill has any friends on this floor they will vote against the amendment. If there are any Senators on this floor who desire free banking, who desire that every State that is now deficient shall have an opportunity to take all the bank stock that it has the money to take, I hope they will vote against this amendment; for I assure my honorable from Iowa, should this amendment prevail, I shall then move to lay the bill on the table, and trust we shall spend no more time with it or upon it.

Mr. LOGAN. I wish to say one word in response to the insinuations of the Senator from Michigan and his statement that fairness was all he desired. Let us see how fair his proposition is. He says he is in favor of retiring one hundred cents on the dollar, in favor of retiring an equal amount of greenbacks to the issue of national-bank notes; but he is willing to agree upon fifty cents, because that is "a fair divide," as I understand him. Now let us see how fair it is, and how fair the Senator's proposition is. Under the present banking law as it exists there is a retirement of 15 per cent. of greenbacks in country banks as reserve on deposits and 25 per cent. in the redemption cities. The average is about 20 per cent. Under this bill you require the same thing, and yet require another retirement of 5 per cent. greenbacks on the circulation. That, with the 20 per cent. that would exist as an average on the deposits—and, as I said this morning, the deposits will always exceed the circulation—makes 25 per cent. Then this 50 per cent. of greenbacks makes 75 per cent. Then the 5 per cent. in this bill required to be put in the Treasury here for redemption makes 80 per cent. Thus you have a retirement of 80 per cent. instead of 50 in this bill. Under the proposition of the Senator from Iowa you have a retirement of 55 per cent.

Let us see if this is not so. Twenty-five per cent. he proposes to start with, and 5 per cent. is required to be kept in the Treasury, which makes 30 per cent. under this bill with his proposition. Then if the deposits equal the circulation, which they will more than do, as the evidence of all bankers shows, you have 25 per cent. more; and that is all to be locked up in the banks under this bill and none of it put in circulation. There you have 55 per cent., the least you can possibly have of retirement of greenbacks with the proposition of the Senator from Iowa. That goes 5 per cent. beyond the cleverness of the Senator who was willing to divide even. If you are willing to divide on 50 per cent., you have it in the propotion of the Senator from Iowa, with 5 per cent. more; and do you ask men here who are opposed to the retirement of greenbacks at all to agree that you shall retire 80 per cent. of them and then vote for this proposition? Such a proposal strikes me as being a good deal like the hunter's proposition to the Indian. They had been out hunting one day, and the Indian killed a turkey and the white man killed a buzzard. When they came to divide, the white man said to the Indian, "I will take the turkey, and you take the buzzard; or in other words, you take the buzzard and I take the turkey." [Laughter.] That is the fairness of the Senator from Michigan in this proposition; it is buzzard to us all the time and turkey to himself.

That is the bill just as it stands, and no man with pencil and paper can make it out any other way, and yet you contend that that is fairness, and you say you want to deal fairly with Senators! Every Senator has a right to deal for himself, and to guess and judge for himself; but when you talk about fairness, I say that with 50 per cent. of retirement of the United States notes in circulation, and with the reserves required in this bill to be locked up in the banks and none of them to be allowed to be out, and the 5 per cent. that is to be locked up for redemption, there will be no additional circulation that would amount to a cent under the bill; and no man would bank under the proposition either. As to what may happen to the bill hereafter, God knows; I have naught to say. That is none of my business. I do my own voting, and threats of that kind will have no terror so far as I am concerned. I want to vote for a bill that is right. I am willing to vote for this bill, and I am ready to do it, provided you reduce the retirement of greenbacks and make it a bill that I can vote for. But if you do not do it the responsibility is with you. You can pass the bill if you have the majority.

Mr. WRIGHT. I had thought that I should not say another word on this amendment; but in view of what has been said by the Senator from Michigan, I think it but due to myself that I should say a word.

I offered this amendment, as I shall offer others, in a spirit of fairness and with the greatest anxiety that we shall agree upon a bill. I believe that this is a fair proposition. I did not offer it as a one-sided proposition; but I believed in all sincerity it was a fair proposition. Now, let us see where we stand.

This Senate by a majority passed a bill in which there was no provision for retirement, passed a bill which provided that the maximum of greenbacks should be $400,000,000, passed a bill to increase the bank circulation also by $46,000,000; and that by a majority of this Senate. Now, a bill comes in fixing the maximum of greenback circulation at $382,000,000. That I do not propose to disturb. That is a concession. Now, a bill has been introduced also that provides for a retirement of greenbacks. That was not in the other bill. Instead of striking out that section, as it was struck out of the bill when it came before from the Senate Committee, I propose to meet half-way on that ground and take 25 per cent. as the reduction. After we have once passed a bill for $400,000,000 greenbacks and $46,000,000 increase of bank circulation, without any retirement, without any provision for a redemption bond, (with no disposition now on my part to fight the redemption bond, though I do not believe in it, if certain amendments be made to it, which I do not think will be objected to,) now, when we propose as a first proposition that, notwithstanding we have all this vantage ground and have once passed such a bill as I have stated, we surrender all these things and propose to meet on this ground, the Senator from Michigan says we ask everything and are willing to concede nothing. I say it has been shown here that on my proposition there is a half-way ground, while upon the proposition of the committee we surrender everything until greenbacks almost to the last dollar shall be taken out of circulation and bank-notes put in their place.

I regret to have taken up so much time. I do not want to discuss these questions, because I infinitely prefer a vote. I shall rejoice, as a member of the Senate and representing the people I do, if we can dispose of this bill to-day and get it out of the way. I believe we can do so if we go to work in good, earnest spirit, anxious to arrive at a proper and practical result.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I feel impelled by every consideration of consistency to seize every fair opportunity to lift up my voice against this greenback circulation. I believe I never have omitted any fair opportunity of doing so since the war closed. I confess that I am one of the number who hunger and thirst for that day when there shall not be a promissory note of the Government afloat payable on demand and yet depreciated in the markets of the world. If there is anything in our times which I feel is an insufferable national disgrace, it is that in a time of profound peace, and when we have enjoyed a profound peace for a decade, we have millions upon millions of the national promises circulating right under our faces, which are discounted, dishonored, discredited at every pea-nut stand in the country.

Now I want to get rid of that state of things. I want to get rid of it without a contraction of what you call the circulation. I do not want to contract the circulation, because I do not think that would be fair to one portion of our people. I have thought there was just one way of doing that, and that was to provide for retiring these notes as bank-notes properly secured, to be converted into greenbacks or into coin at the option of the maker, took the place of the greenbacks. I do not think it would be right to retire a dollar of the national notes for every dollar of the bank-notes which go into circulation, because practically I think that would be contraction. I have thought according to my mathematics that you could afford to retire seventy cents of greenbacks for every dollar of bank-notes you put out. The proposition of the committee is to retire fifty cents. I have listened to the arithmetic of my honorable friend from Illinois; I cannot come to the conclusion that he arrives at, and on the whole I think he stands admitting that you have under this bill twenty cents more of paper in circulation for every dollar of bank-notes that are put out; that, in other words, out of every dollar of bank-notes which are added to the circulation under this bill there will be about eighty cents retired and reserved. That is expansion; but——

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me right there to say a word in that connection?

Mr. HOWE. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. The 20 per cent. I spoke of was in reference to this bill. I say if you take it for granted that the deposits will only reach the circulation, it makes 80 per cent. contraction if deposits will not go beyond that. But the Senator will remember that in connection with that I suggested to the Senator from Ohio that the second and third taken together are a retirement or a contraction of about $40,000,000, and until you issue bank circulation so that the 20 per cent. will get up to that $40,000,000, you have no excess of circulation at all. If the Senator will figure out the results of the second and third sections he will see that this bill itself, taken as it is, is a contraction at the present time of about $40,000,000.

Mr. HOWE. I do not care to make an issue with the Senator on his mathematics. My conviction remains with me that this will be practically an expansion of your paper circulation even if fifty cents of the bank-note be withdrawn in greenbacks. But I am sure the Senator from Illinois makes too large a calculation on what is called a reserve to secure deposits. I believe there is such a provision in the existing law, and I believe this bill proposes to continue that provision.

Mr. LOGAN. But the difference is that three-fifths of the reserve on deposits now under the law is allowed to go into circulation. That bill takes three-fifths and requires it to be locked up in the banks.

Mr. SHERMAN. Only three-fourths of that; three-fifths can be so used now.

Mr. HOWE. We are getting so deep in vulgar fractions that in the few words I have to say I do not care to go into them. But my impression is that this provision of a reserve to secure deposits is rather a fiction than a fact. It never has been enforced, I think. My judgment is that it never will be enforced. My opinion very decidedly is that it never ought to be enforced. I am one of those alluded to, I think, by the Senator from Pennsylvania a short time ago, who think that it is no part of the business of the Government to look out for my security whenever I see fit to deposit a ten-dollar bill in a bank or elsewhere. I am willing the Government shall leave me to the guidance of my own judgment and discretion. Never having but a very small sum to deposit anywhere, I think I can be trusted so far. So that I do not count upon that portion of the reserve as affecting your circulation.

I shall agree to this proposition of retiring but fifty cents of the greenbacks. I think it is too small a retirement. That is my opinion about it. But it is better than none. If I can live to see that happy day when your dishonored notes begin to disappear, though they may go more slowly out of sight than my impatience would dictate, I shall begin to hope; but until that day arrives I shall not have any hope of a stable financial system.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, I consented to have this bill reported from the Committee on Finance solely on the ground of having some bill before the Senate which was likely to command the support of a majority and become a law. In doing this there were various parts of the bill that I could not entirely bring my judgment and conscience to consent to; but it was not my purpose to make any opposition to the bill unless it should appear that there was a disposition to firmly adhere to the opinions expressed by the majority on the passage of the bill which has failed to become a law.

My friend from Iowa [Mr. WRIGHT] has striven, as he thinks earnestly here to agree to something that he calls a compromise. Now, Mr. President, let me point out to him how much I have surrendered in order that this bill might come in here for consideration.

In the first place, I agree that free banking is in harmony with our institutions, that we ought to have it as soon as circumstances will permit; but I have never been of the opinion that we ought to have it until the time came when banks could redeem not only in legal-tender but in absolute coin. That much I have surrendered in the presentation of this bill which only provides for paper redemption.

Then again this bill fixes the amount of legal-tenders that may be lawfully outstanding at $382,000,000. I do not believe a word of that. I do not believe that there is a dollar beyond $356,000,000 that the Government has any right to have out. So I surrender on that point so far as this bill goes.

Then, again, the bill proposes that we are to retire only 50 per cent. of the amount of national-bank notes that are issued. I agree with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHANDLER] that we ought to retire dollar for dollar, and the lowest point that I have felt willing to compromise on that subject would have been 70 per cent. instead of 50; and as the Senator from Iowa has made his proposition now to reduce the sum from 50 down to 25 per cent., if that should fail, I shall feel myself almost authorized to offer an amendment proposing 70 per cent. instead of 50 or 25.

Again, there is another proposition in this bill. It proposes to stop retiring greenbacks when we reach the amount of $300,000,000, and to retire no more forever. What sense is there in that? Why not continue to retire them? If it is proper and right to retire them while we have four or five hundred million dollars of national-bank notes in circulation, why may it not be proper to retire them after we have issued $164,000,000 more of national-bank notes? I confess I cannot see why it should stop at that point.

Then, again, it is proposed to fund the United States notes in 1877. Why postpone the day to 1877? Why not take 1876? I am in favor of 1876; and if I yield to go on to 1877, it is by way of a compromise.

Then, Mr. President, there is another thing which I regard as perhaps the worst of all of the objectionable parts in this bill. There is a proposition here that after 1877 we may fund our greenbacks in bonds; but it is also provided immediately after that we may reissue them and authorize any holder of them to go and take bonds at par. How long can we keep up the price of bonds with such a provision as that? We may indeed elevate somewhat the value of greenbacks, but is it not perfectly apparent that we are to reduce the value of our bonds at the same time? If these greenbacks are to be funded into a United States bond, in my judgment they never should be again reissued.

Now, Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa thinks he has compromised a great deal in yielding up so much as he has done in this bill; but I desire to say to him and to the Senate that if his amendment now proposed shall be adopted I shall consider it fatal to the bill. I do not undertake to say that it will not become a law. I do not know how that may be; but so far as my vote will prevent, it will not become a law.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I was willing for one to vote upon this bill without any discussion; but the Senator from Ohio—and I do not complain of it—thought proper to go into a somewhat extended statement in regard to the character of the bill and to restate some arguments in regard to the general subject which had been gone over before, I thought pretty fully.

For one I am opposed to any provision now for retirement of the greenbacks by converting them into a bond bearing interest at the rate of 5 per cent. or any other per cent. I do not believe that it is to the interest of this Government or of this people to convert any part of this non-interest-paying debt into an interest-paying debt. But I am not so tenacious in my opinions as to refuse to concede anything. I am willing for the sake of adjusting this troublesome question to yield some of my ground and accept provisions which do not meet the approval of my judgment.

That free banking is right in principle; that it is due to the country and to every part of the country, seems now to be generally conceded. There are but few on this floor who will deny the propriety and the justice of establishing free banking, and destroying what is known as the monopoly feature of our national banking system—a feature that has lost it many friends, and that, if continued, will make it odious and difficult for any party to carry. But it seems that, as the price of free banking, we are required to retire 50 per cent. in greenbacks of the amount of bank-notes that may be issued. What good is to be obtained by this retirement? But I will not go into the general discussion of that question. That has been before the Senate often, and for a long time.

The Senator from Illinois has stated correctly what would be the effect of this bill in its present form. Suppose, for example, $50,000,000 of bank-notes are issued under this bill; $25,000,000 of greenbacks will be retired. Then upon these $50,000,000 of bank-notes a reserve is to be established——

Mr. SCOTT and Mr. SHERMAN. The reserve on circulation is repealed.

Mr. MORTON. I was going to come to that; but I am nevertheless correct in my statement. A reserve is to be established in the country banks of 15 per cent., and in the city banks of 25 per cent.; not a reserve upon their circulation but a reserve upon their deposits, and it may be assumed as a matter of mathematical calculation that national banks cannot be established, or if established will not be maintained but will go into liquidation, unless the line of deposits shall be equal not merely to the circulation but to the amount of their capital stock, which is much over their circulation. So then there will be the full 15 per cent. in the country and 25 per cent. in the cities, and in some of the cities much more than 25 per cent. owing to their enormous deposits, to be taken out of the greenbacks in circulation and retired into the vaults of the banks and kept there until some time of general panic or convulsion, when they will be called out for the purpose of meeting the demands of depositors. We might say at least 20 per cent. on the average. Then out of the fifty millions of new bank-notes you retire twenty-five millions unconditionally of greenbacks, and then you retire at least 20 per cent. of fifty millions of greenbacks into the vaults of the banks to be held there as reserve, and, in addition to that, you take 5 per cent. of reserve on circulation and put that in the Treasury of the United States for the purpose of redeeming the bank-notes that may be there presented. That leaves but very little in the way of an increase of currency to be derived from the issue of fifty millions of national-bank notes.

But, Mr. President, that is not quite all of it. I must call the attention of the Senate to another consideration in connection with what is called the greenback reserve of $44,000,000. The theory of that reserve is that it is to be issued by the Secretary of the Treasury when it may be necessary, and afterward to be retired out of the surplus revenues of the Government into the Treasury, and to be held there again for another emergency. Under this theory the $26,000,000 that have been issued since the 1st of October last are to be retired out of the first surplus revenues, put back into the Treasury. The President in his late message very distinctly and very clearly enunciated this proposition, and I shall not violate the rule laid down by the Chair by reading an extract from his message:

> The amount in actual circulation was actually reduced to $356,000,000, at which point Congress passed the act of February 4, 1868, suspending the further reduction of the currency. The forty-four millions have ever been regarded as a reserve, to be used only in case of emergency, such as has occurred on several occasions, and must occur when, from any cause, revenues suddenly fall below expenditures; and such a reserve is necessary, because the fractional currency, amounting to fifty millions, is redeemable in legal-tender on call.

Therefore the President states the doctrine with which we are all familiar, and he states it very clearly; and to carry out that proposition enunciated by the President the Government would use the first surplus revenue that may come into the Treasury to retire the $26,000,000 and put them back in the Treasury for some subsequent occasion. There is another contraction of $26,000,000 in addition to the 50 per cent. contemplated by this section and in addition to the reserve required by the law under the additional bank-note circulation that may be issued; and the Government is committed to that policy. The Secretary of the Treasury, in his last annual report, asked Congress to take action upon the subject to remove the doubt hanging over the right of the Government to use the $44,000,000 reserve, and in his report used the following language:

> In order that there may be no misunderstanding as to the circumstances under which the amount between the minimum and the maximum may be issued, and, that it may not be issued for the purpose of inflating the paper currency of the country, I recommend that it be declared a reserve to be issued temporarily when the ordinary demands upon the Treasury shall require it, and in payment of such demands and for the redemption of fractional currency, the amount so issued to be returned to the reserve as soon as the condition of the Treasury shall warrant it, and that the purchase of bonds shall be forbidden so long as the outstanding United States notes shall exceed the minimum fixed by the act of February 4, 1868.

The Secretary of the Treasury here stated his view and his policy, and we presume that is his policy yet, for we have no reason to suppose that he has changed his mind upon that subject, and it will be his policy, should there be surplus revenue, to employ it in the retirement of the $26,000,000; and you have that contraction in addition and entirely independent of the other contraction provided for in this bill.

Mr. President, I do not know that this contraction is very imminent. I think not. I think the prospect of surplus revenue is not very good. I think the general condition of this country is bad, and I fear it is getting worse. I fear very much that the worst is not over, but that it is yet to come. Therefore I am not apprehensive of an immediate contraction from this cause; but still this is a source of contraction that this bill leaves open to the Secretary of the Treasury, and he is committed to it by the policy he has avowed and the policy that has been adopted in practice.

I will vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa, though I am not in favor of retiring greenbacks at all at this time, or providing for it, and I may be allowed to observe I do not believe it is the right way of approaching specie payments. The President in his late message, in his plain, direct manner, stated his view upon that subject. He said in this message:

> I am not a believer in any artificial method of making paper money equal to coin when the coin is not owned or held ready to redeem the promises to pay; for paper money is nothing more than promises to pay, and is valuable exactly in proportion to the amount of coin that it can be converted into.

The President of the United States does not believe in these artificial methods of bringing greenbacks up to par, evidently does not believe in the bond plan of conversion, but is in favor of the straightforward, easy to be understood plan of getting the gold to redeem the notes which the Government has promised at a practicable period to redeem in gold, and the President boldly meets the issue that the way to return to specie payments is to get the gold to do it with. You who believe that the Government can get the gold to do it, who are willing to reserve that which is in the Treasury and that which shall come into the Treasury, and are willing to lay taxes for the purpose of getting more gold, have there a direct and easy to be understood plan of returning to specie payments. The President does not believe in this roundabout way.

But, sir, I have said more than I intended to say on this question.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the indulgence of the Senate for a moment to reply to one or two points made by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] and by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN,] and also by the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. WRIGHT.] The point that seems to press them most against this bill is the objection they make to the transfer of the reserve from the city of New York to the West and South. Each Senator has spoken as if this was objectionable.

Mr. MORTON. I said not a word about it.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Illinois said the effect of one clause of this bill which provides for removing the reserve on deposits from New York to the West and South would be to create contraction. The Senator from Iowa alluded to it. The Senator from Indiana also referred to the same matter. Now, if there is any objection to this proposition that has twice received the vote of the Senate and once received the vote of the House of Representatives, if there is really objection to the transfer of this reserve from the city of New York, where it is used simply for stock-gambling, to the West and South, I hope some Senator will move to strike out that clause.

Mr. LOGAN. Now, if the Senator will allow me, he certainly does not wish to place any person in a false position——

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly not.

Mr. LOGAN. I said nothing about my views on that. I only took the two sections, and I said the effect was that much immediate contraction. To overcome that, the point of my argument was that the increase of circulation should be a so much greater percentage over the contraction of the greenbacks as to give a circulation over and above the contraction. I made no point at all on that provision. I only spoke of it in connection with the circulation and with the retirement of 50 per cent. of the greenbacks and the reserve, to show that the utmost effect of the bill would be to give 20 per cent. of circulation, and that probably the contraction between these two sections would exceed the additional circulation.

Mr. SHERMAN. The section which repeals the reserve on circulation passed the House of Representatives. It was intended for the benefit of banks, intended to relieve them from all reserves on circulation, and as a substitute for that 15 or 25 per cent. we require them to maintain 5 per cent. reserve in the Treasury of the United States; so that to this extent both the House bill and the Senate bill are an expansion or unlocking of the currency. But the Senator from Illinois says that the bill also contains another section which transfers the reserve on deposits from New York to the West and South. If the Senator is opposed to that transfer he can move to strike it out. If he thinks that works contraction, and he strikes at the bill in that direction, he can move to strike it out, and then I could give the reasons why we adopted that section which has already passed both Houses.

Under the present law three-fourths of three-fifths of the reserve on deposits may be loaned by bankers in New York to whoever will borrow it on call; and that is just the effect. I have not gone into a close computation, but I will take the Senator's own estimate. Suppose the currency reserve on deposits is $50,000,000, as he states, and I think it is about $50,000,000, or $55,000,000. Three-fifths of that amount may be put in New York, and three-fourths of that three-fifths may be loaned out in New York. How? It is loaned out by the banks of New York only to brokers. It is not made the basis of commercial loans at all. Not a single dollar of the reserves of the country banks held there is loaned for commercial purposes, or for investment in the West or South or anywhere else. It is loaned for speculative stock-broking operations; and business men of the highest character in New York who themselves are presidents of banks have advised against it. They say that while this reserve is piled up in New York, banks there will bid for it and will bid according to the rate of interest to induce the deposit of the reserve with them. Being a deposit on call, liable to be called for at any moment, the New York banks loan it on call themselves. I think this provision of the bill can be defended without regard to whether it inflates or contracts. But if there is objection to having the reserve transferred from New York, relieve the banks entirely from the reserve. If Senators think that really from 15 to 25 per cent. on deposits is too much of a reserve to be maintained by national banks to protect themselves against sudden demands, lower the reserve, and that makes an expansion. I am perfectly willing to leave the banks, with or without reserve, to take their chances. They will break as sure as fate if they do not maintain, in an ordinary state of affairs, from 10 to 25 per cent. in reserve, whether the law provides for it or not. If the reserve required is too large, reduce it, and that affects the question of inflation. But this provision which the Senator from Illinois himself proposed to the Senate is now ingeniously seized upon as an objection to this bill, because forsooth it will induce the transfer of the reserves from New York to the West and South. What good is it to the West and South to have their money, belonging to their own banks, sent to New York and loaned out to stock-brokers in New York? It may be of some service in the West after the banks are located to strengthen them at home, and if they ought not to have that amount of reserve now required by law, why not decrease it? Now to take two provisions together for the purpose of making an argument against this bill, especially when this particular clause has been passed by both Houses of Congress and was offered by the Senator from Illinois himself and assented to by members on both sides, seems to me to be late. If Senators desire to correct their opinion on that question, as they have the right to do; if they think the transfer ought not to be made, it is very easy for them to propose suitable amendments to the bill in that respect; but they do not propose them.

Now a word in regard to another point, and this is the chief point. The Senator from Indiana refers to the $44,000,000 reserve. There is nothing in this bill about a reserve at all. Yesterday the reserve was perhaps $3,000,000; to-day it may be $10,000,000. According to the last statement I saw the currency reserve is swollen to ten millions. Sometimes it must be ten millions. Whenever quarter-day comes for the payment of pensions, they must have on hand seven and a half millions to pay pensions. Sometimes this reserve must run up to ten or fifteen millions. The Secretary of the Treasury carefully studies when he must pay out money. There are times when he must have a large currency reserve. There are other periods of the year when he can run it down to three millions. I have known the currency reserve at one time to run down to two millions. In my judgment it is hardly ever safe to have a currency reserve in the Treasury of less than fifteen millions. It is better to have it. The Secretary of the Treasury would naturally have it, and on an average the reserve has been more than fifteen millions. On the 12th of September, just before the panic, the reserve was about twelve or fifteen millions; the precise amount I do now know, but it was over twelve millions certainly—fourteen millions my friend from New York suggests. To-day it is ten millions, and sometimes it goes down to three millions.

Mr. MORTON. I think the Senator is confounding the currency balance in the Treasury, which varies from time to time, with what is known as the reserve.

Mr. SHERMAN. On the contrary the Treasury Department treats it the same——

Mr. MORTON. I submit that the Treasury Department does not treat it in the same way. The Treasury Department used what was the currency balance in the Treasury, some $15,000,000, last September in the purchase of bonds, but so far as what was known as the reserve was concerned, no part of it down to that time was used in the purchase of bonds, but it was paid out in the current expenses of the Government.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understand it precisely as the Senator says. In other words the Secretary disabled himself from paying the current expenses of the Government with the money on hand by using that balance to bolster up operations in New York, and then necessarily drew upon the $44,000,000 reserve. But that has nothing to do with this bill. The very language of this section is the language of the House bill, the language proposed by the Senator from Iowa the other day, and there is not a word about the $44,000,000 reserve in it. This practically abolishes the idea of such a reserve; it fixes the maximum of United States notes at $382,000,000, and the Secretary of the Treasury will necessarily keep enough of that $382,000,000 to meet his current payments. So there is nothing in that.

Now in regard to the vitality of the clause which the pending amendment touches, I say that without the reduction of the greenbacks as bank-notes are issued, in some proportion, this bill is nothing at all but an inflation measure, a large increase of the paper money without limit, with no guide, no restraint except a provision that in January, 1877, thirty-two months ahead, we will redeem these notes, largely increased then, in bonds of the United States. Sir, I knew the division of sentiment here among Senators. I knew we were all grown-up men and disliked to change our opinions. I have gone to the extreme limit in this bill to meet the ideas of those who desire more paper money if only we could have better paper money. I am not sure but that I have gone too far; perhaps I have; but I am willing to go that far and other Senators are willing to join me. But now when we introduce a proposition here which provides for the continual daily increase of paper money without a single dollar of reduction—for not one dollar of notes can be canceled or redeemed until twice the amount is put in circulation—when we propose that as a compromise with all the other provisions of the bill practically agreed to except one that does not take effect for two years, (for all the other provisions of this bill have come to us from the House of Representatives, have been discussed and carried there,) we are met on this decisive vote which settles the fate of this bill, so far as I am concerned at least, with a proposition that unless you can issue $4,000,000 of paper money for the cancellation of $1,000,000 of paper money certain Senators will not vote for the bill. If that is so, the sooner it is ended the better, in my judgment.

I will not prolong debate. I hope the Senate will act upon this amendment as the vital issue involved in this bill. If a majority decide for it, then, as a matter of course, I will relieve myself from any further custody or care of the measure.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not know but what we are getting into a discussion, which it was proposed to avoid. Certainly, I am saying more than I ought; at least I know I am saying more than I intended when I first suggested the few remarks I have already made; but I do not see the necessity of Senators constantly attempting to place others in a false position. My friend from Ohio tries to impress the Senate with the idea that I was attacking a particular section of the bill, one which I had voted for heretofore, and that therefore I was inconsistent. I must say, and I should like to have his attention for a moment, that his argument was very adroit. I have always given him credit for being a very adroit man; and certainly if he draughted this bill he is entitled to great credit for adroitness. I merely asked the Senator at the outset, this morning, a few questions, that I might myself understand the bill and that others might understand it. I wanted to understand whether this bill gave an increase of currency or whether it contracted the currency at this time. That was the object I had in view, and I tried to get that information from the Senator. He failed, however, and has up to this time, to give any expression of that character to the Senate. I did not attack the third section. I only took the bill together as a whole, and said the bill as a whole did not give any increase of the currency, in my judgment, and I tried to demonstrate it. He is trying to satisfy the country that this is free banking, that any persons can establish banks and issue as much money as the country needs. I was trying to get at the fact whether this bill as it is now was not a deception; and the Senator need not try to put me in any position except the one that I desire to occupy myself. I contrasted these two sections. I have no special objection to the sections, but the objection is to the features of the bill clear through. If you put these two sections together and then put the following section so that the currency issued would at least be equal to what is contracted, it would certainly be much better in my mind; but when you follow them up with a section that makes the currency put in circulation less than the contraction, then I say, take it as a whole, it is not such a measure as the Senate expected to come from the Committee on Finance.

I said that the third section was a contraction in excess of the expansion of the second section. I say so now. I have no objection to that so far as it withdraws money from New York and Boston and Chicago and the large redemption cities and requires it to be kept in the local banks; but I do object to the sections that follow up with a contraction equal to that, so that there is no excess of circulation at all. That is the objection I make to the bill as a whole in that particular.

The bill that came from the House of Representatives came without any contraction of greenbacks at all, and it came without any bond redemption. It came a naked free-banking bill with these two sections in it, one a section of contraction and the other a section of expansion. That is the way the bill came from the House. It came here a measure of free banking, which would give all the currency needed so far as persons might desire to bank under it; but now our committee have added to those sections certain other sections; and what are they? One which contracts the greenbacks 25 per cent. over and above the House bill, and another one which redeems in bonds and attempts to give expansion three years from now.

My opinion of the bill as it stands with the 50 per cent. contraction of the greenbacks, and with the second and third sections, is that until we get to the reduction of the $82,000,000 of greenbacks, it does not give any expansion of the currency whatever. I do not believe the Senator from Ohio will stand up before the Senate and say it does, and I presume he draughted these sections himself. If I misunderstand the bill, I want to be corrected. I have tried to study it. I have tried to figure it out in my mind, and I cannot figure out in this bill any expansion of the currency over and above what I have stated here this morning, over and above 20 per cent. is met by the contraction in the third section of the bill and overbalanced down to the amount of $100,000,000. According to this bill you have to get $100,000,000 of national-bank currency issued to get $20,000,000 in circulation. That is all the circulation it gives you on $100,000,000 of issue. Then in the third section the contraction over and above the second section is more than $20,000,000. Hence this bill at first is a contraction instead of an expansion. That is what I said about it, and I presume the Senator will say so himself.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the Senator will not quote me, because I have already informed him that every day this bill is in operation, and with every change in the organization of a bank, the increase of the currency will be just two for one.

Mr. LOGAN. Just two for one of the issue; but will the Senator say that under this bill, with the second and third sections, there is not more money locked up in the vaults of the banks than will be issued in excess of the contraction, up to $50,000,000 or $100,000,000?

Mr. SHERMAN. I say that under the second section of the bill there will be a great deal of currency put in circulation that cannot now be put in circulation.

Mr. LOGAN. That is true.

Mr. SHERMAN. And under the third section of the bill to the extent that it transfers money, which is now loaned to brokers in New York, to the West, and South, it does tend to contract the currency; and if the Senator objects to it on that point, he can move to strike that out.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator in his adroitness need not attempt to place me in any such position, for I do not intend to be placed there.

When you contract the currency to that extent and stand before the Senate and tell them that it is expansion, I say that your eighth and ninth sections do not expand the currency equal to the amount of the contraction. That is what I mean. I am not fighting the third section at all, and you cannot make that kind of an issue with me here. I am insisting that you have added in your eighth and ninth sections such sections as will not carry out the proposition you state here before the Senate and the country. That is what I mean to say and what I do say. Hence when you present the bill to the country, we ought to understand it and we ought to let them understand it. I do not object to a Senator being in favor of contraction; he has as much right to be in favor of that as I have to be in favor of expansion; but we ought to be fair enough to admit at least what our bill does propose, and not try to place one another in a false position for the purpose of deception upon the country.

We are told that this is free banking. Yes, it is free banking after you get to one hundred and sixty-four millions. You call it free banking now because everybody can establish a bank. Well, it is free banking in that sense; but it is not free banking in the sense that it increases the circulation of the currency.

As I said before, I opposed the section that had the bond redemption in it. In the Senate heretofore I voted to strike it out. I opposed the section that had a retirement of greenbacks in it heretofore, and voted to strike it out. I voted for four hundred millions of United States currency. Why? Because I believed under the law that there were four hundred millions of United States currency. I believed that the President and the Secretary of the Treasury at least had not violated the law in their attempt to issue the four hundred millions. I voted for the four hundred million bill as it was passed by the House almost by a unanimous vote, to legalize the act of the Secretary of the Treasury and of the President in issuing the twenty-six millions. I voted for the forty-six million increase of national-bank currency without any contraction except the reserve upon that. I voted for it conscientiously. That bill did not become a law; but now, because that did not become a law, I am not going to come into the Senate and say that I was wrong in that; at least not until my opinion has been changed, and my opinion has not been changed by any argument I have read on that subject; and my opinion has not been changed by the theory that we have got to come to specie payments by taxation. I am willing to come into the Senate and vote for a bill that I consider a reasonable bill. I am willing to vote for this bill with a small contraction of greenbacks, which is a step in the direction you speak of. You talk about specie payments. That is a step in that direction. I am willing to vote for that. I might be perhaps induced to vote for the other section with certain amendments to it; but let me say to the Senater from Ohio that when he talks about specie payments in 1877, or that if we do not have the gold we will then give a 5 per cent. bond, when he knows the bond will be that which will be used as the redemption, I say he has got to give something in this bill that is reasonable before the country if I am to vote for it—that will meet in some way and recompense for the redemption of greenbacks with a 5 per cent. gold-bearing bond, or a 4 per cent. or any other per cent. gold-bearing bond. I do not believe in the theory, nor do I believe in contraction; but I will vote for it if it is reduced as I suggested. I will vote as I did before.

When we had up the other bill I was voting my sentiments. I thought I was voting in accordance with the sentiments of those much higher in power. I thought I was voting in accordance with messages to the Congress of the United States. I find that I was not. Hence I am not going to be guided by anything of that sort now. I will vote for what I think is right, as I did before, without any reference to the result in the future. I do not believe you can maintain yourselves before the country with a reduction of 50 per cent. in greenbacks, and providing bonds then for the redemption of the balance. Therefore, unless this bill is amended in those two particulars in some way satisfactory, I shall certainly not vote for it. However, that may not prevent its passage.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, sitting between the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Illinois, I have been endeavoring to find, if I can, the difference which exists between them. I understand the Senator from Illinois to contend that under this bill as it stands, until the time that $164,000,000 of national-bank circulation is issued, there will be actual contraction.

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir; I did not say that.

Mr. SCOTT. Well, there will be no increase of currency, I understand the Senator to say.

Mr. LOGAN. I did not say that.

Mr. SCOTT. Does the Senator admit that up until $164,000,000 are issued there will be an increase of currency?

Mr. LOGAN. There will be an increase of national-bank currency issued; nobody questioned that. But the increase of the currency up to a certain amount—I have not figured out the exact amount—will be so small, as I stated—only 20 per cent.—that until you get a large issue of national-bank currency the contraction in the bill is in excess of that 20 per cent. That is what I said, and I took the data which the Senator from Ohio gave this morning, starting on that basis.

I may have loosely spoken of this amount, $164,000,000, because that is double the amount of the greenbacks to be retired; but my meaning is this: I do not believe you will get $164,000,000. I do not believe $164,000,000 of national-bank currency will be issued for years, or for some time at least; and hence that up to the time you will commence redeeming with your bonds probably there will not be sufficient national-bank currency issued over and above the contraction that will occur under the bill to make it any particular reason why this bill should pass. There is no perceptible increase up to that time.

Mr. SCOTT. Whether it made the impression on other Senators or not, it did upon my mind that the Senator from Illinois entertained the belief that until $164,000,000 of national-bank currency shall be issued under this bill there will be no actual increase over the contraction authorized by the bill.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will allow me to restate that point again——

Mr. SCOTT. No; I understand it. I am stating that was the impression made on my mind. I wish now to get at the actual arithmetical result, if I can, upon the basis which I understood the Senator from Illinois to base it upon himself. Suppose $164,000,000 of national-bank currency to be issued; let it take one year, or eighteen months, or two years to issue that amount. The contraction that would follow the issue of that under the bill would be, first, 50 per cent. in legal-tenders, which would amount to $82,000,000; second, the average of reserves upon deposits, which I understood him to fix at 20 per cent. on the $164,000,000. Fixing that 20 per cent. on the $164,000,000 would make $32,000,000 more; then 5 per cent. of the $164,000,000 to be deposited with the United States Treasurer for the purpose of redemption would make a little over $8,000,000; so that the contraction under the 50 per cent. clause, under the reserves for deposit, and under the reserves for redemption with the United States Treasurer would amount to $122,000,000, which would leave, taken from the $164,000,000, a net increase of currency over all contraction of $42,000,000. So then if the Senator did entertain the idea or if he made the impression on any other Senator that until $164,000,000 should be issued there would be no increase, I think he was mistaken.

Mr. LOGAN. Now if the Senator will allow me, on the $164,000,000 issue, how much excess does he get?

Mr. SCOTT. Forty-two million dollars.

Mr. LOGAN. Now, if the Senator will take the second and third sections of the bill, and compare them together, he will find that he has got about even, because one expands and the other contracts, and the contraction is so much greater. I have not figured it out, but the gentleman will find that he has but a few dollars in excess.

Mr. SCOTT. It is the third section of the bill that I have been considering, for that is the one which withdraws the reserves from New York, and if that effects a decrease of the amount of paper money in circulation, then I am mistaken, because that is only taken home for a reserve on deposits.

Mr. LOGAN. But the difference is this: under the present law there is a certain portion of it allowed to be in circulation, but under this bill you withdraw it and lock it up. The withdrawal amounts to about $40,000,000, and under your bill, with your $164,000,000 issued, you have but $40,000,000 of actual circulation. So you have the thing about even when you have $164,000,000 issued. That is the way it stands; but if you put it at $100,000,000, (and I presume it will take two years at least before you get $100,000,000 of national-bank circulation under the bill,) what then will be the result? On $100,000,000, on your own calculation, you have $20,000,000 of circulation in excess of the withdrawal for the purpose of your deposits and for the purpose of starting the banks here. Is not that correct? Then if you take the second and third sections, what do you find? By the third section you withdraw and lock up nearly $40,000,000, or at least $35,000,000 more than you expand by the second section. Then you have $20,000,000 less of circulation than you had when you started. That is the case exactly, and that is the result.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will offer myself as a mediator between these two conflicting opinions, and if the Senator who has charge of the bill has no objection I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. I will not do it against his wish.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope it will be generally understood that to-morrow we shall close this bill. At least I will, so far as I am concerned, insist upon it.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Make a suggestion that the debate stop at three o'clock.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; I think that would not be safe on this bill. I give notice that to-morrow, if sustained by a majority of the Senate, whatever phase the bill may assume, I shall insist on sitting the bill out.

E. BOYD PENDLETON.

Mr. BOREMAN. I ask to be allowed to make a motion to reconsider.

Mr. ANTHONY. Certainly; I yield for that.

Mr. BOREMAN. Yesterday there was an adverse report made by the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. WRIGHT,] from the Committee on Finance, on Senate bill No. 653, for the relief of E. Boyd Pendleton, late collector of internal revenue, fifth district of Virginia, and the bill was indefinitely postponed. I ask that the vote be reconsidered and that the bill go upon the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the vote being reconsidered by which that bill was indefinitely postponed?

Mr. WRIGHT. I do not object.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the bill ought to go on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the reconsideration of the indefinite postponement of the bill.

Mr. BOREMAN. Now let it go on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

SENATOR FROM ALABAMA.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to give notice that on the 26th of this month I will call up the contested-election case of Alabama, the case of Mr. Sykes.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 2343) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. ANTHONY. I renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened and (at four o'clock and twenty-six minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, May 13, 1874.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read.

THE FREEDMAN'S BANK.

Mr. BROMBERG. Before the Journal is approved I desire to have a correction made. I send to the Clerk's desk to be read the following from the report of the proceedings of yesterday as to certain papers in relation to the Freedman's Bank.

The Clerk read as follows:

The SPEAKER. Well, that of course will give the gentleman half an hour, unless he chooses to yield any of his time to some one else.

Mr. BURCHARD. Then I move that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

Mr. BROMBERG. No, sir; I have not yielded the floor for that purpose. I think the motion to reconsider had better be left pending, for the reason that the committee may not report the bill for some time.

The SPEAKER. The committee will report the bill to-morrow or the next day.

Mr. BROMBERG. With that understanding I have no objection to laying the motion to reconsider on the table.

The motion to reconsider was then laid upon the table.

Mr. BROMBERG. The point I make is this: that the Journal shows that the laying the motion to reconsider on the table was absolute, whereas I made the motion conditionally.

The SPEAKER. There could be no conditional entry made on the Journal. There could be no other entry on the Journal than that which is on it. It is a mere question of good faith between the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BROMBERG] and the Chair. The gentleman is in no danger of losing his right. If the bill should not be reported, then the Chair would recognize the gentleman on a motion to reconsider.

Mr. BROMBERG. That is all I require.

Mr. MERRIAM. We are very anxious to give the gentleman the opportunity he craves. He need not feel any anxiety.

The Journal was then approved.

GENEVA AWARD.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ask that the Judiciary Committee may have leave to report at any time the Geneva award bill.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the order was made; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ASSISTANT DISBURSING CLERK OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. HARMER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and referred to the Committee on Accounts:

Resolved, That the salary of the assistant disbursing clerk of the House be restored to the rate fixed by the act of March 3, 1873, and that the Committee on Appropriations provide for the payment of the same.

SECURITY OF LIFE ON STEAM-VESSELS.

Mr. NEGLEY. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole, to resume the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1588) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the better security of life on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, and for other purposes."

The motion was agreed to.

HIRAM H. M'COLLEY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in relation to the claim of Hiram H. McColley for the value of property from which he was ejected by military authorities at Camp McDermitt, Nevada; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM A. RANKIN.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with the act of May 29, 1872, the claim of William A. Rankin for Indian depredations; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

JAMES M'DOUGALL ET AL.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting the claims of James McDougall and others for Indian depredations; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

PROBST & KIRCHNER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with the act of May 29, 1872, the claim of Probst & Kirchner for Indian depredations; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

PETER PROVENCHERE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, in relation to the private land claim of Peter Provenchere; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

LIEUTENANT G. M. BAIRD.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with the act of May 29, 1872, the claim of Lieutenant G. M. Baird for Indian depredations; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

JACQUES CLAMORGAN.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a report on the private land claim of Jacques Clamorgan, in Missouri; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

ZACHARY T. WALROND.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with the act of May 29, 1872, the claim of Zachary T. Walrond for Indian depredations; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

D. E. M'DONALD.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with the act of May 29, 1872, the claim of D. E. McDonald, for Indian depredations; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

JAMES H. DENNIS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, in relation to the contracts of James H. Dennis, for improving the Tennessee River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

CHAIN BRIDGE ABOVE GEORGETOWN.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting an estimate of appropriations required to complete the superstructure of the Chain Bridge above Georgetown; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

FAILURE OF CROPS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a petition of certain citizens of Santa Fé, New Mexico, asking aid from the Government on account of the failure of their crops; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

JOHN C. LEMON.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, inclosing a bill for the relief of John C. Lemon, late colonel Tenth New York Cavalry; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

DR. F. BOUGHTER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with the act of May 29, 1872, the claim of Dr. F. Boughter, for Indian depredations; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

ARMY MEDICAL MUSEUM.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, inclosing a letter from Dr. A. Y. P. Garnett, offering to sell to the Government a piece of property adjacent to the Army Medical Museum; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

INDIAN FUNDS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting the draught of a bill authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to make transfer of certain funds belonging to the Kaskaskia, Peoria, Weas, and Piankeshaw Indians, to the United States, to reimburse the United States for that amount hitherto advanced to said Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

LEECH LAKE INDIANS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, in relation to the necessity for a separate agency for the Leech Lake Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIM.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with the act of July 22, 1854, the report of the surveyor-general of New Mexico on land grant, being private land claim No. 87; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

INDIAN CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting the claim of the absent Shawnees and other Indians for losses sustained during the rebellion; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

PHILO SCHULTZE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in relation to the claim of Lieutenant Philo Schultze and others, officers and men of Company B, Fourteenth United States Infantry, for property destroyed on the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

MARY E. MELINE.

On motion of Mr. COBURN, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3264) granting a pension to Mary E. Meline, widow of James F. Meline; and the same was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

DAVID G. BURNET.

On motion of Mr. COBURN, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2620) for the relief of the legal representatives of David G. Burnet, late of the State of Texas; and the same was referred to the Committee on Claims.

ARMY REGULATIONS.

Mr. ALBRIGHT, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 844) to authorize the promulgation of the general regulations for the government of the Army; and the same was recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

RELIEF OF ARMY OFFICERS.

Mr. COBURN, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a joint resolution (H. R. No. 101) construing the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution amendatory of the 'joint resolution for the relief of certain officers of the Army,' approved July 26, 1866," approved June 11, 1870; which was recommitted to the committee, and ordered to be printed.

RECONSIDERATION.

Mr. BURCHARD. Is it the understanding that all these matters which are recommitted are not to be brought back by motions to reconsider?

The SPEAKER. That is not the understanding unless it is distinctly so stated. Gentlemen must not find fault if a great deal of business comes up unexpectedly in this mode of proceeding. Great vigilance is required to prevent business from coming up in that way upon motions to reconsider.

Mr. BURCHARD. I move, then, to reconsider all the votes taken this morning by which measures have been referred or recommitted, and to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LAND DISTRICT IN COLORADO.

Mr. PHILLIPS, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on the Public Lands, with amendments, the bill (H. R. No. 1507) to create an additional land district in the Territory of Colorado; which was ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the Committee on the Public Lands, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, their Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the House of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 1122) granting a pension to Mrs. Martha E. Northup, widow of Edward B. Northup, late of the Seventeenth United States Infantry; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2846) repealing the act entitled "An act fixing the time for the election of Representatives from the State of California for the Forty-fourth Congress."

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, and requested the concurrence of the House in, a bill of the following title;

A bill (S. No. 7) for the creation of a court for the adjudication and disposition of certain moneys received into the Treasury under an award made by the tribunal of arbitration constituted by virtue of the first article of the treaty concluded at Washington the 8th of May, A. D. 1871, between the United States of America and the Queen of Great Britain.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. NEGLEY. I insist upon the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being demanded, the House now resolves itself into Committee of the Whole.

SECURITY OF LIFE ON STEAM-VESSELS.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. PARKER, of Missouri, in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1588) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the better security of life on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, and for other purposes."

The CHAIRMAN. The pending section of the bill is section 43. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] to strike out the latter portion of the section, as follows:

And such provisions and limitations are also extended and applied to all claims for loss of life or personal injury, both as against the owner or owners, charterer or charterers of the vessel, and the captain, mate, engineer, and pilot thereof.

Mr. BROMBERG. I object to this amendment for this reason: by striking out that portion of the section you attempt to punish the owner or charterer of a steamboat for loss of life for which he is not responsible. In the preceding section there is an express provision meeting the case of loss of life by punishing the party directly responsible. To add to that an additional penalty upon the owner is certainly to do it for the sake of punishing him. The owner cannot control the action of the officers of the vessel; and if he is to be held responsible at all wherever damages occur, it certainly ought to be in the same measure that will apply in any case, not in damages intended to be vindictive. If this provision is stricken out, owners of vessels will be compelled to obtain straw men to represent them. For instance, a man purchases a vessel and sells it again to a third party, taking a mortgage on the vessel; the third party being the owner in law, but the real owner of course being the man holding the mortgage. When any accident occurs a suit is entered, which is brought against the man of straw, and the real owner cannot be reached. Such a subterfuge of course would not be resorted to by an honorable man willingly, except as a measure of necessity. In many cases two or three persons own a vessel worth from $200,000 to $300,000. They might club together and form a corporation with a nominal capital below the real value of the vessel, and when sued they are reponsible only for the nominal capital.

Mr. ELDREDGE. In all such cases would not the remedy be by a proceeding in rem against the vessel, instead of a suit against the party?

Mr. BROMBERG. As the matter now stands, if the man is worth considerably more than the value of the vessel, his whole fortune may be swept away by suits for damages arising out of an accident to one vessel.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Why should not that be? It seems to me the gentleman has himself presented the very best argument why it should be. He puts it upon this ground: that men of straw are held out to the world as the owners, and they have no personal responsibility. It seems to me that he has given the best argument why the real owner should be held responsible not only for damages resulting from non-fulfillment of contract, but also for damages resulting from carelessness or negligence. Railroad companies are held responsible for the acts of their servants, and ought to be.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Does not the common law apply now?

Mr. BROMBERG. The common law does not apply to vessels on the high seas, but it attaches to vessels on the rivers, as I understand. That condition of things acts as a check. It is found advisable to limit the responsibility to a definite amount.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BROMBERG. I move to strike out the last word. I object to the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has no right to move another amendment and proceed to speak upon it until some one on the other side has been heard on the pending amendment.

Mr. CONGER. I did not hear all that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BROMBERG] said.

Mr. BROMBERG. I was just coming back to the point when I was interrupted by the Chair. If the gentleman will give me time I will state my point.

Mr. CONGER. I cannot give out of the five minutes, which is all I have.

Mr. BROMBERG. Then move to strike out the last word, and I can oppose that.

Mr. CONGER. I gave my views of this amendment yesterday and the reasons for it. But I wish to say in addition that the committee had ordered these words to be struck out.

Mr. NEGLEY. The majority of the committee agreed to that amendment, thereby influencing my judgment.

Mr. BROMBERG. I never agreed to it.

Mr. CONGER. According to the memorandum I have the majority of the committee agreed to it.

Mr. Chairman, by the act of 1851 liability for damage is limited to the value of the vessel and of the freight then pending. My objection to this clause is that I would not limit in any such way the liability of the owners or masters for loss of life by reason of negligence. I think it wrong that we should attempt this class of legislation. If we thus limit the liability it is not limited for the loss of one life only; it may be for ten; it may be for one hundred; it may be for an unlimited number. I think this is dangerous legislation. I opposed it in committee and I oppose it here. I trust the committee will strike out these last lines. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDREDGE.]

Mr. ELDREDGE. Mr. Chairman, in my suggestion to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BROMBERG] I said about all that I desired to say. I will only add that I believe it very dangerous to undertake to limit liability in case of loss of life. We have had a little too much experience recently in loss of life by carelessness in the management of vessels. It seems to me that we cannot impose too great obligations upon those who navigate the seas or the lakes or the rivers in order to induce them to take the greatest possible care of the lives of those intrusted to them. Only recently a vessel was known to have gone down, with several hundred passengers on board, through sheer carelessness. I think that those who are intrusted with the care of human life upon the seas should be held to the strictest accountability; and in my judgment every person owning an interest in a vessel should have such obligations put upon him as would require him for his own protection to employ the most careful and experienced men to perform every duty connected with navigation. I do not think we can possibly hold men to too strict an accountability in such cases.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GOOCH. I propose to move an amendment to insert a clause in lieu of this if it should be struck out.

Mr. NEGLEY. I rise merely to make an explanation, not to continue the debate. It is my intention to offer an argument in support of this section; but in deference to the views of the majority of my colleagues on the committee and also of gentlemen who represent steamboat interests here, I have assented to striking out that portion of the section as proposed in the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan, although I disagree with him as to the propriety of doing so. In order, however, to arrive at a speedy vote and reach final action as soon as possible on this bill, I have given assent to the amendment.

Mr. GOOCH. As the gentleman [Mr. NEGLEY] has charge of this bill I would like to ask him a question before he takes his seat. If this clause be struck out, how does it leave the matter of liability?

Mr. NEGLEY. It leaves it precisely as it is left under the law of 1851, as applicable to the ocean and the great lakes; the liability is restricted to the value of the vessel and the freight then pending. Under the civil law the liability of the owner ex delicto is limited to the value of the vessel and the freight pending. By the proposed amendment you do not secure practically any greater liability, for the simple reason that the ownership of these vessels is vested now in men who evade the responsibility of ownership. The owner sells his vessel and obtains a mortgage by which he practically controls the ownership. In addition to that, most of these vessels are owned by corporations; and the limitation of liability in the different States varies. There is no reason why the law on this subject in respect to vessels navigating our rivers should not be uniform with that applicable to the ocean and the lakes.

This section recognizes the principles and objects of the act of 1851, and applies its provisions to vessels navigating rivers and inland waters. It is intended to limit the liability of ship-owners in case of loss, damage, or forfeiture done, occasioned, or incurred without the privity or knowledge of the owner or owners.

The navigation of many of our western rivers is as dangerous and as subject to unavoidable accidents as is that of the ocean or great lakes, and the great importance to the people in the valley of the Mississippi River of this navigation warrants and demands that it be placed on the same footing as ocean and lake navigation. Without the fourth section of the act of 1851, the law is incomplete and partial in its operation. The act of 1851 has been passed upon by our highest courts and its meaning is well understood. Any change might, and no doubt would, be followed by very costly and tedious litigation.

That act, in accordance with provisions now finding place in the law of all, or nearly all, the nations of the maritime world, applies to vessels navigating the ocean and the great lakes. It should equally apply to such vessels as are beneath admiralty jurisdiction, and which navigate the rivers. It is only from the peculiar language of the concluding proviso of the act that the law does not now apply to such vessels employed in river navigation. Vessels required to be inspected by the steamboat law, and navigating the rivers of the country, are beneath admiralty jurisdiction.

Most of the vessels on the western rivers are owned by corporations under acts of incorporation which vary as to liability in different States, as follows:

Ohio, general law, double liability.

Kentucky, special law, single liability.
Indiana, general law, double liability.
Illinois, general law, single liability.
Missouri, general law, single liability.
Michigan, general law, double liability.

To escape this unjust discrimination and to escape malicious prosecution the owners of steamboats are obliged to resort to practices which would be frowned down in other kinds of business—in fact, the law as it now stands and is proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GOOCH] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] would be offering a premium for the evasion of the law. To enable the provisions of the section to be thoroughly understood, it is really necessary that the origin of this legislation should be shown.

By the civil law the owners of vessels were liable in matters ex delicto according to the amount of their interests in the ship. Its provisions were somewhat different, however, from the later law of maritime Europe. The principle that in matters ex delicto the liability of ship-owners should be only coextensive with their interest in the ship, became the law of maritime Europe, with but few exceptions. It was the law of Holland, Hamburg, and Sweden, and of almost if not the entire north of Europe. It was the law of France by special ordinance. It was largely, if not entirely, the law of communities bordering upon the Mediterranean. (Grotius, De Jure Belli et Pacis, section 2, chapter 11, section 13; Marine Ordinance, Louis XIV, title 4; 2 Peter's Admiralty Decisions, Appendix xvi; Cleirac Navigation des Rivières, article 15; Consulat de la Mer, chapter 34; The Rebecca Ware, 195–197; Jacobsen's Sea Laws, 328; Abbott on Shipping, 395; Pope vs. Nickerson, 3 Story, 465; Machlachlan on Mercantile Shipping, 107.) In these laws and ordinances is found the origin of the first express legislation on the subject, and that legislation has been said only to enact the provisions or principles of older maritime law. (2 Brown's Admiralty and Civil Law, 147, note.) The case of Boucher vs. Lawson was decided in 1733. It decided that ship-owners were liable for coin embezzled by the masters of ships. (Boucher vs. Lawson, Rep. Temp., Hardwicke, 85.)

Alarmed by such decision, the merchants of London, on petition to Parliament, in 1734, procured the passage of the act 1 George II, chapter 15. (Bacon's Abridgment, 594; Abbott on Shipping, 395.) This act provided that the ship-owner should not be liable for such embezzlement, and further provided that such owner should not be liable—

> For any act, matter, or thing, damage or forfeiture, done, occasioned, or incurred from and after the 24th day of June, 1734, by the master or mariners, or any of them, without the privity and knowledge of such owner or owners, further than the value of the ship or vessel with all their appurtenances and the full amount of the freight due, or to grow due, for and during the voyage wherein such embezzlement * * * or other malversation * * * shall be made, committed, or done. (Abbott on Shipping, 395; 9 English Statutes at Large, 365.)

The act therefore provided for entire exemption from liability in cases of embezzlement, and for a liability commensurate with the interest of the owner in the ship, for any other act, matter, or thing done, occasioned, or incurred, &c.

The case of Boucher vs. Lawson was followed by the case of Sutton vs. Mitchell, and that by the case, decided in 1785, of Forward vs. Pittard. (Sutton vs. Mitchell, 1 Term Reports, 18; Forward vs. Pittard, 1 Term Reports, 27.)

Lord Mansfield, in deciding this last case, says: "There are events for which the carrier is liable, independent of his contract." That further responsibility is, "by the custom of the realm, that is, by the common law, by which a carrier is in the nature of an insurer." Upon familiar principles, he therefore decides a carrier, in a case of accidental fire, to be liable for the entire loss happening thereby to the owner of the goods in process of carriage.

This was the undoubted common-law rule at the time; and under the custom of the realm, the law of England being established to be thus different from that of continental Europe, these decisions were followed by the acts of 26 George III, chapter 86, in 1787; and this by 53 George III, chapter 159, in 1813.

The object of all these acts is stated in some of the acts themselves. It was stated in the preamble to the act of 7 George III that—

> It was of the greatest consequence and importance to the kingdom to promote the increase of the number of ships and vessels, and to prevent any discouragement to merchants and others from being interested and concerned therein.

The courts have recognized the whole object of this legislation to be "to encourage persons to become the owners of ships." (Gale vs. Laurie, 5 Barnewall and Cresswell, 156.)

These acts are the sources of the act of Congress of 1851. The phraseology of the English acts, in important particulars, is the same as that employed in our own.

The common-law rule in all its severity, unqualified by legislation, became the law of this country. The case of the Lexington was decided in 1848, (The N. J. S. M. Company vs. The Merchants' Bank, 6 Howard, 344,) and was followed by the act of 1851. Previous to this, and as early as 1818 and 1821, the Legislatures of the States of Massachusetts and Maine had enacted similar laws. (3 Kent's Commentaries, 217.)

Such acts are regarded as in harmony with and as carrying out the principles of the laws and ordinances of maritime Europe, to which reference has been made. (Stinson vs. Wyman, Ware, 172–176.)

By the act of Victoria (25 and 26 Victoria, 63,) the limitations of liability in such cases are extended fully to all cases involving loss of life or personal injury; and to property carried upon the ship, or upon any other ship. The whole object of such legislation professedly and necessarily was, by decrease of liability of those upon whom no personal fault could be charged, to promote that commerce which an enlightened policy would seek to foster. This was the express object of the act of 1851, to which reference has been made; and its leading idea was to place the commerce of this country upon the same footing as that of England, that competition between the two great maritime powers might not be unequal. (23 Congressional Globe, 717 and 719.)

The Supreme Court of the United States has decided that the provisions of this act extend to the great northwestern lakes. (Moore vs. A. T. Company, 24 Howard, 1.)

The leading provisions of the act, as to which questions have arisen, are contained in its third and fourth section. The third section provides substantially as follows:

> The liability of the owner or owners of any ship or vessel for any embezzlement, loss, or destruction by the master, officers, mariners, passengers, or any other person or persons, of any property, goods, or merchandise shipped or put on board of such ship or vessel; or for any loss, damage, or injury by collision; or for any act, matter, or thing, loss, damage, or forfeiture done, occasioned, or incurred, without the privity or knowledge of such owner or owners, shall in no case exceed the amount or value of the interest of such owner or owners, respectively, in such ship or vessel, and her freight then pending.

The fourth section provides:

> That if any embezzlement, loss, or destruction shall be suffered by the several freighters or owners of goods, wares, or merchandise, or any property whatever, on the same voyage, and the whole value of the ship or vessel, and her freight for the voyage, shall not be sufficient to make compensation to each of them, they shall receive compensation from the owner or owners of the ship or vessel in proportion to their respective losses, and the owner or owners of the ship or vessel, or any of them, may take the appropriate proceedings in any court for the purpose of apportioning the sum for which the owner or owners of the ship or vessel may be liable among the parties entitled thereto. And it shall be deemed a sufficient compliance with the requirements of this act on the part of such owner or owners if he or they shall transfer his or their interest in such vessel and freight for the benefit of such claimants to a trustee, to be appointed by any court of competent jurisdiction to act as such trustee for the person or persons who may prove to be legally entitled thereto, from and after which transfer all claims and proceedings against the owner or owners shall cease. (9 Statutes at Large, page 635.)

Under these sections three leading questions have arisen, and several difficulties have been found in the practical application of the law and its undoubted principles in actual litigation.

1. Question has arisen as to whether the provisions of the third section apply to cases of loss of life or personal injury.

2. At what moment of time should the value of the interest of the ship-owner be estimated? Should it be as it was before the happening of the event out of which the claimed liability arose? Or should it be at the moment after?

3. It was not seriously questioned until lately that the limitations of liability contained in the third section applied to claims for injuries to property, not of the ship-owner invoking the protection of the act, but of another ship, for instance, upon which the vessel of the ship-owner might come in collision or as to the other ship itself.

It has been held lately by Judge Woodruff, in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Connecticut, that the limitations of the section did not apply, except to claims for injuries to property carried on the vessel of the ship-owner.

In the practical application of the law, two leading difficulties have been judicially pronounced to exist:

1. It has been held by the court of last resort in Massachusetts that although a ship-owner might own but part of the ship, nevertheless in joint action brought against him and the other owners joint recovery could only be had; and that therefore, in cases to which the law unquestionably applied, he be made virtually responsible to the prosecuting party in the whole value of the vessel.

2. Where several actions have been prosecuted by one party, who has sustained loss by calamity in which others have also sustained loss, notwithstanding the provisions of the fourth section, it has been held, from its peculiar language and also from the rigid practice of the common-law courts, that it was impossible in such action to ascertain the proportionate amount which the party prosecuting should recover.

The prevailing idea of several decisions upon this subject has been that, as other parties had sustained such losses who were not before the court, it was not practical to take proof of the amount of the aggregate claims, and allow the prosecuting party only to recover his proportionate amount. The argument that the absent parties could not be strictly affected by the result, did not in these litigations prevail. It has, however, been virtually decided by Judge Woodruff, in the case to which allusion has been made, that this difficulty did not exist; and that certainly the flexible practice of the admiralty courts would adapt itself to the exigencies created by the act, and enable the party only to recover such amount as beneath the law he was entitled to. These are the questions, and these the difficulties, which this section mainly proposes to remedy.

Nor can it be said that such provision should not properly find its place in this act. The act, by extensive requisition, has created occasion for extended liability; and extending liability, as it does, certainly it should see that the principle which has prevailed throughout the commercial world so long should be extended to ship-owners, changed as their liability may be by this important act.

The first substantial provision of the act extends its application to all vessels required to be inspected beneath this act. The act already, by its own terms, applies to vessels employed in ocean navigation; and the Supreme Court, in the case of Moore vs. The A. T. Company, to which reference has been made, in its decision that the navigation of the great Western lakes was not inland, as that word is used in the concluding proviso of the act of 1851, have extended the operation of the law to those waters.

That proviso is a substantial quotation from the act of either 2 or 3 George. It contains the word "rivers;" that the act shall not apply to vessels employed in "rivers or inland navigation." The same reason that would extend the application of the law to the lakes would extend it also to the rivers upon which a kindred commerce is carried on. Such extension, therefore, by the vision of this section, is included within the principle of the very act itself.

The broad language of the third section would extend the application of the law to cases of loss of life and personal injury. In no reported case has it been decided whether or not the third section does apply to such cases. In one unreported case, thoroughly argued at nisi prius, it was held that it did so apply. The statute of Victoria, to which reference has been made, by express terms limits the liability of the ship-owner in such cases. The principle which led to the original enactment of the act of 1851 (that competition should be equal between the ship-owners of both countries) requires that the same broad limitation should be provided for by our own act. This, then, is nothing novel in principle or practice.

It will be observed that in the fourth section ship-owners can exempt themselves from liability by assignment to a trustee. Certainly such assignment cannot be made until after the happening of the event out of which the claims have arisen. The court of last resort in Massachusetts, nevertheless, has held, in a case where the ship was totally lost, that her value was to be computed as it was before the happening of the act out of which the claim in suit arose. The court followed the reasoning of English cases arising under the act of one of the Georges.

The English act, instead of providing for assignment to a trustee, provided for exemption from liability by deposit of the value of the vessel in court.

Under that statute the English court decided that the value was to be estimated as it was before the happening of the event out of which the causes of action arose.

Providing, as the fourth section does, for exemption from liability by assignment to a trustee, and bearing in mind the general principle of the act, that it is deemed of the highest public policy that commerce should be fostered by making the ship-owner only risk the value of his vessel, certainly it is again nothing novel that this act should provide exactly for the time at which the value of the vessel and her pending freight should be estimated.

The decision of Judge Woodruff, to which allusion has been made, that the limitation of liability did not apply to cases of injury to another ship or her cargo, it is claimed is in conflict with the principles of the act. The act was not one limiting the liability of the common carrier; it was an act providing, in substance, that where the personal fault of the ship-owner was not co-operative in producing the result, his liability, although the loss might proceed from the negligence of his servant, should be limited to the value of his ship or his interest in her and her pending freight.

Had it been the intent of the act simply to limit the liability of the ship-owner as a common carrier, it would have provided in so many words and need only have provided that ship-owners should not be deemed common carriers. But it did much more. It limited such liability as might arise to the ship-owner under the maxim respondeat superia to the value of his interest in the ship and freight. The liability of the common carrier to the owner of his own cargo is the severest known to the common law. It would be a strange provision of law which should limit liabilities where such was the obligation, as is the obligation undoubtedly of the ship-owner to the owner of his cargo, and yet should not limit that liability as to the owner of a cargo on another ship with which his own came in collision, as to which owner he stood under no personal obligation. The principle of the law was to foster commerce, and it is the introduction of no novelty to provide plainly that the limitation of liability shall extend as well to other ships and other cargoes, or to other property, as to property carried upon the ship of the ship-owner, to which the limitations of the act now unquestionably apply.

The third section evidently intends to provide that no part-owner of a ship shall be liable beyond the extent of his interest. The rigid forms of the common law and the rigid practice of the courts should not prevent the carrying out of the undoubted intent of the act itself. It is therefore provided in this act that these forms and this practice shall be modified to meet the provisions of the act.

In the case of the prosecution of separate action by one party suffering loss, there is no actual reason why the ship-owner should not be permitted to prove the aggregate of claims arising out of the transaction in question, and those in diminution of damages, limiting the recovery of the prosecuting party to the proportionate amount which he should recover under the act. The plaintiff could introduce proof with respect to any such question, and the determination of the case could in no way affect others not party to the suit.

In providing plainly that this may be done, the amendment is in accord with the substantial decision of Judge Woodruff in this particular, to which allusion has been made, and makes the practice plain, so that doubts hitherto entertained or difficulties decided to exist by other courts may be done away with.

It is repeated that all the provisions of this section have been already recognized by legislation, or are in remedy of difficulties found in the practical application of a statute which has been enforced with respect to most of the mercantile marine of the United States for some twenty years.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, is debate exhausted?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. I only wish to say that the clause proposed to be struck out is a provision of the English statutes, and certainly ought to be a part of our own law.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. CONGER, it was adopted.

Mr. GOOCH. I move to amend by inserting in lieu of the words just struck out the following:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to impair the force and effect of the forty-third section of an act entitled "An act to provide for the better security of life on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, and for other purposes," approved February 28, 1871.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. GOOCH,] inasmuch as the effect of this bill, if enacted, will be to repeal former acts on the same subject, his amendment should re-enact the forty-third section of the former law. It will thus correspond to what has been done all through the bill.

Mr. GOOCH. I would as soon have it in that form.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman had the forty-third section of the law read yesterday. I ask him to accept that as a substitute for his proposition.

Mr. GOOCH. I would like to have it re-enacted in that form.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I ask that the forty-third section of the act of 1871 may be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

And be it further enacted, That whenever damage is sustained by any passenger or his baggage from explosion, fire, collision, or other cause, the master and the owner of such vessel, or either of them, and the vessel, shall be liable to each and every person so injured to the full amount of damage, if it happen either by neglect or failure to comply with the provisions of law herein prescribed, or through known defect or imperfection of the steaming apparatus, or of the hull; and any person sustaining loss or injury through the carelessness, negligence, or willful misconduct of any captain, mate, engineer, or pilot, or his neglect or refusal to obey the provisions of law herein prescribed as to navigating such steamers, may sue such captain, mate, engineer, or pilot, and recover damages for any such injury caused as aforesaid by any such captain, mate, engineer, or pilot.

Mr. GOOCH. I accept that in place of my proposition. It accomplishes the same object, but in a different form. My proposition was that nothing in this act should impair the force and effect of that section, that it should be left operative. The proposition of the gentleman from Indiana is that as this act repeals the act of 1871, we shall re-enact the forty-third section and make it a part of this bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Wherever it is intended to retain a section it is here re-enacted.

Mr. GOOCH. I accept his proposition so that we may vote on the re-enactment of the forty-third section of the act of 1871.

Now it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the forty-third section of this bill gives no redress whatever in case of injury to the person or loss of life, whether the words which have just been stricken out be retained or not. I am not able to read the forty-third section in connection with the act of 1851 so as to find in it any remedy whatever in the case of injury to the person, but in the act of 1871 I do find a very positive provision for the protection of life and person.

I am satisfied this committee will never strike that provision out of the law unless some other equally stringent provision is inserted to secure the object that section is designed and intended to secure. Therefore it was that I wished to know from the committee yesterday whether they intended to repeal the whole of the act of 1871. I now understand they do intend to repeal the whole of that act. If we do pass the bill in the form in which it stands without re-enacting the forty-third section of the act of 1871, it will contain no provision whatever for the protection of life or person on board of steam-vessels. I apprehend the committee will not place itself in the position of striking down the only statutory provision there is in the law for the protection of life and person.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman desires to accomplish the same thing the committee does.

Mr. GOOCH. I have no doubt of it.

Mr. CONGER. We have no conflict of object. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the limitation of the law of 1851 is not in the law of 1871. We desire to extend that limitation and liability over western waters as over the ocean and the lakes. In order to do that we make section 43 as it is in this bill without quoting here the law of 1851. If the law of 1851 accomplishes the object the gentleman intends, that is all that can be asked. The law of 1851 has among other provisions the following:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the liability of the owner or owners of any ship or vessel, for any embezzlement, loss, or destruction, by the master, officers, mariners, passengers, or any other person or persons, of any property, goods, or merchandise, shipped or put on board of such ship or vessel, or for any loss, damage, or injury by collision, or for any act, matter, or thing, loss, damage, or forfeiture, done, occasioned, or incurred, without the privity or knowledge of such owner or owners, shall in no case exceed the amount or value of the interest of such owner or owners, respectively, in such ship or vessel, and her freight then pending.

This limits the liability for the loss or damage of property. But I submit to the gentleman that he does not want to limit the liability for the loss of life to any value which we may fix in this bill. It should be left according to the law, as it is now. I think myself it is a bad law when we enact that the liability of railroads for loss of life shall be one thousand or five thousand dollars, and I certainly would not extend that to the liability of ship-owners.

Now we have re-enacted in the forty-third section all the provisions in regard to property, baggage, and cargo. We have made it a substitute for the section which the gentleman would re-enact. We think that is the better course, and it is in accordance at all events with the law all over the land except in regard to the western and southern rivers. It is a law as regards the great lakes, the ocean, and the Gulf, and there is no reason why it should not be extended over the rivers of the West and the South.

Mr. NEGLEY. I hope the committee will now come to a vote and vote the amendment down.

Mr. GOOCH. I move to strike out the last word.

I desire to ask the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] if he considers that the section which he has read from the law of 1851 covers the same ground and creates the same liability as the forty-third section of the act of 1871? If he does, he and I do not understand it alike.

Mr. CONGER. The act of 1871, the gentleman will perceive, is an act punishing neglect. Now, common law punishes neglect without a limitation of liability.

Mr. NEGLEY. And other provisions of this bill do so, also.

Mr. CONGER. Yes; as the gentleman will see if he looks at another section.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. If the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GOOCH] will look at the sixth section of the act of 1851 he will find there is an exception of precisely the case he states. The act of 1851 is not repealed. It is only sought by this section, as I understand, to extend it to our western and southern rivers. Now, the sixth section of the act of 1851 is to this effect:

That nothing in the preceding sections shall be construed to take away or affect the remedy to which any party may be entitled against the master, officers, or mariners, for, or on account of, any embezzlement, injury, loss, or destruction of goods, wares, merchandise, or other property put on board any ship or vessel, or on account of any negligence, fraud, or other malversation of such master, officers, or mariners, respectively, nor shall anything herein contained lessen or take away any responsibility to which any master or mariner of any ship or vessel may now by law be liable, notwithstanding such master or mariner may be an owner or part owner of the ship or vessel.

Mr. GOOCH. Now let me ask the gentleman a question right here. Is there anything applying to the owner in the section which he has just read?

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. Certainly not; but, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GOOCH. No; it is a careful exclusion of the liability of the owner. Now, sir, what I desire to secure is the liability of the owner and the charterer of the steamship. We all know when an accident happens on board a steamboat that it is very often the case that there is an entire destruction of the property, as well as of life and injury to the person of the passengers, and then, no matter how many passengers may lose their lives or escape in a maimed condition, there is in the section which the gentleman has read no provision which gives any redress. I desire that the law which we enact shall hold steamboat-owners and steamboat charterers liable to the fullest extent for injuries sustained on their boats in consequence of their carelessness, negligence, or non-compliance with law.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. It seems to me that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GOOCH] is disposed to legislate backward, and to reinstate the liability of the common law. Now, the express purpose of the act of 1851 was to render the owner of a ship liable simply to the extent of his interest in the ship; or, in other words, it was the assertion of a principle that has obtained in the maritime law of every nation of Europe, and that has obtained in the legislation of England for the last sixty years, to this effect: that in all matters ex delicto the owners of vessels shall have a liability only co-extensive with their interest in the vessel. Now, sir, the purpose of that was to induce men to become owners of ships, and it was not until 1851 that the Congress of the United States ever took any action upon the subject. The Lexington case, decided in 6 Howard, led to the legislation of 1851. It became an absolute necessity that the Government of the United States should adopt the same liberal policy toward the owners of ships that the governments of all the maritime powers of Europe and Great Britain had extended toward the owners of their ships. And accordingly, in 1851, Congress enacted this law, which rendered an innocent owner responsible only to the extent of his interest in the ship, but which held the master of the ship responsible to any extent for all injuries that may be caused through his carelessness.

The provision I have mentioned was extended then to ocean steamers. It was subsequently decided by the United States Supreme Court that the law extended to vessels on the northern lakes, but the responsibility under the common law has from that day to this been suffered to rest on the owners of the steamers navigating our western and southern waters, and they have been so burdened with these common-law obligations that they have been almost driven from the commerce of the country.

Now, what we are here to-day asking is simply that the vessels on our western and southern waters may be placed on an equality with vessels on the ocean and on the lakes, and it was for the express purpose of limiting the liability of innocent owners that the act of 1851 was passed. England has had similar legislation. In an act passed in 7 George, in the preamble they say that it is of the greatest consequence and importance to the kingdom to promote an increase in the number of ships and vessels and to prevent any discouragement to merchants and others from being interested therein; and so liberal were they in England that in 25 Victoria, which I have before me, they extended the same provision to all cases of loss of life. There is no good reason why we should not adopt the same liberal policy toward the owners of our vessels, that they may compete with the commerce of Great Britain and other maritime nations of Europe; and there is especially no good reason why we should distinguish against the commerce of our western and southern rivers. I hope the House will stand by the provisions of the bill.

Mr. GOOCH. I withdraw the motion to strike out the last word, and move now to strike out the last three words. It is said that we are legislating backward. I think gentlemen are mistaken. All I ask is that the legislation now on the statute-book shall not be repealed.

Now, sir, what is the provision which we wish particularly to retain? It is as follows:

That whenever damage is sustained by any passenger or his baggage from explosion, fire, collision, or other cause, the master and the owner of such vessel, or either of them, and the vessel, shall be liable to each and every person so injured to the full amount of damage, if it happen either by neglect or failure to comply with the provisions of law herein prescribed, or through known defect or imperfection of the steaming apparatus or of the hull; and any person sustaining loss or injury through the carelessness, negligence, or willful misconduct of any captain, mate, engineer, or pilot, or his neglect or refusal to obey the provisions of law herein prescribed, &c.

Mr. CONGER. I would ask the gentleman if that is not the law of the land everywhere?

Mr. GOOCH. I am not willing, having inserted that provision in the law and it having stood as a statute for three years, that we shall now strike it out. If it be the law, as the gentleman says, it will do no harm to retain it. If it is not the law it should be the law, and I desire to put it so that no man can raise the question whether it is or is not the law. We should certainly provide in terms that the man who is guilty of failure or neglect to comply with the essential provisions of the law for the protection of life shall be liable to the party injured. That is all I ask, and that is what some members of the Committee on Commerce seem unwilling that we should have in a form so that no question can be raised in relation to it. I do not ask to go back. I only ask to retain the law as it is. We had before that the law of 1851; but when the law of 1871 was enacted it was deemed necessary that this provision should be inserted in it; and gentlemen cannot show that any injustice or any wrong has ever been done to anybody in consequence of this liability of the owners under the forty-third section of the act of 1871.

The gentleman says that the law is evaded. I say, sir, when you undertake to deal with this matter frame your law so as to prevent evasion. If this class of property is put into the hands of a third party, or fixed in such a way as to escape liability where liability should attach, then it is very proper that the committee framing a bill of this character make some stringent provision to cure that defect in the law.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. STANARD. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and I will state the reasons. If the stock in a steamboat or in a line of steamers was concentrated in the hands of one or two individuals, then I do not think that this amendment would be a bad one; but the fact is that many of the steamboats are owned jointly by numerous individuals.

A steamboat line of a dozen or more steamers is owned perhaps by one hundred individuals; many persons subscribe to the stock of a steamboat company not for the purpose of making money out of the stock, but for the purpose of offering facilities for commerce upon our western rivers, and sometimes where a steamer will cost $40,000 there are forty or fifty owners. Of these forty or fifty owners there may not be more than three or four steamboat-men. There may be many merchants who own $500 or $1,000 of stock. Those who own the smallest amount of stock may be very wealthy men. Those who are managing the line and own the most of the stock may be poor men. Now, in case of a disaster, in case of an explosion where there is an enormous loss of life, the company itself might not be responsible. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GOOCH] may own $500 or $1,000 of stock, and be worth millions besides. He may have subscribed his $1,000 of stock for the purpose not particularly to make money out of the enterprise, but to facilitate commerce. Yet under his amendment he would be liable, as I understand, for the entire amount of his private property.

Mr. GOOCH. No, sir.

Mr. STANARD. That is the way this matter is understood.

Mr. GOOCH. The owner is not liable, unless the injury or loss happens through his negligence or failure to comply with the provisions of law.

Mr. STANARD. That might be all true. But should the innocent stockholder be held entirely responsible if he embarks in this enterprise for the purpose of facilitating commerce, and knows nothing of steamboating? He might be a thousand miles away; there might be somebody in the employ of the company somewhere guilty of negligence. From what I have heard recently I suppose that in the western country there would be great objections to carrying out the provisions of this amendment. I understand further that we are desirous of being put upon an equal footing with commerce upon the high seas and commerce upon the lakes. And, as I understand, the forty-third section as it now stands will do nothing more than that.

Mr. NEGLEY. On an equal footing with the commerce of the world?

Mr. STANARD. On an equal footing with the commerce of the world. I hope this amendment will be voted down.

Mr. GOOCH. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I renew it.

Mr. NEGLEY. I object to the withdrawal of the amendment to the amendment; I do not want to discuss this question all day.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I do not see anything to be gained by that objection. The amendment will be renewed after the vote is taken, and it will only take time.

Mr. NEGLEY. Very well; I withdraw the objection to oblige you.

Mr. ELDREDGE. If it were not too solemn a question I should be greatly amused at the argument of my friend from Missouri, [Mr. STANARD.] He has certainly stated here a proposition the most remarkable that I have heard in a long time, showing that steamboatmen are the most philanthropic men there are in the world. They enter into the business of managing steamboats from purely public motives—to advance public interests!

Mr. STANARD. We are moved by such motives out West.

Mr. ELDREDGE. They desire alone to facilitate commerce, not to make money. Although the gentleman states that proposition as broadly as that, I have never yet been able to find any such disinterested persons. There may be such in the steamboat business for aught I know, but if there are such benevolent characters engaged in that business, they should not be unwilling to stand responsible for the human life destroyed in their business. In my judgment that is the very reason why this amendment should be adopted. Those who own the property, those who own the stock, should see to it that proper employés are engaged in the business; that every man connected with the navigation of a steamboat should be not only a competent man, but he should be a diligent, careful, faithful man in the position in which he is placed. The men who take stock for the purpose of facilitating commerce, who are the real responsible parties, should be held to the strictest accountability, so that, in their disinterestedness, they shall employ honest, capable, faithful men, who will commit no wrong, who will make no mistake, who will feel the responsibility of human life in their hands in the management of their business.

There is no way to make steamboat-men, or railroad-men, or any other common carriers of property and persons careful, except to hold them responsible in property for the faithful performance of their duty. In my judgment there can be no proposition too stringent in that regard. I might say to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SAYLER,] who says the object of doing away with the strict liability of the common law is to increase American shipping interests and to enable us to compete with foreign ship-owners, that that cannot apply to our internal commerce at all. There is no reason for making such a provision in this bill, for we certainly can compete with all foreigners in the navigation of our inland waters. There is no necessity for doing away with the ordinary liabilities imposed by the common law in the interests of our shipping, it seems to me. As suggested by a friend on my left, we have an entire monopoly of the internal commerce of the country.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. Why should any further liability be imposed upon the navigation interests of our western waters than on our northern lakes?

Mr. ELDREDGE. I am satisfied with the liability imposed by the law of 1851.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. That is all we ask.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I mean 1871; not 1851.

Mr. NEGLEY. Mr. Chairman, the whole object of the committee has been to make the law uniform; to extend the provisions of the act of 1851 over the western rivers and also to lay no greater burdens upon our commerce than is laid by other governments upon theirs. That is the whole question. I hope the committee will be sustained.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. GOOCH as modified by the acceptance of the amendment of Mr. HOLMAN, there were—ayes 24, noes 69; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. NEGLEY and Mr. HOLMAN were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 39, noes 112.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. GOOCH. I withdraw my motion to strike out the section, and move to amend by inserting the following:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall impair any remedy which any person sustaining damage in person and property may have at common law.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. Certainly the Committee of the Whole, in view of the action which it has already taken, will not adopt an amendment of this kind, which simply remits us to the common law of England as it existed a century ago. We enact that there shall be a limitation of liability in these cases which can only be done by statute law; and now it is proposed to provide that this limitation shall not interfere with any remedies which the parties might have at common law! Why, sir, the common law of England on this subject never prevailed among the maritime nations of Europe; it has not prevailed in England for nearly a century. It did prevail in this country till 1851; but it was found to be so great a hardship that it was almost impossible to induce men to become owners of vessels. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GOOCH] now proposes to sweep away the entire policy of our law on this subject by an amendment which is entirely inconsistent with the previous section; and which proposes to remit us to the common law of England, which has not been in force in this country for a quarter of a century nor in any other country for nearly an entire century.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I would like to ask the gentleman wherein the common law is too strict or holds these parties to too great an accountability? I understand that the growing feeling of the country has been in favor of making our statutes more and more stringent in the interest and for the safety of human life in the navigation of our waters.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. I will answer the gentleman's question very cheerfully. The common law held every owner of a vessel responsible to the whole extent of his fortune for any matter ex delicto, whatever it was. Now, sir, the law, not the original civil law, but the law that prevailed in the southern countries of Europe and has prevailed almost since the beginning of commerce, was that in all matters ex delicto the liability of ship-owners should be coextensive with their interest in the vessel. This was the law of all the nations that traded around the Mediterranean; it was the law of all Southern Europe. The first statutes on this subject in England were enacted I think in the earlier part of the eighteenth century, and by them the common-law liability of ship-owners was modified. It was some time in the earlier part of this century—I do not remember the precise date—when the limitation that had obtained in Southern Europe prior to that time was adopted by Great Britain. Great Britain herself adopted a limitation of the principle of the common law on this subject, and since the beginning of this century her ship-owners have been held responsible only according to this rule. In 1851 the Congress of the United States did precisely the same thing, and limited the common-law liability; and I venture to say that if you reestablish the common-law liability with respect to the maritime interest of this country you will drive every ship-owner from the ocean, from the lakes, and from the rivers.

Mr. NEGLEY. And offer a premium upon frauds, with an inducement to evade the law.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Let us suppose a case based upon the statement of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SAYLER.] Suppose that a company owning a vessel navigating the lakes is composed, if you please, of one hundred men, and that the captain himself is a stockholder in that company to the amount of $100, being made a stockholder perhaps by reason of some requirement of the act of incorporation under which the company is formed; suppose this captain is to be held liable only to the extent of his interest in the company; by reason of some fault on his part the vessel may go down with its precious cargo of hundreds of human lives, as was the case in one instance not very long ago near the city of Milwaukee; now, is the whole responsibility of that corporation to be the amount of $100 which the captain himself owns in the capital stock of the company? Would gentlemen put the limitation there?

Mr. NEGLEY. It is there under the act of 1851.

Mr. ELDREDGE. But I do not want it there; it ought not to be there.

Mr. NEGLEY. Then repeal the law of 1851.

Mr. ELDREDGE. It is an entire delusion to think that there can be any protection for human life under such circumstances, when the captain, who may commit the only overt act of wrong, who may have the only guilty knowledge that will create liability, is held responsible only to the amount of $100, or the amount of the capital stock which he owns in the company.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. That is not a correct statement of the fact.

Mr. ELDREDGE. If the common law prevails and the man would be liable who owned the ship, why should he not when he is responsible for the lives of four hundred or a thousand people?

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. The common-law liability of the master is not removed by this.

Mr. GOOCH. I ask members to see exactly where the committee place this matter. In the first place the chairman of the committee moves to strike out the last clause of the forty-third section, because he desires to have the common law in force. He says the common law gives all the remedy needed in this case, and that it is better and more effective than is the forty-third section of the act of 1871. For that reason the forty-third section of act of 1871 is voted down. I then propose that the common law shall be operative, anything in this act to the contrary notwithstanding. We now find, then, the members of the committee springing to their feet and opposing any proposition which will make it certain that the common law shall be operative. Therefore we come to this. As against steamboat-owners we have no remedy by statute in case of injury to persons, because we have repealed the statute of 1871. And the gentlemen in charge of the bill are not willing that there shall be a remedy at common law, or they would not object to a simple provision in the bill that the common-law remedy shall obtain.

Mr. CONGER. I rise to oppose the amendment. Either the gentleman from Massachusetts is very much mistaken in his object or I am mistaken in his object. What does he propose? We have adopted in this law a provision extending the provisions of the act of 1851 over the western waters as they are over the ocean and lakes. That is all; that is the limitation of liability under the common law. He proposes to add to that proviso there shall be a limitation as to the common law. That is, he proposes to pass this in the bill and then to repeal it in the same paragraph, which is, I submit, absurd.

Mr. GOOCH. I say to the gentleman just this——

Mr. CONGER. Not for a moment; wait until I finish. I say the proposition of the gentleman is absurd to make limitation of the common law in the first part of the section and repeal it in the last. Let him look at it and he will see that is what is done.

Now in regard to my argument for striking out the last clause of the present section. The words stricken out are as follows:

And such provisions and limitations are also extended and applied to all claims for loss of life, or personal injury, both as against the owner or owners, charterer or charterers, of the vessel, and the captain, mate, engineer, and pilot thereof.

Now, in the law of 1851 they are not extended to the loss of life or personal injury, but only to the loss of cargo.

Mr. GOOCH. I will say here, and that will save the gentleman making his argument, that I believe in the haste with which I drew up the amendment I inserted the word "property," but I propose to strike out the provision as to property and retain only the provision as to injury to person.

Mr. CONGER. That makes an entirely different proposition. Then the gentleman comes to my proposition. I wish to say what I said before so there will be no misunderstanding of my proposition. I asked to strike out and the committee have already struck out the limitation in the present section, (43,) which would extend the limitation or liability to loss of life or personal injury. That is what I desire to do. The common law of the land—and I differ from the gentleman who has preceded me—the common law of this land extends the liability for the loss of life or personal injury to whoever causes that loss of life.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Is not the gentleman mistaken? At common law no recovery could be had where death ensued. The common law does not extend to death. That has been brought about by our statute, and in all cases where recovery is had for actual loss of life by the widow or heirs or administrators, it has been by force of statute The common law made no such provision.

Mr. CONGER. The common law made no such provision. And the gentleman knows, as I know, that every action for personal injury, unless under some State statute, is brought under common law. Every action by representatives of the person whose life is lost is brought at common law.

Mr. ELDREDGE. No; it is brought under the statute.

Mr. CONGER. Wait a moment. The statute in some States does not provide for other persons, the representatives of the person whose life is lost bringing suit.

Mr. ELDREDGE. He could not bring it himself if he was dead.

Mr. CONGER. I am glad the gentleman mentioned that. The gentleman is always enlightening the House with some information which we might not otherwise find out.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I ask nothing for this. It is free.

Mr. CONGER. Now, I ask that there may be a limitation of liability for loss of property merely for the benefit of commerce; that ship-owners may not be men of straw, but that responsible men may assume the ownership of vessels and run them. But when you come to the question of limiting the liability of any man, ship-owner or master, or whoever he may be, for the loss of life or personal injury by any law, here or elsewhere, I should oppose it.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then the gentleman does not object to the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GOOCH] as it now stands?

Mr. CONGER. I do, unless he puts it in the words of the clause which has been stricken out. If he will say, "Provided that such provisions and limitations shall not apply to claims for loss of life or personal injury," I will not object to it; but I object to his amendment as it stands.

Mr. NEGLEY. Does the section as now amended not accomplish that object?

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the pending amendment as modified may be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall impair any remedy at common law for loss of life or injury to person.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 27, noes 53; no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN. Is further count insisted on?

Mr. HOLMAN. I insist on a count by tellers. I am in favor of protecting human life as against capital.

Mr. NEGLEY. The gentleman is seemingly always speaking in favor of some proposition that partakes of anything but statesmanship.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum not having voted, the Chair will order tellers, and appoints the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. HOLMAN, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. NEGLEY.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported ayes 54, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I offer the following amendment:

Insert the following after "applies" in line 12, section 43:

Provided, That whenever damage is sustained by any passenger or his baggage from explosion, fire, collision, or other cause, the master, and the owner of such vessel, or either of them, and the vessel, shall be liable to each and every person so injured to the full amount of damage, if it happen either by neglect or failure to comply with the provisions of law herein prescribed, or through known defect or imperfection of the steaming apparatus, or of the hull; and any person sustaining loss or injury through the carelessness, negligence, or willful misconduct of any captain, mate, engineer, or pilot, or his neglect, or refusal to obey the provisions of law herein prescribed as to navigating such steamers, may sue such captain, mate, engineer, or pilot, and recover damages for any such injury caused as aforesaid by any such captain, mate, engineer, or pilot: Provided, however, That when such owner or a part-owner of any such vessel shall have no direct connection with the navigation of such vessel, he shall only be liable under this provision for such damages to the amount of the value of his interest in such vessel.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would hope that a subject of this magnitude would receive from the Committee of the Whole the attention which it deserves. The last amendment which was voted down and which proposed to secure liability for loss of life and personal injury against these common carriers was not objected to by the Committee on Commerce except as a mere matter of form, and yet, strangely enough, in the interest of the companies and against the rights of human life, the House refuses to retain the common-law principles which have been in force in this country from the foundation of our Government and which even Great Britain, in spite of all that has been said to the contrary, has never dreamed of repealing so far as human life is concerned.

I am aware that the House of Representatives is largely composed of gentleman representing commercial centers, commercial cities, where vast amounts of stock in vessels propelled by steam are held; and I am aware, sir, that for three years past the pressure on the Committee on Commerce has been in one direction. The masters of our steamships are not here, but capitalists owning this kind of stock have been here and they are here still. And while I am not surprised that gentlemen representing commercial centers should be found in the interests of capital and against human life, I am surprised at the profound indifference to the important question here presented, when it becomes a mere question of greed and gain upon the one hand and the value of human life upon the other.

Now, sir, the argument has been that if you adopt any provision on behalf of human life and do not adopt the whole provisions of the act of 1851, you prevent small investments in steamship capital. I have guarded against that in my amendment. I provide by my amendment that if the owner or the half-owner of the vessel is not actually engaged in navigating it, then he shall only be liable in the event of damage through negligence to the extent of the value of his interest in the vessel. I would like to see the gentleman who would deny the soundness of that proposition. Admitting all that the gentleman from Missouri representing the Saint Louis district [Mr. STANARD] has so well and ably said, can he object to this proposition even on his own argument? I propose to say by this amendment that the capitalist who invests his money in a steamboat, if he does not directly control it, shall only be liable to the extent of his interest in the vessel. Is not that right? If the master, the pilot, or the engineer by their negligence contribute to the loss and sacrifice of human life, are they to be held innocent? Everybody knows that the act of 1851 is not applicable to our rivers; no member representing a commercial community would agree that it should be; but it is very proper on the high seas, and by the decision of the Supreme Court it was extended to the northern lakes. It is proposed now, because we have a navigation interest that comes in conflict with British interests, that we shall adopt the same rule of liability that is adopted in Great Britain.

Sir, everybody knows that the legislation of Great Britain is always in the interest of capital, and that her legislators are profoundly indifferent to the interests of human life when the two come in conflict one with the other. Great Britain is a purely commercial power, and her wealth, her glory, and her greatness depend on commerce. I am not surprised at the domination exercised over her legislation by the commercial interests; but here the interest of human life appeals to Congress for reasonable safeguards.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. Does not the gentleman know that Great Britain was the last nation in Europe to adopt this principle?

Mr. HOLMAN. I know that capital controls the British Parliament, and I hope that flesh and blood and brains will control the American House of Representatives.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. STANARD. I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana. It is a strange thing to me that this question should be fought over three times. This amendment was first brought up by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. GOOCH,] and then it was again offered and has twice been voted down, and now it is brought up for the third time by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] in a still more ambiguous and offensive way.

There is, Mr. Chairman, in the commercial world everywhere a repulsion to double liability. Show me a State where the owners of stock are liable for more than the amount that they subscribe, whether it be in banking, manufacturing, or any other joint-stock company, and I will show you a State where capital will never go. Why should a man who subscribes his $1,000 to the capital stock of a steamboat be any more liable for double the amount than a man is who subscribes to the capital stock of a manufacturing company? The operatives of a manufacturing company are as liable to be killed by an explosion and property may be destroyed there just as much as on board a steamboat.

Mr. HOLMAN. My amendment simply provides that the owner of stock shall be liable to the amount of his subscription to that stock.

Mr. STANARD. The objection I have to the amendment is that it would be hard to determine where individual management begins under the gentleman's amendment. I may be a stockholder in a steamboat; I may have nothing especially to do with the hiring of men or the payment of their wages; but I may be on board of that boat when she comes into port after an accident, and I say it would be exceedingly difficult to tell where the innocent capitalist, whom the gentleman seems desirous to protect, should become liable. Hence I am opposed to the amendment. I am opposed here and at all times to double liability. While I am as much in favor as the gentleman from Indiana can be of protecting the interests of the masses, I say that the interests of the masses and of the capitalists go hand in hand in this country, and you cannot legislate against capital and proscribe it in this manner without damaging the very men that the gentleman claims to be the advocate of on this floor.

I hope, Mr. Chairman, that this amendment will be voted down. We have had the judgment of the House upon it twice already that it is wrong, and now we are called upon to vote upon it again. I want the men who put their steamers upon the Ohio, and the Mississippi, and the Missouri, or upon any of the tributaries of those streams, to stand in the same relation to those who ship with them and do business with them as the men who do business upon the high seas or upon the northern lakes; and I thank the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] who is so largely interested and whose constituents are so largely interested in lake navigation, for the very generous part he is taking here in this discussion to allow us on the western waters a fair show and to place our commerce on the same footing as the commerce of the lakes.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending amendment is exhausted.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. NEGLEY. I move that the committee now rise in order to obtain from the House an order to close debate.

Mr. HOLMAN. Not yet, while I hold the floor. There are just as important interests represented here as your Pittsburgh interests.

Mr. NEGLEY. I am not representing Pittsburgh interests in this matter any more than the interests of the gentleman's own constituents, whom he seems to neglect in this important question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I want the Committee of the Whole to understand distinctly the nature of this proposition. You have incorporated into this bill for the first time the whole of the act of 1851, which we did not do in the last Congress. I now propose that we shall re-enact the present law just as it stands upon your statute-book, just as it was adopted only three years ago, as to personal liability, but going one step further, for the purpose of meeting the objection of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. STANARD,] and exempting investors in steamboat property from liability except to the extent of their interest in the vessel where they are not responsible for the management of the vessel. I am only asking the re-enactment of a law which has been upon your statute-book for years, and which the pending bill proposes to repeal. I propose to re-enact that in the interest of human life, except that investors in steamboat property shall be liable only to the extent of their interest when they are not directly concerned in the navigation and management of the vessel.

Now, would my friend say that the pilot, or captain, or engineer, being an owner, shall not be liable when human life is sacrificed? I hope that those who vote against this guarantee of human life, when they read of some awful disaster by which homes are made desolate in consequence of the carelessness or negligence of the managers of this species of property—I hope they will then bear in mind that they have contributed to produce that result by relieving owners from all responsibility whatever.

Mr. NEGLEY. The only time we hear the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] speak in behalf of human life and of economy is when he is within hearing of the reporters of the RECORD. In no other instance in his life does he show such benevolence before the country, or raise his voice with such energy.

Now, what is this proposition? It is to re-enact the law of 1851, and extend it uniformly over the whole country and give to the commerce of the West the same privileges that are enjoyed by the commerce of the sea-board. And the gentleman from Indiana stands up here and says that this is in behalf of my constituents. Sir, it is no more in the interest of my constituents than of his, or every member on this floor.

The gentleman backs and fills on every question when it is proposed to make appropriations for harbors and rivers, and it benefits his constituents and perhaps gives him a little reputation; he is willing to violate every principle of economy when it conveys an advantage to himself. Now when we come to the consideration of a plain proposition, the law now upon the statute-book, in force since 1851, the law of maritime nations of the world, adopted after years of experience for the purpose of promoting the interests and development of commerce, the gentleman seeks to impose the burdens of the existing law upon the commerce of the West and the navigable waters of the interior. Is there any principle of justice in that? If so, will he tell us and the country where it is? Let us have a vote.

Mr. HOLMAN. Nobody has complained of injustice heretofore.

Mr. NEGLEY. I like common sense and consistency on the part of gentlemen. We are weary of this kind of opposition.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. HOLMAN; and upon a division there were—ayes 26, noes 63; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. NEGLEY and Mr. HOLMAN were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 56, noes 99.

So the amendment was not adopted.

Mr. NEGLEY. In regard to section 47, I wish to say that it simply enacts with one or two amendments the rules and regulations now prescribed by the nations of the world in regard to steam and sailing-vessels meeting and passing each other, with those now in force on our western rivers.

Mr. CONGER. I desire, on behalf of the Committee on Commerce, to move an amendment to the second paragraph relating to sailing-vessels.

The paragraph was as follows:

Whenever, as in the case of small vessels during bad weather, the green and red lights cannot be fixed, these lights shall be kept on deck, on their respective sides of the vessel, ready for instant exhibition; and shall, on the approach of or to other vessels, be exhibited on their respective sides in sufficient time to prevent collisions, in such manner as to make them most visible, and so that the green light shall not be seen on the port side nor the red light on the starboard side. To make the use of these portable lights more certain and easy, the lanterns containing them shall each be painted outside with the color of the light they respectively exhibit, and shall be provided with suitable screens.

Mr. CONGER. I move to strike out the words "in sufficient time to prevent collisions," and to insert after the words "most visible" the words "and continued to be so exhibited from the time of sighting such vessel until the two have passed each other;" so that it will read:

Whenever, as in the case of small vessels during bad weather, the green and red lights cannot be fixed, these lights shall be kept on deck, on their respective sides of the vessel, ready for instant exhibition; and shall, on the approach of or to other vessels, be exhibited on their respective sides in such manner as to make them most visible, and continued to be so exhibited from the time of sighting such vessel until the two have passed each other, and so that the green light shall not be seen on the port side nor the red light on the starboard side.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to move an amendment to the clause relating to sailing pilot-vessels.

The clause was as follows:

Sailing pilot-vessels shall not carry the lights required for other sailing-vessels, but shall carry a white light at the mast-head, visible all around the horizon, and shall also exhibit a flare-up light every fifteen minutes.

Mr. CONGER. I move to amend by striking out the words "at the mast-head" and inserting the words "on the shrouds on each side of the mainmast, not less than ten feet above the main-deck."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I desire to move an amendment to the last paragraph under the head of "sailing-vessels."

The paragraph was as follows:

And every such sailing-vessel that shall be navigated without complying with the provisions of this section shall forfeit and pay a sum of not exceeding $500, one-half to go to the informer; and for which sum the vessel so navigated shall be liable, and may be seized and proceeded against, by way of libel, in any district court of the United States having jurisdiction of the offense.

Mr. HALE of Maine. I have received the impression from the gentleman in charge of this bill [Mr. NEGLEY] and from the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] that this large portion of the bill we are now passing is simply a re-enactment of existing law. Does the gentleman mean to say that these provisions in relation to sailing-vessels are simply a re-enactment of the existing law?

Mr. NEGLEY. No, sir; not of the existing law, but of the existing rules and regulations, which have the effect of law by the authority vested in the board of supervising inspectors under the law of 1871.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Excepting that on page 64, the whole thing is brought to a focus by a provision fixing a very heavy penalty, one-half of which is to go to the informer. When a bill similar to this was under discussion in the last Congress that provision was struck out. My objection to it is this: the bill itself is primarily in relation to steam-vessels; it was not intended to apply to all the small craft, sailing-vessels, that ply upon our coast and our rivers. This class of small vessels is very numerous; and when you make a provision as severe as this—that "every such sailing-vessel that shall be navigated without complying with the provisions of this section shall forfeit and pay the sum of $500, one-half to go to the informer, and for which sum the vessel so navigated shall be liable and may be seized and proceeded against by way of libel in any district court of the United States having jurisdiction of the offense"—you adopt with reference to these small sailing-vessels of ten, twenty, and forty tons a cruel enactment. You put upon them a harsh penalty for all sorts of provisions that are crystallized here in the law—a penalty which would amount in some cases to half or more of the entire value of the poor little vessel. Now, I move to strike out this penalty; or if any penalty must be inserted let it be a small one; $100 is enough. And I appeal to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NEGLEY] to strike out that obnoxious part of the provision which offers a bid to any man who shall find out some little schooner that does not carry a specified kind of light, and then make his complaint and get his $250. That is not proper legislation with respect to this hard-working, laborious, and exposed interest.

Mr. NEGLEY. I am delighted to hear the gentleman from Maine speak in behalf of commerce. I wish every gentleman on this floor would manifest the same spirit. But the committee were very desirous to meet the objections of such gentlemen as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GOOCH] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] who have spoken here this morning with so much zeal. If, however, the gentleman from Maine will move to reduce the penalty to $100, I will not object to the amendment.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I move then to strike out the word "five" and insert "one," so as to make the penalty $100. A gentleman suggests to me that fifty dollars would be a proper limit. I think myself it would be better.

Mr. CONGER. One hundred dollars is small enough.

Mr. NEGLEY. I understood the gentleman from Maine to propose $100.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Very well; let it go at that sum.

Mr. NEGLEY and Mr. CONGER. No objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I move also to strike out in line 160 the the words "one-half to go to the informer."

Mr. NEGLEY. I make no objection.

Mr. CONGER. We do not object to that.

Mr. POTTER. I think that the policy by which some penalty is imposed upon a sailing-vessel is a wise one—not so much on account of the sailing-vessel as on account of the steamboat, so that the steamboat may see the sailing-vessel and not run into her. At present whenever a steamboat runs into a sailing-vessel it is always the steamboat that is in fault; so that it has been said to be an economical way of disposing of sailing-vessels is to have them run into.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. If any party is injured in this manner he can prosecute; but I do not want half the fine to go to the informer that men may be induced to watch around in order to catch small vessels in little infractions of the law.

Mr. POTTER. Does the gentleman's amendment apply to all the rest of the section or only the provision giving one-half the penalty to the informer?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Only to the provision that one-half the penalty shall go to the informer.

Mr. POTTER. Then I do not particularly object.

Mr. FRYE. Would it not be better to make the fine fifty dollars, and let one-half go to the informer?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I object to allowing one-half the penalty to go to the informer. Such a provision will only encourage men who really have no interest in the matter to watch for little infractions of the law.

Mr. FRYE. Some of these little vessels need watching.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. If any one is injured he will naturally complain; but I do not think it is in the interest of commerce or good morals that loafers about the wharves and the streams should be induced or invited to watch for these little infractions. If my colleague knew as much about the sea-coast and our commerce thereon as I do, he would know that if anybody is really injured he will apply to the courts, which are always open and in which a prosecution can be at once initiated.

Mr. FRYE. But that would not amount to anything to the man injured; he would not get any part of the penalty; it would simply be a matter of punishment. Would not a provision giving a portion of this penalty to some one have a tendency to compel vessels to keep the proper lights?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I do not think they will need such a provision; and it would only encourage a class whom I know the gentleman does not want to encourage any more than I do.

Mr. FRYE. I do not love them, I admit.

Mr. POTTER. The gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE,] as I understand, has no partiality for informers; but he does want to have the proper lights carried.

Mr. FRYE. Yes, sir.

Mr. POTTER. So do I.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. With the penalty provided in this section, and with the liability to a civil suit for damages, and with the courts open, I have no doubt that the results sought by my colleague [Mr. FRYE] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] will be accomplished, while we shall avoid the encouragement of a class of men whom I think all of us shrink from encouraging. As the Committee on Commerce assents to the proposition, I hope there will be no objection to it.

The amendment was adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next section.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Before we leave this part of the bill I have another amendment to suggest, on page 65. It is there provided that every such vessel, steamer, or other water craft or raft that shall neglect to make fog-signals as herein provided shall forfeit and pay a sum not exceeding $300, one-half to go to the informer. Gentlemen who have examined it say it is the right amount, and I do not propose to interfere with it, although I think it is too large; but I move to strike out "one-half to go to the informer."

Mr. CONGER. The object of this clause is to provide that every vessel, raft, and every craft of any description navigating our waters in a fog shall give some signal of its whereabouts either by steam, by fog-horn, or in some other manner. Now nearly two-thirds of the injuries and loss of life which occur from collision occur in a fog, and occur through neglect of the simple means of giving the signal of alarm by steam or fog-horn.

It was the opinion of the committee this penalty is not too great. It is in the interest of life and property. In that respect, when vessels are concealed by fog and mist, we think if there is a case when the informer should be rewarded for watching closely in order that they may be punished for infraction of the law it should be here. I object to striking out the words indicated by the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have not interfered with the running of this bill and did not propose to, because the committee have given it their faithful attention and I know how much that deserves at our hands. In order that the House may see what a Procrustean bed has been laid for the navigation interest here, I call the attention of gentlemen to this provision. Right above my amendment it is provided as follows:

> Sailing-vessels, or steamers not having steam on, when not under way, and anchored or aground, or moored in the channel or fair-way of commerce, shall sound the general alarm signal by the ship's bell at intervals of not more than one minute, and all steamers navigating in a fog or thick weather shall sound their steam-whistle at intervals of not more than one minute. And upon any other craft navigating the ocean, lakes, bays, or rivers, such as barges, rafts, flat-boats, wood-boats, and other like craft, they shall sound a fog-horn at intervals of not more than two minutes. And every such vessel, steamer, or other water craft or raft that shall neglect to make fog-signals as herein provided, shall forfeit and pay a sum not exceeding $300, one-half to go to the informer.

Only one hundred and twenty seconds of time is allowed as the interval in the sounding of this fog-signal in all these little water boats and small craft, and if five seconds is exceeded in sounding it, there is somebody watching on shore with his watch in hand, and sees one hundred and twenty-five seconds lapse between the signals. Forthwith that little water craft not worth $1,000 is liable to a fine of $300, of which the loafer on shore watching for the lapse of the seconds is entitled to one-half. It is strenuous, rigid, cruel legislation. I do not believe the gentlemen themselves when they see the practical effect of this will desire it. I hope the House will adopt the amendment I have moved.

Mr. CONGER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the pending amendment.

Mr. CONGER. I move to strike out the last word in order that I may reply to the gentleman from Maine.

The proposition of the gentleman from Maine is one which will strike the mind of every man who has ever traveled on our lakes and rivers and upon our sea-coast as inappropriate. No man here probably who has ever traveled upon our rivers and lakes and upon our sea-coast, and who has stood on deck when his own life and the life of his family were at stake, but will remember how anxious and watchful he was, as the vessel went through a fog-bank, lest they should run into another steamer or run against a raft or run against another vessel and be sunk. The law requires the most extreme caution on the part of these steamers, and the law requires the raft or vessel should sound every two minutes a fog-horn. I submit to every man who ever passed through a fog-bank if he did not watch earnestly and anxiously for every sound of alarm as the vessel was going through that invisible passage-way? It is the only place where we can require this to be done by these small craft and great rafts of logs into which steamers may run and be sunk at once. It is right to require it of any vessel which may collide and sink a steamer or vessel at once. Is it any hardship when a vessel is navigating an open road-way, when in the midst of a fog, that it should sound every two minutes an alarm of danger which would save the lives of the passengers and crew? I will not enlarge on it. The language in the bill, it seems to me, should strike every one as a desirable provision of law.

If there be any case in the world, although I do not know that there is, where informers should be encouraged, it is the case of their watching in the interest of the security of life violations of law. This is such a case.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Admitting that, I ask the gentleman if he does not himself believe this to be a harsh measure of punishment for a little violation running over a few seconds, for this is to be done at intervals of two minutes? Is not a fine of $300 a severe penalty?

Mr. CONGER. Does the gentleman not know that these little violations of law have caused more loss of life on the rivers and lakes than all other causes put together, except violent storms?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I do not know that.

Mr. CONGER. I know it; and the reports of insurance companies show that it is so.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. HALE, of Maine, it was agreed to.

The Clerk read section 51, as follows:

SEC. 51. That all vessels of the United States, and all vessels while navigating within the jurisdiction of the United States, shall be subject to the laws of the United States in respect to preventing collisions on the water, and to the rules and regulations made in pursuance thereof for that purpose. And every coastwise sea-going steam-vessel, subject to the navigation laws of the United States and to the rules and regulations aforesaid, shall, when under way, except on the high seas, be under the control and direction of a pilot licensed by the inspectors of steamboats. And no State or municipal government shall impose upon pilots of steam-vessels herein provided for any obligation to procure a State or other license in addition to that issued by the United States, nor any other regulation or regulations which will impede such pilots in the performance of their duties, as required by this act; nor shall any pilot charges be levied by any such authority upon any steamer piloted as herein provided; and in no case shall the fees charged for the pilotage of any steam-vessel exceed the customary or legally established rates in the State where the same is performed.

Mr. COX. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

Mr. CONGER. I insist that the committee shall have the right to offer their amendments first.

Mr. COX. I do not know that there is any special reason for that.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NEGLEY] is on the floor to offer an amendment on behalf of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] after the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. NEGLEY.]

Mr. NEGLEY. I am authorized by the committee to offer an amendment which restores the provision existing in the act of 1871.

Mr. MERRIAM. I desire to offer a substitute for that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the section the following:

Provided, however, That nothing in this act shall be construed to annul or affect any regulation established by the laws of any State requiring vessels entering or leaving a port in any such State, other than coastwise steam-vessels, to take a pilot duly licensed or authorized by the laws of such State, or of a State situate upon the waters of such State.

Mr. MERRIAM. I offer as a substitute what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, however, That nothing in this act shall be construed to annul or affect any regulation established by the law of any State requiring vessels entering or leaving a port in any such State, other than coastwise steam-vessels, not sailing under register, to take a pilot duly licensed or authorized by the law of such State, or of a State situate upon the waters of such State.

Mr. MERRIAM. The only difference between my present amendment and the amendment which the committee has consented to accept now, and which they originally omitted from the bill, is, that it requires all registered steam-vessels to take the regular New York pilots. Coastwise or sailing vessels sailing under a license are not obliged to take a New York pilot, but when they receive a register, and receive that register for the purpose of going to foreign countries and bring back passengers, they should be obliged to take a pilot; for we conceive human lives to be as precious and liable to be as much in jeopardy, when they come in a registered vessel as if they come in a regular line of steamers plying between this country and Europe. There is a safety to life and property in these pilots boarding every registered vessel the same as they do others. The pilot system of New York is one of the best pilot systems in the world. I presume the committee will acknowledge that it has stood the test of trial for years and years. The New York pilots are among the hardiest and most noble men to be found in any profession. They are devoted to duty, and fearless in its performance; men who peril their lives in every storm, and who are thus obliged to peril their lives in observance of law when responding to every signal in every storm and board the first vessel which makes the signal, even if pestilence is aboard. They own property in boats and outfit amounting to the sum of $400,000, and when we do what will take away their rights under State laws we destroy their property by rendering it unprofitable to pursue the business, and we thus destroy protection to life and property which is always enough imperiled on the sea. Every man who goes abroad and every man who has any of his family going abroad is interested in maintaining the rights and interests of pilots. This interference seems to be one of those steps toward centralizing power in the Government which should be guarded against, and for which there is no apology.

A word as to how these pilots are selected. They are examined every year by the pilot commissioners, men who are not paid a salary. It is only necessary to mention the names of Robert Taylor, Blunt, and others, to show what is their character. Each of these pilots receives less than $2,000 a year as compensation for their perilous toil. The committee proposes to cut off a portion of what they now receive by allowing registered vessels to enter port unpiloted. It would only have the effect of demoralizing the whole profession, and I appeal to the House to stand by us when we are engaged in maintaining the interests of one of the most worthy classes of people in the world.

Mr. NEGLEY. The gentleman has had an opportunity, in connection with this subject, to speak a good word for the men in his district, and two for himself.

Mr. MERRIAM. This has nothing to do with my district. I live three hundred miles away from the ocean.

Mr. COX. It is my district, and what I was endeavoring to do my colleague has done.

Mr. NEGLEY. But to come seriously to the consideration of the amendment just offered. Two years ago, when the House considered a bill reported by the Committee on Commerce, substantially the same with this bill, a delegation representing the pilots of New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Massachusetts requested the committee to re-enact the provisions of existing law, of the law of 1871, so far as it relates to pilotage. The committee agreed to that, and the gentleman from New York himself offered an amendment similar to the one I have offered. The same delegation of pilots have called upon the Committee on Commerce during this session and have all of them assented to the continuance of the present law.

Mr. MERRIAM. Allow me to say that I have seen to-day the representative of the pilots of the city of New York, representing all the pilots there, and he is now within the Hall of the House, and he says that he insists on this provision being put in as I have offered it.

Mr. CONGER. Then I propose that we do not put it in.

Mr. NEGLEY. I am not responsible for what that gentleman may have stated to the gentleman from New York; but I make this declaration to the House, that the representative of the association of pilots who have visited this city in behalf of the association of New York has agreed that if we restored this provision they would be perfectly satisfied, as it will leave them all the rights and privileges they now enjoy under the law. I hope the House will sustain the committee.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, so far as I understand the amendment of my colleague, [Mr. MERRIAM,] it rather restricts the pilots; it restricts the operation of the present law to registered vessels. Am I right? If that is the case it is not what is asked by the pilots of New York City. I happen to have had sent to me a proviso prepared by pilots and which is emphatically embodied in the amendment which the gentleman from Pennsylvania has offered.

Mr. MERRIAM. My colleague will remember that I offered the amendment last year which was embodied in this bill.

Mr. COX. I offered the same amendment two or three years ago.

Mr. MERRIAM. But it does not conform to the law of New York.

Mr. COX. I offered it and it was adopted, and I hope the law will stand as the gentleman from Pennsylvania proposes by his amendment. I wish to be instructed hereafter by these pilots if I am wrong in this position. Does my colleague's amendment in any way restrict the operation of the present law to a less number of vessels than is now provided for?

Mr. MERRIAM. My amendment puts back the law as it stands in New York, which I will read:

All masters of foreign vessels and vessels from a foreign port, and all vessels sailing under register, bound to or from the port of New York, by the way of Sandy Hook, shall take a licensed pilot; or, in case of refusal to take such pilot, shall himself, owners, or consignees, pay the said pilotage as if one had been employed; and such pilotage shall be paid to the pilot first speaking or offering his services as pilot to such vessel.

The amendment of the committee does away with that, and does not permit a pilot to board a registered vessel. The point is simply this; that when a vessel has been coasting up and down under a license our pilots would not board her. They are not obliged by law to board such vessels. But when a vessel with a United States register goes to a foreign port and brings back passengers, the law of New York compels such vessel to take our pilots, and we insist upon it that human life is protected by that provision.

Mr. NEGLEY. Will the gentleman state in his intelligent and fluent manner in what way that protects human life?

Mr. MERRIAM. It protects it in the same way that the taking of a pilot by any vessel does. The pilot is better acquainted with the port than the master of the vessel is, and when he brings a vessel in he brings it in in safety.

Mr. NEGLEY. So he does under the existing law. I ask that my amendment be again read.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I have an amendment which I desire to offer to whatever shall be adopted by the committee as the body of the law, affecting an interest that does know what it wants. I send it to the Clerk's desk to be read, and then I will say a few words in regard to it.

The Clerk read the proposed amendment, as follows:

Provided further, That no owner, agent, master, or consignee of any ship or vessel duly registered or enrolled and engaged in the coastwise trade shall by virtue of the laws of any State be compelled to take, employ, or pay a pilot not voluntarily employed on entering or departing from any port or harbor, entering, passing through, or leaving any channel, passage, or shoal within the waters of the United States, nor shall any such agent, consignee, or master of any ship or vessel so engaged, who shall employ a tug or tug-boat on any such waters of the United States, be compelled to pay pilotage or pilot's fees by virtue of the laws of any State.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman propose that as an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MERRIAM?]

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Whenever the House shall have voted and decided which of the two pending propositions it will adopt, I shall offer this as an amendment. I will withhold it until that time.

Now let me say that this amendment is for the purpose of exempting from the feature of compulsory pilotage all of the coasting trade of the United States. At present a portion of it is exempted; coastwise steamers are exempted under certain State regulations. Now, there is no fitness or fairness in a State exempting a portion of this coasting trade and laying its exactions upon the balance.

I have nothing to say against the pilots of New York, Boston, and elsewhere. I have had occasion heretofore to speak of them, and of their great services. But gentlemen cannot fail to see that while there is some force, perhaps great force, in this provision applying to the foreign trade, the coasting trade does not need it. The vessels that ply between one port and another, that enter New York harbor ten or twelve or more times a year, do not need these pilots. They know all the ins and outs of the harbors of New York and Boston and elsewhere as well as do the pilots. The State of New York has recognized that fact by exempting from its operations steam-going vessels, which are not obliged to take the pilots or pay for them. Why should a schooner or a brig from my district, with a load of lumber that is going into New York harbor, and which knows the way as well as I know my seat at the table—why should this schooner be obliged to take a pilot? Why should any of them in any case be required to do it? I do not know the exact terms of the law of New York. I do not know that it covers all of these cases. At any rate the provision I have indicated will forever settle the question and make it sure. If there is any disposition at any time on the part of the New York Legislature to extend its present regulations, this provision will forbid it. I do not know that in some of these cases it is included at all; the object of my amendment, however, is that the entire coasting trade shall be exempt.

Mr. MERRIAM. It is never exacted in the State of New York.

Mr. NEGLEY. The amendment of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] is not before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not. Debate upon the pending amendment and substitute is exhausted.

Mr. POTTER. I move to strike out the last word, in order to say to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] that I do not understand the law of the State of New York as he has indicated. All that he desires to accomplish can be accomplished by moving to strike out of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NEGLEY] the word "steam" before the word "vessels;" so as to make it "coastwise vessels." According to my recollection that would be the effect of the law at any rate.

In regard to the other branch of the question, the difference between the gentleman from New York [Mr. MERRIAM] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. NEGLEY,] the proposition of the one is in totidem verbis that of the other, except that the amendment of the gentleman from New York contains the words "not sailing under register." If he had moved to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania by inserting after the words "coastwise steam-vessels" the words "not sailing under register," that would have accomplished all which he seeks to accomplish by his amendment. What the gentleman from Pennsylvania seeks to accomplish is to exempt from the compulsory pilotage of New York coastwise steam-vessels. What my colleague [Mr. MERRIAM] seeks is to exempt only these coastwise steam-vessels that do not sail under register.

Mr. MERRIAM. Foreign vessels.

Mr. POTTER. Any vessels not sailing under register. The one seeks to make the coastwise steam-vessels free from this pilotage, the other only so far as the coastwise steam-vessels are not under register. Now, if I own a registered vessel, which is a vessel authorized to trade with a foreign port, and I choose to put her in the coastwise trade, why should I thereby be subjected to a charge for compulsory pilotage, which nobody else engaged in that service is subjected to? My colleague seeks to charge a vessel because of the character of the trade she is authorized to carry on, and not because of the character of the trade she does carry on. The amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania seeks to limit the charge to the trade which the vessel does carry on.

Mr. MERRIAM. Licensed vessels go along the coast, and registered vessels go abroad.

Mr. POTTER. My colleague need not seek to tell me about vessels, for I ought to be expected to know something about them. A registered vessel is one authorized to trade at foreign ports; an enrolled vessel is authorized to trade at home ports only. It constantly happens that vessels authorized to trade at foreign ports want at times to trade at home ports also. When so trading they should be upon the same footing as other vessels authorized to trade only at home ports and not be subjected to additional charge simply because a year before they were sent to Liverpool or were authorized to go to Amsterdam.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The amendment of Mr. MERRIAM to the amendment of Mr. NEGLEY was not agreed to.

The question was upon the amendment of Mr. NEGLEY.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I move to add to the amendment the following:

Provided further, That no owner, agent, master, or consignee of any ship or vessel duly registered and enrolled and engaged in the coastwise trade shall by virtue of the laws of any State be compelled to take, employ, or pay a pilot, not voluntarily employed, on entering or departing from any port or harbor, or entering, passing, passing through, or leaving any channel, passage, or shoal within the waters of the United States; nor shall any such agent, consignee, or master of any such ship or vessel so engaged, who shall employ a tug or tow-boat in any such waters of the United States, be compelled to pay pilotage or pilot fees by virtue of the laws of any State.

Mr. COX. I object to that amendment.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The gentleman in charge of the bill does not object to this amendment; and while it has been suggested by the gentleman from New York that the change of a single word, striking out "steam" in the amendment already offered, would answer the purpose, I do not think it would, because that simply refers to regulations of the State of New York, or of any other State, while my proposition is firmly and squarely declaratory of what shall be the law; so that no State shall seek to enforce compulsory pilotage upon the coasting trade by virtue of existing laws, nor shall change its laws so that this shall be done. There is an obvious fairness in extending the provision to all the coasting trade.

Mr. NEGLEY. My reason for not objecting to the amendment is because it embodies the existing law of the States of Massachusetts and New York, as I am informed by gentlemen connected with the pilot service. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] dissents, as I understand, from that statement. I think he is mistaken, however.

Mr. COX. I do not think that this amendment is in hæc verba the law of New York or Massachusetts. I would like to have time to examine that matter before we pass upon the question. It may give rise to litigation or other trouble. I think that the provision offered by the committee, which is agreed to generally by the pilots both of Massachusetts and New York, ought to remain without any condition. Otherwise litigation and difficulty may arise.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Does the gentleman think that this compulsory pilotage ought to apply to the coastwise trade?

Mr. COX. I want these pilots to have the largest liberty to do their work under the State law.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I ask the gentleman that particular question: Does he think that the system by which a pilot going far out can board a vessel and oblige it to take him and pay the bill should be applied to the trade along the coast of our own country?

Mr. COX. I think that the very same reasons which apply to a foreign vessel should apply to any vessel coming into port.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Clearly not.

Mr. COX. The same rules for the safety of property and human life should apply. Why not? These vessels are all liable to the same accidents and subject to the same dangers.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. In the first place, these small vessels cannot afford to pay the pilotage charges. In the next place, those in charge of these vessels do not need a pilot; if they do they can call for one. Such a requirement would be a great burden on our coastwise trade. It appears to me there is really but one side to this question.

Mr. CONGER. I suppose that the object of inserting this provision, which I understand to be the law of the several States that have pilotage laws, is that should any of the States change their law on the subject the provision would remain permanent here. I believe that the amendment embodies the existing law of the States concerned; but they might change their laws, and by inserting the enactment here we shall have one uniform law, which I think desirable.

The question being taken on the amendment to the amendment, it was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. POTTER. I move further to amend the section by adding the following, which I suppose should come in after the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania and before that of the gentleman from Maine:

And provided further, That the master of any inward-bound vessel shall be at liberty to select any duly licensed pilot.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any objection to this amendment?

Mr. CROOKE. I object to it. It strikes at the very root of the whole pilot system. The very object of the pilot system of New York is to have an organized body of men, each and every one of whom shall be competent to bring in any vessel that may enter that port. This amendment would destroy the whole pilot system from beginning to end. It is an imputation upon the whole body of pilots. There is not a man licensed to pilot into the port of New York who is not perfectly fitted to do his duty. If there is any man who is unfitted, it is the business of the board of pilots to turn him out. Standing here as a native New Yorker, I say that when a pilot risks his life to bring a vessel into port, no other pilot ought to be preferred to him. It is but seldom that I rise on this floor in the way of debate; but from my knowledge of the men composing the whole force of New York pilots I say that this amendment is an imputation upon them. I do not mean to say that it is intended as such; but from my knowledge of this class of men it strikes me as an amendment which ought not to receive countenance from this House.

Mr. POTTER obtained the floor.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] will yield a moment, I wish to make a suggestion to the gentleman having charge of this bill. Three hours of to-day's session are now spent; and if the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NEGLEY] will move that the committee rise, and allow us to occupy the rest of the day on the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill, I believe that we can get through with it. But if we run on very much further with this bill, it will be impossible for us to do that to-day.

Mr. NEGLEY. I think that the pending section of this bill is the last that will provoke any debate. I am confident that we can get through the bill in a very short time.

Mr. POTTER. Mr. Chairman, I think that my sympathetic colleague [Mr. CROOKE] had better hear the other side of this question.

He will then see that not only does the amendment imply no imputation upon the body of pilots of New York, or for that matter of any other State, but that it is directly in the interest of the pilots. The laws of New York require the master of a ship to take a pilot licensed either by the laws of New York or New Jersey. Every vessel coming into port is beset by a number of pilots, offering to take it up. The effect of my amendment is to allow the master of an inward-bound vessel to take such one of the offering pilots as he may please. I may as well remark, by the law of New York if the master does not take in a pilot, if he should refuse to take the first with a view to taking a second and no second should offer, the ship would still be liable to pay pilotage.

The reason why the master should be allowed to select is this: Not because they are not all competent as pilots; not because they have not a knowledge of the channel and of the depth of the water; but because it is not every competent pilot who is able to handle every description of ship. The difficulty our ship-owners have, when these great ships of three or four or five thousand tons reach port, is that they may get men to act as pilots who may know the channel and all the soundings, but who may not have the moral (if I may use that term) capacity to measure on the instant distances and determine at a glance what to do to handle the vessel safely. It is an actual subsisting fact within my knowledge that there are certain owners of large vessels who have constantly and persistently within past years paid double pilotage in order to get a particular man to act as pilot, because they say these great ships cannot be handled by every pilot, when they get to the wharf, or when they get into a crowded place. No matter how much the pilot may know about the depth of the water and about the channel, the capacity to manage one of these large vessels in a windy day in a port crowded with shipping cannot be given by education. Therefore the ship-owner says, "I am ready to pay regular pilotage; I am ready to select and pay an inward-bound pilot and also pay outward pilotage"—the law requires the pilot who takes in a vessel to take it out if he chooses to do so—but the ship-owners desire to be allowed to select the pilot to bring in these large vessels, and I should like to know upon what principle of commerce they should not be allowed that privilege.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Why should he not in such case pay double pilotage rather than leave such a loose opening to pass a pilot and not take him in his turn? It is adopting a principle of favoritism and selection which it seems to me would be fatal to all pilotage. I am assured by ship-owners you must have this system. The pilot who first offers is entitled to pilot the vessel. Otherwise no man can tell, who is out there exposing his life hour after hour, he may not be passed by for somebody else. They have the right to their turn. If there are peculiar cases in which this proposed plan would be preferred by owners of vessel, let them pay a reasonable compensation for it, but we should not strike a blow at the whole system of pilotage.

Mr. POTTER. That again comes right back to the fundamental question whether men are more competent to attend to their own business or the Government is more competent to attend to it for them. I have a profound conviction on all matters of this sort ship-owners are better able to take care of their own interests. The ship-owners of the State of New York do not want the pilot system abolished, but only to be allowed to make their own selection as to who shall handle their ships.

Mr. MERRIAM. All the underwriters of the city of New York are in favor of retaining the present system of pilots in their present integrity, and the gentleman who has offered this amendment did not know, perhaps, the whole breadth and scope of it. It demoralizes and destroys to a certain extent all our pilot laws. Whenever one vessel coming from a foreign country signals a pilot, or one pilot approaches to board, if he when approaching a steamer is to be turned away at the option of the captain, twenty pilots may be turned away in like manner, and other vessels needing pilots may be stranded on the shore for want of pilots. That is one of the main reasons why it will demoralize the whole system. I beg my colleague not to press any such amendment as that.

The amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 60. That before issuing any license to any steamer, the collector or other chief officer of the customs for the port or district shall demand and receive from the owner or owners thereof, as a compensation for the inspections and examinations made for the year, the following sums, in addition to the fees for issuing enrollments and licenses now allowed by law, according to the tonnage of the vessel, to wit: For each steam-vessel of one hundred tons or under, twenty-five dollars; and, in addition thereto, for each and every ton in excess of one hundred tons, five cents. And each captain, chief engineer, and first-class pilot, licensed as herein provided, shall pay, for every certificate granted by any inspector or inspectors, the sum of eight dollars, and for every renewal thereof, the sum of four dollars; and every chief mate, engineer, and pilot of an inferior grade shall pay, for every certificate so granted, the sum of five dollars, and for every renewal thereof, the sum of three dollars, which shall be paid over to the chief officer of the customs, in such manner and under such regulations as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. POTTER. I move to add to that the following:

The Clerk read as follows:

At the expiration of the year for which any license to any officer may be granted or renewed, as hereinbefore provided, it shall be the duty of such officer, if he desire to continue in the service, to make application, either personally or in writing, to the local board by which the same was granted, or elsewhere, as may be directed by regulations made in pursuance of this act, for a renewal thereof, which application shall be accompanied by a certificate signed by the owner of the vessel to which such officer is attached or upon which he was last employed, stating that according to the best of his—such owner's—knowledge, information, and belief, the said officer is faithful, trustworthy, and competent in the discharge of his duty and temperate in his habits, and that there exists no reason, to the knowledge of such owner, why such license should not be renewed: Provided, however, That where it shall satisfactorily appear that the certificate herein required is withheld or refused by the owner or owners, without just cause, but not otherwise, the same may, in the discretion of the local board, be dispensed with.

Mr. POTTER. There is nothing in that, except that when he applies for a renewal of his license he shall apply at the expiration of the time for which he is licensed, and must bring a certificate of the owner who has employed him that he is a competent person, unless he can show that the owner, without good reason, refuses to give him that certificate. This is only in the interest of the efficiency of the service.

Mr. CONGER. I rather think that this is giving the owner of a steamboat too much control. Why should the owner of a steamboat prevent a man from getting his license by withholding such a certificate? The very object of such laws is to take from the owner that control. We want a board to grant licenses on entirely different considerations from what would influence an owner from withholding or granting such a certificate. I have seen no reason for such a provision as the gentleman from New York proposes, and I cannot see how it would add to the efficiency of the service to have it incorporated here. If the owner of a boat has any objection to a pilot or engineer being licensed, he may go before the board where the examination is to be held. He has that power now, and I think it is as much power as he ought to have. I would not have engineers or pilots subordinate officers on a boat, or under any obligation in the world to an owner. The object of this law is to make them free and independent of the owner in the exercise of their official duties on board a boat, above fear, above reproach from the owner. This will have a tendency to some extent to place these officers again under liability to objection on the part of an owner; and from fear of that objection they may be made tools of the owner during the time they are in his employment, lest he should withhold his certificate. I do not think this is in the direction of free, generous rivalry among the pilots, or in the direction of enabling them to stand upon their merits in applications for licenses.

Mr. POTTER. The gentleman from Michigan must have failed to observe that the amendment provides that where the owner fails to give a certificate the board may still, notwithstanding the absence of such certificate, grant the applicant his license. But surely it cannot but be in the direction of the security of life and property to have the owner, who has employed a man for years and who knows the most about him, to certify that in his opinion he is competent to receive a license and that his habits are good. This cannot have any effect in subjecting the employé to improper control on the part of the owner or of taking away power from the board in that regard.

Mr. CONGER. The amendment requires the applicant, if the certificate of the owner is withheld, to prove a negative—that it is withheld without just cause. But this law provides that the board of inspectors shall give these licenses only to men whom they find possessed of certain qualifications, of which temperance and skill and industry form a part, and they cannot license them without proof of this. It is not necessary that the applicant should have an affidavit or a certificate of any owner whatever. The board are obliged to find those qualifications in the man before they can license him.

Mr. POTTER. Only the gentleman wants them to find it by excluding the proof of all others the most convenient and the most likely to be correct.

The question being taken on Mr. POTTER's amendment, it was not agreed to.

The Clerk read section 66, as follows:

SEC. 66. That the salaries of all supervising inspectors, local inspectors, assistant inspectors, supervising inspector-general, and clerks, herein provided for, together with their traveling and other expenses when on official duty, and all instruments, books, blanks, stationery, furniture, and other things necessary to carry into effect the provisions of this act, shall be paid for, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, out of the revenue received into the Treasury from the inspection of steam-vessels and the licensing of the officers of such vessels, as provided for by the terms of this act, and the same is hereby appropriated for the payment of such expenses, or so much thereof as may be required for such purposes.

Mr. GARFIELD. I offer as a substitute for that section what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out section 66 and insert in lieu thereof as follows:

That all fees, penalties, and revenues arising under the provisions of this act and the act to which this is amendatory, shall be paid into the Treasury; and all disbursements of money for carrying into effect the provisions of this act and of the act to which this is amendatory shall be made only upon specific appropriations, for which the Secretary of the Treasury shall submit annual estimates.

Mr. GARFIELD. This is only to change the plan of payment. Instead of having permanent appropriations out of the Treasury, over which Congress has no control, this provides that all fees and penalties and dues collected under this bill shall be paid into the Treasury and all expenses paid out on regular estimates. This same amendment was put in the bill last year, and was assented to by the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CONGER. I would have no objection to the amendment if the gentleman will provide that this shall be kept as a separate fund.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no objection to saying that a separate account shall be kept of this, but I do not want it to be treated as a separate fund.

Mr. POTTER. If the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from Michigan will listen to a substitute which I send to the desk, I think they will find that it meets the point.

The Clerk read as follows:

All fines collected for penalties enforced under the provisions of this act shall be paid into the Treasury in the same manner as provided for in the collecting of money for inspecting vessels, and shall belong to the fund out of which the salaries and other expenses connected with the steamboat service are defrayed.

Mr. GARFIELD. That would be an addition to my amendment. The trouble with it is that it makes a permanent appropriation, over which Congress has no control. I desire that we shall have annual estimates sent to us and make annual appropriations, so that Congress shall always have a review of the expenses of this whole establishment, and that if they are at any time too great they may be reduced.

Mr. CONGER. I would like that the provision proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] should be added to the provision of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] if the gentleman from Ohio will so amend it as that it shall provide that this money shall be kept as a separate fund and reported annually to Congress.

Mr. NEGLEY. Reported annually in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. POTTER. It is suggested to myself and to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] that we shall incorporate our amendments in the proper language so as to cover the double idea, and that they shall then be offered as one amendment.

Mr. NEGLEY. I ask then that by unanimous consent we pass over this section informally, and return to it hereafter.

There was no objection, and the section was passed over informally.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 67. That supervising and local inspectors of steamboats shall execute proper bonds, in such form and upon such conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe and subject to his approval, conditioned for the faithful performance of the duties of their respective offices and the payment in the manner provided by law of all moneys that may be received by them.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move to amend that section by striking out the words "and upon such conditions." I think my friend from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] who has the reputation of having had some judicial experience, will see that having provided what the conditions of the bonds are, to wit, the faithful performance of the duties of their respective offices and the payment in the manner provided by law of all moneys that may be received by them," it would operate only to embarrass and defeat the object of the section if we provided that the bonds should be upon such conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury might prescribe. We fix the conditions in the act itself, and we should leave it to the Secretary of the Treasury to prescribe the form of the bonds and to approve the execution and security of the bonds.

Mr. NEGLEY. There is no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 68. That the penalty for the violation of any provision of this act that is not otherwise specially provided for shall be a fine of not exceeding $500.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to offer a verbal amendment to that section. I move to strike out the words "that is" where they occur after the word "act," and also to strike out the word "of" near the close of the section; so that it will read:

That the penalty for the violation of any provision of this act not otherwise specially provided for shall be a fine not exceeding $500.

Mr. CONGER. There is no objection to that amendment; it is not very material.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 71. That the act entitled "An act to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam," approved July 7, 1838; also, "An act to modify the act entitled 'An act to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam,' approved July 7, 1838," approved March 3, 1843; also, "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam,' and for other purposes," approved August 30, 1852; also, "An act for the prevention and punishment of frauds in relation to the names of vessels," approved May 5, 1864; also, "An act to create an additional supervising inspector of steamboats, and two local inspectors of steamboats for the collection district of Memphis, Tennessee, and two local inspectors for the collection district of Oregon, and for other purposes," approved June 8, 1864; also, "An act to provide two assistant local inspectors of steamboats in the city of New York, and two local inspectors at Galena, Illinois, and to re-establish the board of local inspectors at Wheeling, West Virginia; and also to amend the act approved June 8, 1864, entitled 'An act to create an additional supervising inspector of steamboats, and two local inspectors of steamboats for the collection district of Memphis, Tennessee, and two local inspectors for the collection district of Oregon, and for other purposes,'" approved March 3, 1865; also, "An act to further provide for the safety of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, to regulate the salaries of steamboat inspectors, and for other purposes," approved July 25, 1866, are all and severally hereby repealed; also, all other acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are, to that extent, hereby repealed.

Mr. NEGLEY. I move to amend that section by inserting after "1866," near the close of the section, the following:

And an act to provide for the better security of life on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, and for other purposes, approved February 28, 1871.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 73. That this act shall take effect from and after the passage of this act.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move to strike out that section. All laws go into effect on their passage.

Mr. NEGLEY. That is a perfectly proper amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have now prepared the amendment which I desire to offer as a substitute for section 66. It is as follows:

That all fees, fines, penalties, and revenues arising under the provisions of this act and the act of which this is amendatory shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States, and all disbursements of money for carrying into effect the provisions of this act and the act of which it is amendatory shall be made only from specific appropriations, for which the Secretary of the Treasury shall submit annual estimates, and the aggregate amount of receipts and expenditures under this act shall be annually reported to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POTTER. I offer the following as an additional section to come in after section 71:

That all licensed officers on steamers carrying passengers shall wear such a uniform or designating badge as may be prescribed by the rules and regulations of the board of supervising inspectors and with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. In case of failure to comply with this section of the law such person shall forfeit and pay the sum of $100 for each offense.

Mr. COX. I object to that amendment. I think a penalty of five cents would be enough.

Mr. NEGLEY. I think there is no objection to that amendment.

Mr. COX. I object to uniforming persons; you might as well uniform the passengers.

Mr. POTTER. I want to say to the House, and to my colleague, that this amendment was suggested to me by the supervising inspector-general having charge of this service, and for the reason that on the Potomac River the steamer Wawaset was burned or met with some accident and there was great difficulty in finding the captain because he had no uniform on. It was supposed by the supervising inspector-general that confusion then resulted from the fact that there were no means of finding out who the captain was because he had no uniform or designating badge. Many persons undertook to control the passengers and no one could say which was the captain. It seems to me that the captain of a steamer ought to have some uniform or some badge so that people may know to whom to go in case of accident.

Mr. MAYNARD. I hope the amendment will prevail.

Mr. POTTER. It is obviously in the interest of human life, and is left discretionary with the board.

Mr. COX. I think that if the captain wore a uniform he would be so bothered in case of an accident that he could do nothing at all.

Mr. POTTER. It does not require him to wear a uniform, but to have a designating badge.

Mr. KASSON. I suggest that the amendment be modified so as to provide that the badge or uniform shall be worn only while on duty, and not compel the officer to wear it while on shore.

Mr. POTTER. I agree to that, and modify my amendment accordingly.

Mr. COX. I do not like to object very strenuously to this sort of legislation; but it seems to me that we are going into details too much. It is not likely that the Senate will pass this bill. Why should we load it down with matters in regard to clothing and uniform?

Mr. NEGLEY. There is no gentleman in the House who has more taste upon that subject than the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Cox.]

Mr. COX. This bill never will pass the Senate at all.

The amendment of Mr. POTTER was then agreed to.

Mr. NEGLEY. I move that the committee now rise and report the bill, with amendments, to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PARKER, of Missouri, reported that, pursuant to the order of the House, the Committee of the Whole had had under consideration the Union generally, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 1588) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the better security of life on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, and for other purposes," approved February 28, 1871, and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments.

Mr. NEGLEY. I call the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. NEGLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. NEGLEY. I move to amend the title, so that it will read: "An act to revise, amend, and consolidate the laws relating to the security of life on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, and for other purposes."

The amendment was agreed to; and the title as amended was then adopted.

Mr. NEGLEY moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GENEVA AWARD.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent that the bill of the Senate in relation to the Geneva award be taken from the Speaker's table, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

No objection being made, the bill (S. No. 7) for the creation of a court for the adjudication and disposition of certain moneys received into the Treasury under an award made by the tribunal of arbitration constituted by virtue of the first article of the treaty concluded at Washington the 8th of May, A. D. 1871, between the United States of America and the Queen of Great Britain, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the rules be suspended and the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the deficiency appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole (Mr. NIBLACK in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3030) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1873 and 1874, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending question when the committee rose was upon the motion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] to strike out the clause which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For furniture and repairs of same, carpets, and similar necessaries for public buildings under control of the Treasury Department, $30,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to reduce the amount to $20,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee voted upon this proposition by tellers, and found itself without a quorum. The vote must be again taken.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the committee rises for want of a quorum while dividing upon a proposition, the subject-matter again comes before the committee, upon its resuming its session, as if no division had taken place.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose it was for want of a quorum, pending a vote upon this amendment. Nothing is now in order but to again take the vote.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is certainly in order to move an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee is dividing, and the vote must be proceeded with.

The question was again taken; and the amendment was not agreed to upon a division, ayes 28, noes not counted.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to reduce the appropriation to $20,000. I wish to call the attention of the committee to the fact that for the year ending June 30, 1873, we appropriated for this purpose $150,000; and for the present fiscal year we appropriated the same sum. The standing appropriation for several years for this purpose has been $150,000. Yet when a deficiency comes in here for $30,000 no excuse whatever is given for it, except the excuse, if it can be called such, that the estimate for the present fiscal year was $200,000; that Congress appropriated only $150,000, and therefore we are asked to appropriate $30,000 more. We have already appropriated for these same purposes $10,000 in the preceding item of this very bill. It is now proposed to appropriate $30,000 more without any explanation. I ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations whether he proposes, without any explanation, to grant a deficiency appropriation of this kind? The item of $10,000 which we have already passed was explained and appeared to be proper. It was on account of the increased business growing out of the money-order system and of the change in the mode of collecting the internal revenue—the abolition of the office of assessor. We could thus account for the $10,000 of deficiency appropriated in the preceding item. But there is no explanation at all of the deficiency now under consideration except that Congress did not appropriate the amount estimated for the present fiscal year.

For one, I say to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that it is folly to talk here in this House about saving money by appropriation bills if this system be persevered in. The last appropriation bill was of magnificent proportions—the largest ever passed in Congress. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, in charge of the measure, thought that with the exception of the increase of salaries that bill accomplished something in the way of economy, although I could not see that he had any material reason for boasting. But now after the most liberal appropriations we have these deficiencies, amounting to over $3,000,000; and we are called upon to pass the pending item without one word of explanation; for I call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio again to the fact that his explanation of day before yesterday applied only to the preceding item of $10,000, with respect to which we all concede the explanation to have been sufficient. But what is the reason given for the appropriation now pending? Simply that it is in accordance with the estimates for the present fiscal year. For that reason only the amount heretofore appropriated must be increased, as though the estimates after all must be the basis of our appropriations. There is no use in talking about saving millions of dollars in our appropriation bills if at the very next session deficiencies come in and swell the amount to the original sum estimated for. We might just as well register the edicts of the Departments at once as to grant these deficiency appropriations without a word of explanation.

Mr. GARFIELD. The particular clause now under debate is for furniture and repairs of furniture in the public buildings. The word "furniture" includes as a general term the fixtures necessary to a building for carrying on the duties of the office. All the post-offices of the larger grade throughout the country have had a vast accession of work growing out of the money-order business which has been put upon them by Congress.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is the explanation of the deficiency appropriation of $10,000 already passed.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hold in my hand a letter on this subject which, with the accompanying documents, I shall have published as a part of my remarks. It was received from the Treasury Department this morning. I will read only the following passage:

Statement No. 1, "on account of furniture and repairs of furniture for public buildings," is for articles purchased or now required for the public buildings under the control of this office. In cases where purchases have been made an absolute necessity existed for the purchase of the articles in order to properly prosecute the business of the different offices for which they were furnished. The large increase in the money-order business of the Post-Office Department has necessitated the fitting up of rooms in the different post-offices for the transaction of the business pertaining to that branch of the service, which of course could not be anticipated in the regular estimates for the past year. In addition to the amount specified in the inclosed schedule—

There is here a schedule giving the names of all the cities in which the amounts are required—

there are now on file in this Department applications from the custodians and postmasters in several buildings throughout the country for fitting up their offices with new furniture or repairing the old furniture, which from their statements will admit of no delay; but in the present state of the finances of the country it was deemed advisable to defer the expenditures until the next fiscal year, although in many instances this delay will be detrimental to the public service.

The Book of Estimates for deficiencies asked for $50,000 under this head. The committee insisted that we would not give that amount if it was possible to get along with less, and proposed to cut it down to $30,000. Having a list of those demands which seemed most urgent, we gave enough to meet them, namely, $30,000 and no more. Now, it will be remembered that this is still $20,000 less than the amount appropriated for the last fiscal year. We limited the amount last year to $50,000, trying if possible to repress that class of expenditure. But it must be remembered that since that time there have been other new buildings. When I stated the other day that there were over fifty of these buildings, I had forgotten the exact number. There are one hundred and thirty-five public buildings under the charge of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, and the appropriation for furniture is for the whole group of them. An appropriation of $50,000 for furniture and repairs of furniture in one hundred and thirty-five public buildings cannot be called a very extravagant amount, considering the wear and tear and the increase of furniture needed by increase of public business. The Committee on Appropriations believe that we have reported in this bill only a reasonable amount.

Mr. COX. I would like to know who it is that makes the requisitions of this furniture?

Mr. GARFIELD. The assistant superintendent of each of these buildings. Each public building has a custodian, who reports directly to the Treasury Department.

Mr. COX. Are all these buildings that the gentleman refers to new buildings?

Mr. GARFIELD. No, sir; not all.

Mr. COX. What becomes of the old furniture?

Mr. GARFIELD. If there is any furniture sold, the amount realized must be covered into the Treasury. There is a special law prohibiting the use of a single dollar resulting from the sale of old furniture.

Furniture is repaired as far as it can be. Where it can be it is repaired; but when so old to repair would be waste of money it is sold and the proceeds covered into the Treasury. Not a table or desk or chair in the Government's service but is accounted for.

Mr. COX. Who makes the contract every year for $100,000 worth of furniture?

Mr. GARFIELD. The chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds [Mr. PLATT, of Virginia] made a statement on that subject. I am not familiar with the making of these contracts, but I have no reason to challenge the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. All these expenditures must be approved by the heads of the Departments in charge here in Washington. They send up their estimates. They send up what they desire to expend and for what they propose; and before they make the expenditure the proposed outlay must be approved in Washington.

Mr. COX. Then there is no sort of clinch on this Supervising Architect, whatever the expenditures may be. Whether one hundred thousand or fifty thousand dollars, he makes the contracts and it seems there is no check upon him.

Mr. BURCHARD. Is the amount here any larger than before?

Mr. GARFIELD. It is about the same with the deficiency added. Several new buildings are going up, and we have to make provision for fixing up a part of the State Department, which will be done in September next.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I submit this letter with all its tables in order that it may be printed in the RECORD. It affords the amplest interest:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Office of Supervising Architect, May 13, 1874.

SIR: In compliance with your request of the 12th instant, I have the honor to transmit herewith statement in detail showing the indebtedness incurred and requisite to be incurred before the close of the present fiscal year, on account of which appropriations are requested in the deficiency bill.

Statement No. 1, "on account of furniture and repairs of furniture for public buildings," is for articles purchased or now required for the public buildings under the control of this office. In cases where purchases have been made an absolute necessity existed for the purchase of the articles in order to properly prosecute the business of the different offices for which they were furnished. The large increase in the money-order business of the Post-Office Department has necessitated the fitting up of rooms in the different post-offices for the transaction of the business pertaining to that branch of the service, which of course could not be anticipated in the regular estimates for the past year.

In addition to the amounts specified in the inclosed schedule, there are now on file in this Department applications from the custodians and postmasters in several buildings throughout the country for fitting up their offices with new furniture, or repairing the old furniture, which, from their statements, will admit of no delay; but in the present state of the finances of the country it was deemed advisable to defer these expenditures until the next fiscal year, although in many instances this delay will be detrimental to the public service.

Statement No. 2 exhibits an indebtedness incurred on account of supplying the United States post-office and sub-Treasury at Boston, Massachusetts, and the United States branch mint at San Francisco, California, with vaults, and the other buildings specified therein. Proposals were invited for supplying these vaults for the buildings above specified in season to have the contracts entered into before the close of the fiscal year for which the appropriation was made, but owing to several unavoidable delays the contracts were not approved until after the close of the fiscal year, and as the accounting officers decided that under the fifth and sixth sections of the act of July 12, 1870, the contract must be fully entered into before the commencement of the fiscal year, in order that the balance on the books of the Treasury might be used in the payment of the same, the amount now on the books of the Treasury cannot be used for that purpose unless reappropriated.

In regard to the safes supplied for Buffalo, New York, Saint Louis, Missouri, Saint Paul, Minnesota, and Sandusky, Ohio, I have to say that, like those in the case of furniture, these articles were actually necessary for the proper care and protection of the funds intrusted to the different postmasters on account of the extension of the money-order system, and they were accordingly furnished to them.

Statement No. 3, on account of fuel, light, water, and miscellaneous items for public buildings under the control of the Treasury Department, exhibits the estimates of the custodians for the amounts required for the last three (3) months of the present fiscal year, to supply the buildings with fuel, light, water, and miscellaneous items.

In this connection I have to state that from the appropriations for the present fiscal year payments have been made for miscellaneous items which have heretofore been paid from the appropriation for "expenses of collecting the revenue from customs" and other sources; and by including these in the regular appropriation it is believed that a large saving has been made. As the collectors and custodians are limited in their expenditures to such articles as may be specifically authorized by the Department, and although the item appears to be a deficiency under the head of an appropriation, yet, in point of fact, it is not the case.

Under the head of miscellaneous items are classed all the articles required by the janitors to keep the building and furniture in proper order; of the services of engineers, firemen, &c., for the heating apparatus; for the purchase of all articles connected therewith, such as, for the janitor, brooms, brushes, sponges, towels, wheelbarrows, matches, and sundry other items; for the firemen, shovels, wheelbarrows, hose, &c., and such tools as are necessary to the care of the heating apparatus.

Very respectfully,

C. H. PARSONS,
Acting Supervising Architect.

Hon. JAMES A. GARFIELD,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move an amendment to the amendment by striking out the last word, and I do so for the purpose of having read the notes as we find them in the estimates of deficiencies in appropriation. I wish to call attention especially to the reason given for this appropriation by the Treasury Department itself. Read first, Mr. Clerk, the note in reference to the $100,000 appropriation.

The Clerk read as follows:

NOTE.—This deficiency occurs as follows: The rapid growth of the money-order system made it necessary to construct a large number of file-cases and to supply extra tables, desks, and other furniture in the office of the Sixth Auditor of the Treasury, at an expense of about $5,750. When the law went into effect abolishing the offices of assessors of internal revenue, the files of their offices were sent to the Department, and, as a consequence, many additional file-cases were required for their accommodation, involving an expense of about $2,250. In order to meet the requirements of the increased business of the Department, it became necessary to rent additional buildings and fit them up with file-cases, carpets, furniture, &c., at an expense of about $2,000. These expenditures were not anticipated at the time the regular estimates for the year were made up.

Mr. HOLMAN. That explanation is satisfactory.

Mr. GARFIELD. That relates to the Sixth Auditor's Office here in Washington.

Mr. HOLMAN. It not only relates to the Sixth Auditor's Office but to the expenditures necessarily growing out of the abolition of the office of assessor.

Mr. GARFIELD. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. HOLMAN. But I say that is a good explanation. Now I ask the Clerk to read in reference to the $50,000 appropriation.

The Clerk read as follows:

Repairs and preservation of all public buildings under the control of the Treasury Department, being a deficiency for the fiscal year 1874, $50,000.

NOTE.—This amount is necessary to complete repairs already commenced and to make other repairs during the present fiscal year, which the condition of the public buildings renders necessary. The demands upon the appropriation during the year have been unusual and imperative, and the amount herein estimated should be appropriated as soon as possible.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is just the way. There is not a word of explanation. We appropriate $150,000 for the present year. They wish the whole amount estimated for and there is not one word of explanation except what in their judgment is necessary.

Mr. BURCHARD. I should be glad to follow the committee in this matter, but it seems to me they have not explained why the Committee on Appropriations have fixed the amount at $150,000. The committee of the last House and the House itself fixed the amount. If when Congress fixes the amount no attention is paid to it by officials, how are we to enforce our decisions in regard to what we deem a proper amount? It seems to me we must do so by adhering to the amount we have established as the amount which shall be expended, unless there is some explanation given of an unavoidable and unforeseen expenditure which will excuse the necessity for an additional appropriation. If the committee propose hereafter to recommend that we should appropriate $200,000, if they say there should be a larger amount the next fiscal year, then we may concede it has been in the past insufficient. But I understand now we have entered upon a period of economy. We propose now to limit expenditures. We propose to reduce them. The Committee on Appropriations in all their bills prided themselves on reducing expenditures. Here is a proper place where we can vote to cut down expenditures on these public buildings; and without some explanation I feel like reducing the amount if we do not strike it out entirely.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. KASSON. I renew the amendment for the purpose of saying a word or two.

I feel a difficulty in voting for an appropriation merely on the recommendation of the chief of a Department without an explanation of its necessity, and on the other hand in attempting by mere guesswork to arrive at a satisfactory sum. I greatly desire that the Committee on Appropriations should in that respect be as far as possible the interpreter between the Departments and the House, and supply the facts which the Departments fail to give us.

On the question now before the committee that interpretation is not to me satisfactory. I know that there is much of this expenditure for repairs and preservation of the public buildings, especially in the Post-Office Department, with which I am most familiar, which does not come out of this appropriation, as I understand it, being passed upon by the Post-Office Department itself. I cannot say positively what fund it is paid from. But this provides only for what is done under the control of the Treasury Department.

Now, it is a fact, and I think the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will bear me out in so stating, that there has been in nearly every part of this country, and especially in the Treasury Department itself, a grossly extravagant expenditure in the furnishing of the public buildings. They get unnecessarily expensive carpets—almost uniformly the finest Brussels; they lay down those carpets on the floors of subordinate clerks; they introduce elaborately carved desks. And I venture the statement in the hearing of gentlemen who know more than I do in regard to public expenditures of this kind in other countries, that there is not a country in the world where there is so much extravagance in all the details of furnishing in the public Departments as there is in the public Departments of the United States. We ought, sir, here, as is done there, introduce into most of the rooms of our various Departments and public buildings plain, substantial furniture, and lay down substantial matting upon the floors, except in those offices which are occupied by the principal officers, and where a decent regard for public opinion requires a superior style of furniture. But if you will go into your court-houses, into your large post-offices, owned by the Government, into your custom-houses, into the rooms occupied by first-class clerks in the Departments here, and look at the furniture, I think gentlemen will agree with me that in one of two ways we must meet and cure this extravagance.

One method is to cut down the appropriations so that only the kind of furniture to which I have alluded can be procured. The other is to provide by law the general description, mode, and manner in which these public Departments shall be furnished. I, for one, will be very glad if the Committee on Appropriations will devise either one mode or the other, as I should much prefer to follow their suggestions rather than insist on any special mode myself. I have already once drawn a clause, and submitted it to the Committee on Appropriations to be appended to an appropriation bill which has now been passed, to accomplish this, but it was deemed best to waive it then. I have risen now for the purpose of again calling attention to the subject, and I shall feel obliged to vote for this reduction as the only mode remaining to us to reach the evil I have referred to.

Mr. COX. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] I think informed the committee that some of this expenditure would be for the new State Department.

Mr. GARFIELD. I did not say that. I said that, for example, we had still to furnish the new State Department. None of this appropriation is for that purpose.

Mr. COX. I want to call attention to this new State Department, as to which I had a resolution sent to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. It has been criticised by the best architects in this country. It is under the care of a man who has much of this business under his control, and who is authorized almost without restriction to spend seven, or eight, or perhaps ten million dollars every year. There is hardly any restriction upon him.

I venture the assertion that if there were a good board of architects appointed they would in some way or other change the plan of that State Department; otherwise it will run on for years before completion. They had an appropriation in 1871 of $500,000; in 1872 they had an appropriation of $200,000; by the act of June 1, 1872, an appropriation of $200,000; by the act of March 3, 1873, $1,500,000; making $3,400,000; and the appropriations asked for this year are a million and a half, making nearly $5,000,000. The whole amount, including the appropriations asked for this year, is $4,900,000; and I ask when will that building be finished?

Will gentlemen please look at the report made by Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont in the Senate on that subject. In speaking of this building he referred to the general style of which this building is an example. I hope it may be finished this year and that the furniture may be put in it this year. But nobody can tell when it will be finished in view of the peculiar mode in which the granite is being dressed and the various alterations which will have to be made hereafter, and the shabby-genteel idea that seems to control the architect who has the superintendence of this building.

I hope that members will read what Senator MORRILL says in criticism of this mode of public building. He says:

> The present rage for Mansard roofs, broken by frequent grotesque protuberances elevated from the center and from every corner, creates the necessity for unnumbered gutters, which may always be warranted to need repairs; and a building thus fussily roofed furnishes an opportunity for a too ambitious architect to bestrew the elevations with all the finery of a rambling and eccentric fancy. The committee need not say that they do not refer to, or criticise the works of, any architects at present employed by the Government, whose distinguished merits they very willingly acknowledge, but they refer to the general tendency of the times to indulge in a lavish display of petty decorations. This modern taste may not be coarse, though unquestionably vulgar, and all American architects are compelled to supply to some extent what appears to be so highly appreciated. The result is, too often, buildings without grandeur but with a superabundance of minor beauties, soon destined, from the smoke and dust of cities, or the wear and tear of time, to be only a realization of what is best known by the term "shabby-genteel."

And in this report Senator MORRILL recommends that there shall be some better plan adopted. Sir, if we are ever to have this building finished let us not pursue the policy adopted in building this Capitol. You may remember that the estimated cost of the Capitol was $2,650,000, but before it was finished it cost $8,000,000, including the cupola, which cost $1,000,000. You cannot tell when you enter on a work of this kind, with a reckless sort of architect, what the expense will come to. I would not trust this man with the expenditure of any amount of money for this furniture. I want to see some responsibility in the expenditures. I would like to see the Comptrollers of the Treasury make the contracts and pay these bills before we foot them up at the rate of thousands of dollars a year. I think that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, which has charge of my resolution, although the chairman denounced it as foolish, might do themselves credit by reporting something to the House which would enable us to revise this business, and save money thereby.

Mr. KASSON. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I renew the amendment. It is not so much the amount of money involved in this particular paragraph of the bill that is of consequence, as it is the question which is behind it, and that is the requirement which was placed upon this officer by the Government and his disregard of that requirement, and his coming here now and asking us to approve his disregard of that requirement. The reason given for this appropriation was not read at the Clerk's desk, and I will read it. It is the only reason given for this particular appropriation. It is as follows:

> The estimate submitted for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, (see page 146, printed estimate of 1873 and 1874,) was $200,000. One hundred and fifty thousand dollars has been appropriated; the remaining $50,000 herein estimated for is required to meet requisitions for indispensable articles, chargeable only to that appropriation.

Now, the fact is just this: They sent in here a year ago an estimate for this very work of $200,000. Congress considered that estimate, and looking the matter all over said that $150,000 was enough, and that they might have that amount, and must make their expenditures come within it. Now at the very next session of Congress this officer comes in and says: "I estimated for $200,000; you gave me only $150,000; now give me the other $50,000," and the committee come in and recommend that we shall give him $30,000 of that other $50,000. Why they did not give him the fifty, or forty, or thirty-five thousand dollars, or some other sum, I cannot imagine. No statement has been made here of the reason why this particular sum is allowed; and I presume the $30,000 is put in there in order to show that the committee are still determined to economize and cut under the estimates, whatever they may be.

Now, the question is just this: Here is evidently a class of expenditures in which there could have been economy. The estimate was $200,000 for carpets, furniture, &c. Congress appropriated $156,000, and there could undoubtedly have been that amount of economy in this class of expenditures if the officer had paid any sort of attention whatever to the congressional limitation; but instead of that he went on and made his expenditures just as though the House had appropriated the amount estimated for, $200,000.

Now, if when an officer does this Congress is going to say, "We do not think you did quite right, but here is the money you asked for," it is evident enough that we shall have this kind of deficiency continually. These officers will find that there is no responsibility and that Congress at any time is ready whenever another session comes around to make up in another appropriation bill what it cut off in the former bill in a fit of economy.

Now I say there is a question quite outside of the question whether we want to save this $50,000 or $20,000, and that is the question whether an officer of the Government is to be kept within the law, and whether when he violates the law persistently and exceeds the authority given to him and then comes here we will condone his offense and give him all the money he asks for.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. How has he exceeded his authority?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Because we appropriated $150,000 for the whole fiscal year, and he says that this $50,000 is absolutely necessary for the remaining part of the year. I would like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations if he understands that any portion of this money has been expended?

Mr. GARFIELD. It has.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I should like to know how it has been expended. There was no appropriation made.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to say a word in response to the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. WILLARD.] I wish some gentleman of this committee, or of this House, would tell us how we are to get along in running a great public machine like the Government of the United States in regard to repairs of public buildings and repairs of furniture, if we are to forbid every expenditure of money except it be appropriated expressly for the purpose.

Take the expenses included under the next clause particularly. The roof of a public building springs a leak; the rain pours down through the roof; there is no special appropriation for its repair. Congress has said, in its judgment, that there shall be only so many hundreds or thousands of dollars expended for that purpose. But the rain is pouring through the roof. Well, let it pour; let the building be destroyed. There must be no expense, because Congress has said that a specific sum shall be set apart for that purpose, and that it must not, in any instance, be exceeded.

Take the case of necessary repairs of furniture and fixtures. A desk or a chair breaks down; a book-case breaks down; something important and necessary in a custom-house. The appropriation for the repair of furniture has been exhausted. What will you do about it? A stove breaks down in the midst of winter and you cannot stay there an hour in comfort unless the stove is fixed up. What will you do about it? There is no money left for the repair of furniture.

Now, for the one hundred and thirty-five great public buildings the repairs of stoves alone would require a considerable sum of money. There is force in what my friend from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] says about the style of carpet used. He introduced a proposition and suggested to the Committee on Appropriations to put it on an appropriation bill, providing that in most of our public buildings they should use matting instead of carpets. At first I thought well of that proposition; I made an investigation, as far as I could, as to the economy of putting down what we call "rope matting" in place of carpets. The inquiries which I made resulted in this: one good, thoroughly-made English Brussels carpet will outlast just about four rope-matting carpets, and one good English Brussels carpet will cost a little more than one-third less than four rope-matting carpets. And besides, instead of having four patched and botched pieces of carpeting, to be taken up every two or three years, we will have one elegant, firm, solid carpet, that will last six, seven, or eight years. That will probably be more economical than the other method. And they who have charge of this business insist that a good Brussels carpet is more economical than matting.

I do not know how other gentlemen find it; but in my experience I have found that in buying clothing, furniture, or anything else for yourself, you cannot do a more wasteful thing than to buy a poor article. I believe it is better to purchase a good article.

I do not believe in all the "curly-cues" the gentleman speaks of. I have no doubt there is more decoration and flummery about our public buildings and furniture than there ought to be. But I have yet to learn that shoddy articles anywhere are either economical or wise.

If gentlemen will tell me any way by which we can fix the exact expenditures which may be proper and necessary for a great public interest like this, I will be very glad to adopt it. In the bill making appropriations for the next fiscal year, instead of having but three items we have made thirteen separate items. We have appropriated so much for carpets, so much for furniture, and for each of various other items of expenditure so much. We have tried to itemize the appropriations so as to hold them more completely under control if possible. Hitherto we have merely appropriated a lump sum for furniture, carpets, repairs of furniture, and the like. I do not see any way but to give this sum of money. This is the judgment of the Committee on Appropriations, doing all they can to restrict the expenditures of the Army.

Mr. HOLMAN. My motion is to reduce the appropriation contained in the pending paragraph to $10,000.

Mr. KELLOGG. I want to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. GARFIELD] if this item of appropriation of $30,000 is not for buildings all over the country?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly; I have said that.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. It is not for buildings at all, but for carpets and furniture.

Mr. KELLOGG. Of course; for carpets and furniture for buildings all over the country.

The question was taken upon the amendment moved by Mr. HOLMAN to reduce the appropriation in the pending paragraph to $10,000; and it was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the unexpended balances of the appropriations for vaults, safes, and locks for public buildings, and for fuel, lights, water, and miscellaneous items for the same, now remaining on the books of the Treasury Department, and unavailable under the provisions of the fifth, sixth, and seventh sections of the act of July 12, 1870, are hereby made available from and after the passage of this act.

Mr. BECK. I move to strike out this paragraph for the purpose of ascertaining from the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations the precise nature and amount of these unexpended balances which it is proposed to make available.

Mr. GARFIELD. The largest sum embraced in this paragraph is for the branch mint at San Francisco. The contract was made during the year for which the appropriation was made for building fireproof vaults and putting in safes, but the work was so far delayed that no money was paid during that year. Thus the amount is rendered unavailable by the necessary delay in prosecuting the work. The total amount of all these sums is $83,000. I have submitted already a table which contains this item. About two-thirds of the amount is for the San Francisco mint; and the rest is for other public buildings where safes and vaults were ordered, and the contract made for the work but the expenditure not in fact made, so that the appropriation has lapsed under the law in consequence of the work not being done in time. We simply reappropriate the amount to cover the exact sums already due.

Mr. BECK. I will state my reason for moving to strike out this paragraph. These unexpended balances, about which so much has been said, run through a number of years, as shown by the Book of Estimates. Some of them are, I suppose, six or eight years old. Here is an item which, by reason of the general terms in which the appropriation is put, may be applied to San Francisco, or two, three, or a half-dozen other places. Why should not the appropriation be made specific so that we can tell precisely what we are voting? Under this provision as now presented any amount of money that may have been appropriated for these purposes, though the appropriation may have been years ago, can and probably will be taken out in ways of which Congress will know nothing. It would have been very easy to specify in this appropriation so much for San Francisco, so much for this place, so much for the other. We could then understand what we were doing, instead of taking out of the Treasury by one sweeping paragraph moneys that have heretofore been appropriated for these purposes and have not been used, and which may amount to millions. The committee themselves may not know what they are. Why not give the precise amounts according to the information in the possession of the committee, so that there may be a limit on this appropriation? It was shown by the report made by the Secretary of the Treasury the other day that since the beginning of the current fiscal year there have been drawn of unexpended balances for 1871, appropriations made specially for that year, $4,282,000, (more than $3,000,000 of which has been drawn since this Congress met,) although we had given by regular appropriation $323,000,000 for the service of the current fiscal year.

If we want to keep in the hands of Congress any control over the money in the Treasury, if we want to keep the Executive Departments from using just what they please, we shall specify in each case how much we intend to allow to be drawn from the Treasury and for what specific purpose. If this be not done, every dollar that has ever been appropriated can be drawn under this general vague system of allowing the Departments to use all they want. That is what I object to. Perhaps the items intended to be embraced in this paragraph are all right; but why not specify them? Why not put it beyond the power of the Department to so continue the provision as to enable it to draw out money that ought to remain in the Treasury?

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. BECK to strike out the paragraph, it was not agreed to; there being ayes 33, noes not counted.

The Clerk read as follows:

For continuing the introduction of shad into the rivers and lakes of the United States, to be expended under the direction of the United States commissioner of fish and fisheries, $15,000, which shall be available also for the ensuing fiscal year.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I move to strike out this item. I wish to inquire how this deficiency with respect to the shad fisheries has arisen?

Mr. HOLMAN. How much did we appropriate for this purpose last year?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Seventeen thousand dollars.

Mr. GARFIELD. Seventeen thousand five hundred dollars.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Do the shad cost more than was anticipated? Is that the reason of the deficiency?

Mr. GARFIELD. I will explain what this deficiency means. Under the appropriation heretofore made this work has been carried on until the appropriation was exhausted; no expenditure has been made beyond the appropriation; but because of the peculiar nature of these fish it is necessary that whatever appropriation we propose to grant should, in order to be efficient, be made before the heats of summer. If those in charge of this work shall be obliged to wait for the annual bill of next year, it will then be too late to begin the work they need to carry on now.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. That being the case, I would like to know how the appropriation made last year has been used, if it could not be available in the heat of summer.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman has not put a very difficult question. We got our bill through very early last year.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. But the appropriations only took effect at the beginning of the current fiscal year.

Mr. GARFIELD. But the appropriation for this purpose was made available from the passage of the act, so that those in charge of this work could at once begin to use the money. That is my recollection. I know that such was the case in several instances.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Has provision been made for carrying on this work during the next fiscal year?

Mr. GARFIELD. We have not come to that yet; that provision will be in the miscellaneous bill. The committee have maturely deliberated on this subject. They called before them Professor Baird, who made a very interesting statement as to the work he was doing. He also addressed to the Speaker of the House (and it has been printed as Miscellaneous Document No. 235) a statement of his operations during the past year. There will also be found on pages 8 and 9 of the report of the Committee on Appropriations upon this bill a statement showing what the operations of this department have been.

It is entirely optional with the House to appropriate this amount or not. If they think it is for a worthy object, they ought to appropriate it. The committee believe it is for a worthy object. The money has not been expended or contracted for.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. This is outside of the appropriation for the same purpose that may be in the regular appropriation bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the estimates are sent in to the committee, of course we will consider and act upon them.

I will say in addition, the United States commissioner on fish and fisheries has found to be true what he believed two years ago, that he could successfully plant shad in the waters of the Mississippi and northern lakes. It was not supposed they would thrive there. It was deemed they needed salt water or to be placed in streams where they could run down into salt water. In the northern lakes there was an abundance of that sort of microscopical shell-fish he found they lived on when they did run down to salt water. He has found that shell-fish abounded in the northern lakes. He has successfully planted shad in the tributaries of the Mississippi and of the lakes, and he believes, and we have reason to think he is correct, if the work is carried on for a few years longer our rivers—those which flow into the lakes as well as those which flow into the Mississippi River—can be stocked with shad.

Gentlemen perhaps are not aware how large a share fish makes in the food of our people. The statistics of this city show for four months of last year five million pounds of fish of two kinds only were sold in the markets of Washington, a city of the tenth grade among the cities of the United States; so largely do fish go to supply the food of the American people. Our waters were teeming with fish once all over the country, but by the construction of dams and wiers and by use of nets many of the best rivers in the United States have been almost depopulated of food fishes. Now, under the operation of the United States commissioner of fish and fisheries, for which this appropriation is proposed to be made, and by the assistance of the laws of the States, these rivers are again being stocked. I believe it is a wise expenditure. I have nothing more to say.

Mr. COBURN. Why do you limit it to the planting of shad? Why not plant other food fishes?

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Baird, United States commissioner of fish and fisheries, wants to use the balance of the appropriation to carry out and finish his experiment in reference to shad only. He has shad on hand. He has used enough on other classes of fish. It is only on this he wishes to carry on his experiment through the summer.

Mr. COBURN. I am in favor of it, but I am in favor of having other fish planted besides shad.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. The appropriation of 1872 for the introduction of shad and salmon, &c., was $15,000. Then there was an appropriation made in the miscellaneous bill of 1873 for the introduction of shad, &c., of $17,500 Then there was in the deficiency bill of last year another appropriation of $10,000 for the introduction of shad in the rivers and lakes of the United States, to be expended under the direction of the United States commissioner of fish and fisheries. All that needs to be said about this is that we have already appropriated $17,500, last year, for this work, and there is no deficiency at all. It is not pretended there is any deficiency. In fact there is none whatever. No money has been expended in the introduction of shad into our rivers and lakes beyond the money already appropriated. It is therefore an open question whether the House will make another appropriation of $15,000 in addition to the $17,500 for this year, and then be asked in a few days again, as the committee have the matter under advisement, to make the regular annual appropriation of $15,000 or more.

Now, there is no question about fish being a valuable article of food. This is a new and open question, however, as to the advisability of Congress going into the business of planting fish in the lakes and rivers of the country.

The gentleman from Ohio speaks of the large share which fish supply to the food of our people, and has given a statement of the amount sold in Washington. Of course there is a great waste of brain-power here which must be supplied, and fish is said to be an article of food which especially nourishes the brain. But to go into this expenditure now when there is no deficiency, and when in fact it is a new appropriation which does not belong to a deficiency bill, is a thing which I am unable to see unless it is on the theory we can go into any of these expenditures. This does not come under the head, as mentioned by the gentleman a moment ago, of buildings which must be repaired to save them, or desks and chairs which must be repaired or they will break down.

Mr. KASSON. May it not come under the head of commerce between the States?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I do not think commerce carries on shad planting, although shad help to carry on the commerce of the country. I withdraw my motion to strike out the last word and ask for a vote on the other amendment.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont, to strike out the paragraph, there were—ayes 37, noes 80; no quorum voting,

Mr. HOLMAN. I think there should be a full vote on a new appropriation like this.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum not having voted the Chair orders tellers, and appoints the gentleman from Vermont, Mr. WILLARD, and the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. GARFIELD.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 52, noes 94.

So the motion to strike out the paragraph was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

To pay John Cooper, of the John Cooper Engine Manufacturing Company, for tools and work done on the Southwest Pass light-house in 1872, $514.29.

Mr. HOLMAN. I raise the point of order on this appropriation. The amount may be small, but it seems to me that this is not a proper matter to be introduced into an appropriation bill. It has been too much the custom for some years to put these private claims into appropriation bills. I believe this bill has more private claims in it than have been before the House in an appropriation bill for a number of years.

Mr. GARFIELD. Has the gentleman seen any private claim in this bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes; there is this one on which I am raising the point of order.

Mr. GARFIELD. Is this the only one the gentleman has seen?

Mr. HOLMAN. I say that there are more in this bill, and a larger number than have been introduced into previous appropriation bills. I only make the point of order for the reason that this is a discrimination in favor of certain claims as against others.

The CHAIRMAN. This appropriation is for a continuation of work already authorized. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. It has been uniformly held that where money is required to go to an officer of the Government for work already done, it is a deficiency. But an appropriation cannot be legitimately made for a private claim in a regular appropriation bill. If this can be appropriated for here, appropriations might be put in for all the claims now pending before the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Does the gentleman make any objection to this aside from his point of order? If he does I am prepared to answer him.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I move to strike out the paragraph to enable me to say a word or two. This ruling is contrary to the practice of the committee, but I know of what use it is to take an appeal, and therefore I do not appeal. But I find that this bill is in the direction of reviving an old practice of the Committee on Appropriations in selecting out a few favored claims against the Government and putting them in the appropriation bills. But inasmuch as the Chair has overruled the point of order, that is the end of it.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I rise to oppose the amendment. I wish to say that the gentleman was never, in the many times he has been wrong on this floor, more thoroughly wrong than he is here. The Committee on Appropriations was never more scrupulous in rejecting all manner of private claims than it has been in this Congress. It refers here from week to week to the Committee on Claims, the Committee on War Claims, and other committees subject-matters which the House has sent to it, because those subject-matters embrace claims.

But where the committee finds, in regard to a public work that has been authorized by law, that the appropriations that have been made and expended are not sufficient to carry out the law and complete the work, then it has no hesitation—and the ruling of the Chair covers the point—in recommending the appropriation of the money to carry on the work of the Government. And this is a clear, clean, and undoubted case of this kind. As the Chair has ruled on that point that settles the question.

I only rose to contravene the statement of the gentleman from Indiana that the Committee on Appropriations loads this bill with private claims. He cannot find in the reports of the committee a single claim that justly and fairly comes under that designation. I defy him to do it.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the amendment is exhausted. Does the gentleman from Indiana desire a vote on his proposition?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do; but I wish to modify it, and move to amend by reducing the appropriation to one-half, to enable me to say this: The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] has not gone through the pupilage that is usual in this House. He becomes a member of a leading committee at a very early moment. Had he passed through the pupilage of most of the members of this House who have reached the important committees and gained the experience acquired therein he would have been a little more courteous in his mode of speaking. The gentleman is imperious, as though a position on a leading committee gave a man a right on this floor to talk disparagingly of his peers. This, sir, is an effect of too rapid promotion. It is one of the results we often find flowing from that cause in this House and elsewhere. I say without a moment's hesitation, and I speak with some moderate degree of experience, that this is a private claim, the same as hundreds of other private claims which are now pending before the committees of this House, and which have been struck out of this class of bills time and time again. I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read the following, under the head of "War Department:"

Quartermaster's Department:

Regular supplies: For fuel for officers, enlisted men, guards, store-houses and offices, forage for the horses, mules, and oxen of the Quartermaster's Department at the several posts and stations, and with the Armies in the field, and for horses of the several regiments of cavalry and batteries of artillery, and such companies of infantry and scouts as may be mounted, and for the authorized number of officers' horses, including bedding for the animals, straw for soldiers' bedding, stationery, including blank books for the Quartermaster's Department, certificates of discharged soldiers, blank forms for the Pay and Quartermaster's Departments, and for the printing of division and department orders and reports, being for the service of the fiscal year 1873, $100,000.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I offer a formal amendment to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations a question. Under this head of appropriations for the War Department there is in this bill $500,000 appropriated. Now, it seems to me due to the House that there should be some statement on the part of the Committee on Appropriations as to whether this is an ordinary deficiency that may occur any year, or whether it is an extraordinary deficiency.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Chairman, this constantly recurring deficiency in the War Department gives the Committee on Appropriations perhaps the most difficult part of the work it has to do anywhere. We have struggled against these deficiences, and the only consolation I can give the House is that they are a great deal smaller this year than they were last.

There seems to have been, and I regret to say it, something amounting to recklessness in the disregard which the Quartermaster's Department seems to have paid to the limitations on the appropriations in regard to the expenses of the Army. I can understand generally that it is impossible for us to say just how many dollars are needed for some purposes. The pay of the Army is fixed by law, and if we have not appropriated enough money, there is of course a deficiency which we are bound in good faith to make up. The clothing of the Army is also fixed by law. The troops are entitled to a certain number of suits of clothing a year, and a certain number of blankets, and a certain amount of equipments, and a certain amount also of rations. We never can tell in advance just how many rations will be needed, nor how many suits of clothing or blankets, or what amount of hospital stores; nor can we tell what will be the cost of transportation in the movement of troops. One of the chief items of uncertainty is that for the movement of troops. Last year, for instance, the Modoc war broke out, and it was necessary to transport troops over a very large extent of country and at a great expense. Furthermore, it was believed that a raid was to be made upon the line of the Northern Pacific Railroad by the Sioux Indians, and it was necessary to bring troops even from as far off as Texas and send them there to meet the threatened difficulty. That increased very largely the expense for transportation.

I have now indicated the general reasons for a deficiency. I hold that it is a perfectly valid deficiency when an emergency of this sort arises which could not have been foreseen. Most of the deficiencies of this year are of that class.

The expense for barracks is the thing I find most fault with. We make an appropriation of so much for barracks and quarters, and almost uniformly there comes in a demand for a deficiency for barracks and quarters. There is a tendency throughout the Quartermaster's Department of the Army to build up barracks and quarters, and make them as elegant as possible, and to go beyond the estimates. We have placed in the Army appropriation bill for the next fiscal year a very stringent proviso regulating that particular feature in regard to the expenditures, forbidding on pain of punishment any expenditures for barracks and quarters beyond the amount appropriated by Congress. We have endeavored in respect to all those items which are fixed and definite to limit the Departments to the appropriations made, but you cannot make such a proviso in reference to the pay of the Army or to the transportation of the Army, nor, indeed, as to the supply of clothing, blankets, and hospital stores.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Do they not require temporary barracks where troops are moved?

Mr. GARFIELD. No; they usually use tents when they are on an expedition. I submit as a part of my remarks the letter of the Secretary of War in regard to these appropriations, in which he has expressed his great regret to Congress that the deficiency has run up as it has, and in which he submits also his letters of dissatisfaction and reproof to his subordinate officers for allowing some of these deficiencies to creep in that have crept in. I believe the Secretary of War is doing all he can to keep down his expenditures, and I know that the work now being done in his Department is in the direction of economy and retrenchment.

The letter referred to is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, March 25, 1874.

The Secretary of War has the honor to transmit to the House of Representatives, for the information of the Committee on Appropriations, copy of letter of the Quartermaster-General dated the 24th ultimo, submitting a statement of the amount of deficiency in the appropriation for his Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1873; also, copy of letter of the Quartermaster-General dated the 11th instant, and accompanying papers, explaining said deficiency.

WM. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT, QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., February 24, 1874.

SIR: I have the honor to submit herewith a statement of the amount of deficiency in the appropriations for the Quartermaster's Department, required to liquidate the accounts which accrued during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1873, according to the data for such estimate now available.

It differs somewhat from the estimate prepared in this office in the month of September, 1873, and forwarded to the War Department on 5th September, 1873.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

M. C. MEIGS,
Quartermaster-General, U. S. A.

The honorable the SECRETARY OF WAR.

QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE, February 21, 1874.

[Indorsements on preceding letter.]

The Secretary of War views with great dissatisfaction the presentation of these deficiency estimates and directs their return to the Quartermaster-General, together with a copy of his circular orders of March 11, 1873, for report, if practicable, as to who is responsible for the expenditures which are made in violation of his orders and of the laws.

WM. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War.

FEBRUARY 27, 1874.

QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
March 20, 1874.

Respectfully returned to the Secretary of War, in compliance with his directions of this date.

By order of the Quartermaster-General:

J. D. BINGHAM.

[See tabular statement at foot of next page.]

[Circular.]

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, March 11, 1873.

The Secretary of War has observed with much dissatisfaction the large amounts asked for deficiencies during the last session of Congress by several of the Bureaus of the War Department.

When Congress gives the annual appropriations for the Departments, it is the obvious intent of that body, expressly declared in the seventh section of the act of July 12, 1870, that no more money than that appropriated shall be spent, or that the Government shall be involved in any contract "for the future payment of money in excess of such appropriations." It is therefore a palpable violation of that law when any head of Bureau does involve the Government in the manner specified in that law. Every head of Bureau shall take care to so distribute and economize the appropriations intrusted to his charge that the Government shall not be so involved. The expenditures must be kept within the appropriations.

WM. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT, QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., March 11, 1874.

SIR: I have received and filed the estimate for deficiencies in the year ending 30th June, 1873, which was returned to this office with the expression of the dissat isfaction of the Secretary of War at its presentation, accompanied also by a copy of his circular of 11th March, 1873, and with directions to the Quartermaster-General to report, if practicable, as to who is responsible for these expenditures, stated to have been made in violation of his orders and of the laws.

The estimates thus returned were intended to replace those forwarded to the honorable Secretary of War on the 5th of September, 1873, which have been transmitted to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury, and which are printed in Executive Document No. 150, Forty-third Congress, first session. In the annual report of this office for 1873, it was stated that the deficiencies of the year were then estimated at $1,166,000. Since the estimate then submitted was prepared, several questions have been addressed to this office by members of committees of the House of Representatives in relation to the amount necessary to be appropriated for deficiencies. This office answered these questions as received, and, inasmuch as the receipt of fuller information in regard to outstanding liabilities of the different divisions and Departments somewhat modified the amounts stated in the estimate made in September last, and somewhat reduced the aggregate, I caused a revised estimate to be prepared and submitted to the Secretary of War. This estimate, the one returned and filed, modified the amounts as follows:

	Estimate of September 5, 1873.	Estimate of February 24, 1874.
Regular supplies	$206,000 00	$100,000 00
Incidental expenses	241,000 00	200,000 00
Army transportation	592,000 00	676,911 81
Barracks and quarters	127,000 00	90,000 00
Total	1,166,000 00	1,066,911 81

Reducing the total by the sum of $99,088.19.

As regards the responsibility for these expenditures which these estimates were intended to meet, I refer respectfully to a letter of the Quartermaster-General, addressed to the Secretary of War upon receiving the circular of the 11th March, 1873, and also to the remarks upon deficiencies in the annual report above referred to.

I inclose a statement of the action of the War Department in regard to reduction of civil employés paid by the Quartermaster's Department of the Army, and a statement of the amount of liabilities reported or estimated to have been incurred beyond the means available for their payment in each of the military geographical divisions. But I am far from thinking that it would be just to hold any particular officer or class of officers responsible for the excess of these liabilities over the amounts of appropriations. The purchases are made or the services are hired under general orders, or under authority or discretion inseparable from the position or the duties attached to official position, command, and responsibility.

The true cause of the excess is to be found in the fact that the appropriations granted were not sufficient to meet the legal and proper expenses of an army of thirty thousand men, posted as ours is to protect a very wide domain. They were not sufficient to meet the expenses of the movements of that Army and of its supplies, to pay for the supplies which the laws and the contract of service require the War Department, through the Quartermaster's Department, to procure, store, and transport, care for and issue to the men and officers, to pay for the legal wages of extra-duty men employed under legal authority, and those of civilians hired under the general authority of the Secretary of War, and the individual authority delegated to hundreds of officers, all within the limits of numbers fixed by the Secretary of War.

In my letter of 17th March, 1873, I pointed out the only possible remedy available, in my opinion, to execute the orders of the circular of 11th March, that "the expenditures must be kept within the appropriations." This remedy was not to employ the highest number of men allowed by the laws fixing the limits of the military peace establishment, but to employ only so many soldiers as would constitute an Army which, with all its officers and contingencies, could be maintained in every branch of service with the appropriation granted by Congress for the support of the Army.

No reduction appears to have been made in the strength of the Army, and the appropriations were insufficient for its maintenance; and throughout the service purchases are found to have been made and services engaged and rendered for which this Department has no means to pay.

There has been no actual expenditure of money beyond any of the appropriations. This office has remitted to its officers only the moneys placed to its credit under the appropriation laws.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

M. C. MEIGS,
Quartermaster-General, Brevet Major-General, U. S. A.

The honorable SECRETARY OF WAR.

A brief account of the reduction of the number of employés of the Quartermaster's Department.

Respectfully submitted to the Quartermaster-General.

General Order No. 96, Adjutant-General's Office, November 11, 1867, prohibited the employment of civilians when soldiers could be detailed without manifest injury to the service.

By General Order No. 30, Adjutant-General's Office, April 6, 1869, the number of employés in the Quartermaster's Department was limited to four thousand.

According to the reports on file in this office early in May, 1870, the employes in the Quartermaster's Department numbered 3,086.

On the 12th May, 1870, the Secretary of War directed the number of employés to be reduced to 2,268.

On the 5th July, 1870, the Secretary of War decided that those employed on temporary work authorized by special appropriation, and national cemetery employés, were not to be affected by the order for reduction.

On the 18th July, 1872, the number of regular employés was 1,887, and the number of temporary employés was 192.

On the 14th February, 1873, the total number of employés, both regular and temporary, was 2,096. Of this number 56 were employed in the Quartermaster-General's Office.

In November, 1873, the total number of employés, both regular and temporary, including those in the Quartermaster-General's Office, but exclusive of those employed at the clothing depots and paid from the clothing appropriation, was 2,021.

J. D. BINGHAM,
Quartermaster, United States Army.

QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE, March 4, 1874.

War on any scale is expensive; an army is a tolerably expensive machine. We must keep up an army, and it ought to be kept in good heart and in good discipline, and it ought to be well fed and clothed. The estimate of deficiencies in the War Department sent in to us amounted to over $1,000,000. We have cut them down in some cases sharply as a sort of rebuke to the officers in charge, who we think have acted recklessly in expenditures, and have put in only $500,000, all of which I believe is virtually and absolutely necessary.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman explain why he calls these expenses "incidental expenses?" A deficiency bill is not to pay debts that have already been created, but to meet expenditures that are anticipated during the remainder of the fiscal year.

Mr. GARFIELD. Because they are classified in the regular Army appropriation bill under that head. The deficiencies have occurred under that head, in that class of things that come under that head in the regular appropriation bill.

Mr. MAYNARD. Is it understood that this appropriation is to cover these expenditures—"blacksmiths' forges, picket-ropes, &c.?"

Mr. GARFIELD. It is for the incidental expenses which are detailed upon a page and a half of the bill. They are thus grouped and have been for years in the regular appropriation bills. This is for all the deficiencies which have occurred in that class of accounts which are kept separately in the War Department as incidental expenses.

NOTE.—Transportation accounts received since statement of February 16, 1874, was prepared, namely:

Pacific Railroad accounts	$11,106 20
Miscellaneous railroad accounts	4,926 30
	16,032 50

The responsibility for the indebtedness on account of transportation (616,705.42) can only be ascertained by examining transportation orders and bills of lading. The sum of $452,468.77 is in Pacific Railroad accounts.

Mr. MAYNARD. Can the gentleman tell us how much of the amount appropriated for these purposes in the regular appropriation bill remains unexpended?

Mr. GARFIELD. I ought to have added that this is really for last year, not for this year at all. This is the ascertained deficit in the accounts for the last fiscal year. Thus far we have no deficit for this year, because the accounts have not been nearly enough closed to enable us to see what, if any, deficit there will be.

Mr. MAYNARD. Therefore, in fact, these are debts incurred without any authority of law at all, and we are expected to pay them.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. This bill says that these appropriations are for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1873.

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. The explanation of the chairman is satisfactory. I only desired to know whether this was an extraordinary appropriation. If it is a proper deficiency it must be provided for. I withdraw my amendment.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

For incidental expenses, consisting of postage and telegrams or dispatches received and sent on public business, extra pay to soldiers employed under the direction of the Quartermaster's Department in the erection of barracks, quarters, storehouses, and hospitals; in the construction of roads and other constant labor for periods not less than ten days, including those employed as clerks at division and department headquarters, and hospital stewards on clerical duty; expenses of expresses to and from the frontier posts and armies in the field; of escorts to paymasters and other disbursing officers, and to trains, where military escorts cannot be furnished; expenses of the interment of officers killed in action or who die when on duty in the field or at posts on the frontier or other places, when ordered by the Secretary of War, and of non-commissioned officers and soldiers; authorized office-furniture; hire of labor in the Quartermaster's Department, including the hire of interpreters, spies, and guides for the Army; compensation of clerks for officers of the Quartermaster's Department; compensation of forage and wagon-masters; for the apprehension, securing, and delivering of deserters, and the expenses incident to their pursuit; and for the following expenditures, required for the several regiments of cavalry, the batteries of light artillery, and such companies of infantry and scouts as may be mounted, namely: the purchase of traveling forges, blacksmiths' and shoeing tools, horse and mule shoes and nails, iron and steel for shoeing; hire of veterinary surgeons; medicine for horses and mules; picket-ropes; and for shoeing the horses of the corps named; also, generally, the proper and authorized expenses for the movement and operations of the Army not expressly assigned to any other department, being a deficiency for the fiscal year 1873, $200,000.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move to amend this paragraph by inserting near the close, after the words "fiscal year," the words "ending June 30." I call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. GARFIELD] to the fact that this appropriation is here made "for the fiscal year 1873."

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no objection to having the words inserted which the gentleman indicates in each place where they have been omitted. I do not suppose they are really necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. That will be done if no objection be made.

No objection was made; and it was so ordered.

Mr. MAYNARD. I will take this occasion to ask an explanation of the gentleman. Here is an appropriation of $200,000 for a deficiency which occurred prior to the 1st of July last. Now, to whom is this money going? Who will receive it? If this bill becomes a law and this sum of $200,000 is appropriated, does it go to persons who have rendered services to the United States, who have furnished materials, picket-ropes, blacksmiths' forges, &c., and have not yet been paid?

Mr. GARFIELD. Most of these persons supply on large contracts and are paid from time to time. As the year's accounts are settled, it is found that so much is due them on their contract not yet paid. The reason why they do not know now about the expenditure, whether there will be a deficiency or not, is that they cannot tell until they get in all their accounts from all the distant posts, from the quartermasters and commissaries of distant stations, and find out from them all that has been furnished. The vouchers must be presented and examined before it can be told whether there will be a deficiency or not.

Mr. MAYNARD. If I understand the explanation of the gentleman, it seems that so far as this is concerned there is no pretense that there has been knowingly any violation of the law.

Mr. GARFIELD. Not at all.

Mr. MAYNARD. I do not see, from the explanation which has been made, that the War Department has been culpable in the matter. In carrying on large Army operations, such as are required for the public service, there must be some discretion allowed. We establish by law what must be done, we prescribe the size of the Army, we direct the service it is to be put to, and we must trust to our Department to use the Army as best it can, and to pay the bills that they bring in. It seems to me it comes to that.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think it comes to that in all cases where rates and duties are fixed by law. As I have said, the law gives the soldier a certain amount of clothing, and it is the business of the Executive Department of the Government in charge of the Army to furnish the soldier with that clothing. If Congress has not appropriated enough the Department is still bound to clothe the soldier, and then it must call upon Congress to appropriate the necessary amount.

But my criticism was made in regard to cases like that of barracks and quarters, where they are not compelled to build very expensive buildings for barracks and quarters, and where they should keep within and not go beyond the limits of the appropriations. I do not think there is any reasonable excuse for exceeding the appropriation made for that purpose, unless in case of the burning of a building or of some injury to it. The amount of building to be done is a thing which they are not bound by any special contract with the soldier to extend beyond a certain limit. They should limit themselves to the appropriation. But it has been exceeded almost every year in the cases I have examined. In the other cases referred to I do not think anything is to be done except to pay the bills.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move to strike out the words "compensation of clerks for officers of the Quartermaster's Department." I do that partly for the purpose of making an inquiry and partly to call the attention of the committee to the fact that this allows the Quartermaster's Department to employ an unlimited number of clerks.

Mr. GARFIELD. We have cured that in the legislative appropriation bill which we have passed.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The appropriation bill which we passed a year ago provides exactly for the appointment of all the clerks authorized in this department. I know no reason why that number should be added to. These clerks do not seem to be clerks in the department, but in this bill are designated as "clerks for officers of the Quartermaster's Department." That must mean clerks for whom no provision is made in the regular appropriation bill. Unless there be a necessity for this increase in the number of clerks, it seems to me this clause should be stricken out. Certainly we have no information which justifies us in believing that there is any necessity for such an increase. If an increase be really necessary, provision ought to be made which would limit the number. This whole provision appropriating $200,000 is so indefinite that any portion of it may be applied for one purpose or another in the discretion of the officers disbursing the money. It seems to me that the words which I have moved to strike out should not be left in the bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. The law as it now stands (for our bill has not become a law) authorizes the employment of clerks; and the only trouble about the law is that it is not limited. There is what is now known as the general service into which men may be enlisted, and from which they may be detailed as clerks either in Washington or at a quartermaster's depot or commissary depot anywhere. All the quartermasters of the large depots as well as the commissaries must have clerks to keep their books, and they are fully authorized by law to employ them; but the law is vague, indefinite, not limited as to amount; and all these expenditures have occurred under the law as it now stands. It will not do, therefore, to strike out these words as to the past.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The number of clerks is limited by the amount of the appropriation.

Mr. GARFIELD. O, no.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The amount of the appropriation heretofore made necessarily limits the number of clerks to be employed.

Mr. GARFIELD. That would be true if there were a special appropriation for clerks; but there has never been a separate appropriation for quartermasters and commissaries' clerks at the different posts. The expenditure for this purpose is only one of the items in what is known as the incidental expenses. It is enumerated here, as the gentleman will see, under the head of incidental expenses.

Almost all the quartermasters and commissaries' posts throughout the country have clerks regularly employed, who are civilians, not enlisted men. They are employed regularly under this head of incidental expenses. The number employed is not limited, and the amount paid to them is not limited, except by regulation. We must therefore let this stand as it has been under the old law; but when the bill lately passed by the House becomes a law, all this will be regulated.

Mr. LAWRENCE. It is high time that it should be regulated.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] insist on his motion?

Mr. LAWRENCE. No, sir. I withdraw it.

The Clerk read as follows:

For transportation of the Army, including the baggage of the troops, when moving either by land or water; of clothing and camp and garrison equipage, from the depots at Philadelphia and Jeffersonville to the several posts and Army depots, and from these depots to the troops in the field; of horse equipments and of subsistence stores from the places of purchase and from the places of delivery, under contract, to such places as the circumstances of the service may require them to be sent; of ordnance, ordnance stores, and small arms, from the founderies and armories to the arsenals, fortifications, frontier posts, and Army depots; freights, wharfage, tolls, and ferriages; the purchase and hire of horses, mules, oxen, and harness, and the purchase and repair of wagons, carts, and drays, and of ships and other sea-going vessels, and of boats required for the transportation of supplies and for garrison purposes; for drayage and cartage at the several posts; hire of teamsters; transportation of funds for the Pay and other disbursing Departments; the expense of sailing public transports on various rivers, the Gulf of Mexico, the Atlantic, and the Pacific; for procuring water at such posts as from their situation require that it be brought from a distance; and for clearing roads, and for removing obstructions from roads, harbors, and rivers, to the extent which may be required for the actual operations of troops in the field, being a deficiency for fiscal year 1873, not including Pacific Railroad accounts, $175,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to offer a proviso to this section, and I hope the committee will agree to it. Most of this money is to go to railroads west of the Mississippi River.

Mr. GARFIELD. Not any of it; I mean none to the Pacific roads.

Mr. HOLMAN. Not to the Pacific roads of course. But the object, I suppose, is to prevent any of this money going to any land-grant road. It is known that the Quartermaster's Department is now paying such companies for this transportation.

Mr. GARFIELD. We exclude the Pacific Railroad.

Mr. HOLMAN. But there are other roads which are not excluded.

Several MEMBERS. Let the amendment be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no part of the sum appropriated by any provision of this act shall be paid to any railroad company which has received a grant of land on the condition that its road should be a public highway for the transportation of the property and troops of the United States free from toll or other charge; but this provision shall not prevent such company from bringing suit against the United States for the value of such transportation in the Court of Claims, subject to the right of appeal of either party to the Supreme Court.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not want to go into new legislation upon this subject, and I must raise a point of order on the amendment. I have no objection at all to a provision against payment to roads that are indebted to the United States; but I think that on this bill we ought not to go into legislation as to what the courts shall do. For that reason I make the point.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the point will not be insisted upon. This amendment is simply a limitation on this appropriation of money providing that it shall not be applied to a particular purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The clause in regard to the right to bring suit in the Court of Claims is clearly new legislation.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I withdraw that portion of the amendment, although I thought it but fair that these companies should be allowed to adopt the same method of proceeding which has been adopted heretofore.

Mr. GARFIELD. That provision may be right enough in itself, but I do not want any new legislation on this bill.

The amendment of Mr. HOLMAN, as modified, was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Signal Office:

For expenses of the observation and report of storms by telegraph and signals, for the benefit of commerce and agriculture throughout the United States; for the manufacture, purchase, or repair of meteorological and other necessary instruments; for telegraphing reports; for expenses of storm-signals, announcing probable approach and force of storms; for instrument shelters; for hire, furniture, and expenses of offices, maintained for public use, in cities or ports receiving reports; for river reports; for maps and bulletins to be displayed in chambers of commerce and boards of trade rooms, and for distribution; for books and stationery; and for incidental expenses not otherwise provided for, being a deficiency for the fiscal year 1874, $45,000.

Mr. MAYNARD. I suggest to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to strike out in this paragraph the words "for the benefit of commerce and agriculture throughout the United States." That is merely a small "stump speech" inserted there; and even if proper anywhere it is put in the wrong place. As it now stands it would be understood as meaning that the first item was for this purpose and all the rest for something else.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no objection to striking out the words "throughout the United States;" but the language "for the benefit of commerce and agriculture" is in accordance with the law of last year. The words "and agriculture," which were added in the House, are the cause of the deficiency. Previously these meteorological observations had been designed for the benefit of commerce alone; and the stations were confined to the sea-board and the lake coast. But the House last year amended the bill by inserting the words "and agriculture," so as to authorize the establishment of interior stations, and the extension of these observations to agricultural uses.

Mr. MAYNARD. The law designates what the object is; and to insert this language here looks (if the gentleman will pardon the remark) very much like a piece of small excuse. The law designates this office. It seems to me more dignified, more appropriate and becoming, to make the appropriation as specified by law and leave out this stump speech.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no objection. It was put in by the House last year. The word "agriculture" will have to be left in.

Mr. MAYNARD. My point is that the law designates what the law is.

Mr. GARFIELD. My friend is a purist in style and I am willing to be taught by him.

Mr. MAYNARD. I will not reciprocate. I move to strike out the words "for the benefit of agriculture and commerce throughout the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay Ben Pitman balance due him for transcribing phonographic notes of the testimony and proceedings of the court of inquiry into the operations of the army under the command of Major-General D. C. Buell, in Kentucky and Tennessee, during the winter and spring of 1862 and 1863, $990.50.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. GARFIELD. O, no; let us go on until we are stopped by some amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. There will be a series of amendments offered to the next paragraph.

Mr. GARFIELD. I appeal to the gentleman from Indiana to let us go on and get through with the bill as far as we can.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw my motion, but we cannot go much further. I do not make the point of order on the paragraph which has just been read, although it is open to the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Interior Department—Indian Office:

For this amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the subsistence and civilization of the Arickarees, Gros Ventres, and Mandans, to be expended in goods and provisions and other articles, as the President may determine, for agricultural and mechanical pursuits, and for the pay of employés, up to June 30, 1874, $25,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. This will require explanation. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and, the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. NIBLACK reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 3030) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1873 and 1874, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. DARRALL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled the bill (H. R. No. 2989) to authorize the trustees of the Massachusetts Museum of Fine Arts to import and retain for two years certain works of art free of duty; when the Speaker signed the same.

GENEVA AWARD.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill (S. No. 7) for the creation of a court for the adjudication and disposition of certain moneys received into the Treasury under an award made by the tribunal of arbitration constituted by virtue of the first article of the treaty concluded at Washington the 8th of May, A. D. 1871, between the United States of America and the Queen of Great Britain was recommitted.

SAMUEL WATSON.

Mr. WHITTHORNE, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to have the following memorial printed in the RECORD:

A remedy for the tax-payers in South Carolina and other reconstructed States.

Your memorialist, a citizen of Tennessee, respectfully submits the following plan of a currency system for the relief of the reconstructed States and for the benefit of all:

The bank currency should be withdrawn, and the entire currency should be a national one, issued by the United States Government alone. The amount of the currency should be fixed by Congress as soon as practicable, and that amount should be what the business of the community would require when free from panics or other unnatural disturbances of business.

When the amount of the currency is once fixed it should not be increased or diminished unless by a vote of two-thirds of both Houses of Congress, and perhaps also by a vote of two-thirds of the next succeeding Congress; and if necessary let the Constitution be amended so as to make this restriction binding upon Congress.

This national currency should be redeemable by the Government at all times in gold and silver, and for this purpose the Government should be required to keep on hand a certain amount of specie. This amount, after the resumption of specie payment, would be comparatively small, probably not over $100,000,000, perhaps not over $50,000,000, for the confidence of the country under the system which your memorialist proposes would be almost as great in the paper currency of the nation as in its metallic currency. The principal and almost only demand for gold and silver would be to settle foreign balances in trade when against us.

The currency, to be issued in place of the bank currency and to meet any increase in currency above its present amount should be apportioned among the States according to their representation in the lower House of Congress, unless it might be thought expedient to give to some of the indebted States of the South a larger share than to others. Each State should deposit with the Federal Government its bonds bearing 5 per cent. interest for the amount of currency apportioned to it.

This currency apportioned to each State should not be paid over to it, but used by the Federal Government or some other agency in buying up its bonds now out, which should be canceled and returned to the States issuing them.

But the bonds of the Southern States who are deeply oppressed with debt and whose bonds are now almost worthless should not be bought up at par; but they should be bought up at some rate below par, and at a rate above their present and future value, which rate should be fixed by the national Government.

If States should be entitled to currency who are not indebted, their share of the currency in order to equalize the benefits to all, should be invested by the Federal Government in United States bonds, and the bonds or the proceeds of the same should be held sacred for the education of the children of such States.

The interest on the bonds of the States held by the national Government should not go into its Treasury, but be paid over to each State issuing them for the education of its children. In return for the benefits conferred upon the States, and as a condition of it, each State should be required to amend its constitution, so that it should never have the power hereafter of increasing its debt.

Your memorialist knows that it will be urged against the States having the benefit of this additional issuance of Government currency that it should be issued so as to reduce to that extent the bonded debt of the nation now bearing interest.

But are not the debts of the States as well as the debt of the nation owing by the people of the States? And is it not obvious, with the present condition of most of the States, that the people have a far deeper interest in paying the debts which they owe through their State government than they have in paying the debts which they owe through their national Government? And especially is this the case with the States of the South.

The plan above proposed being very novel in its features, and almost a complete revolution in our currency system, the first question that would suggest itself would be, is it practicable? Second, is it constitutional? Third, what are its advantages?

First. Is it practicable?

The following details of the mode of carrying out the plan of currency proposed demonstrate, as he believes, that it is practicable and easy of accomplishment. These details can without doubt be greatly improved upon by men of financial experience.

Let the Government issue United States currency to the amount now issued by the national banks, or that may be issued by them under the action of the present Congress. Let the Government deposit with each national bank as much of this United States currency as it may deem prudent, with instructions to each bank to return to the Government the same amount of bank currency of any of the national banks.

When this is done let another deposit be made with the same instructions, and so on until the entire amount of bank currency issued shall be exchanged for United States currency. The Government would then be the holder of the whole national-bank currency. This currency, for safety, should be canceled as it comes to the hands of the Government, and a record kept by it of the notes of each bank, with their numbers. The banks would be bound to redeem this currency. Instead of redeeming it with their United States bonds deposited with the Government, let them redeem it with State bonds.

Let each bank buy up State bonds at the price to be designated by the Government for the purchase of the bonds of each State, to the extent of the currency issued by the banks, and whenever they buy, say, $10,000 of State bonds let them forward them to the Government and receive their United States bonds deposited with it to the amount paid for the State bonds, with 10 per cent. added to that amount.

The State bonds forwarded to the Government should be returned to the States and their 5 per cent. bonds deposited with the Government to the amount of the currency to be apportioned to them.

The exchange of currency as proposed would certainly be made without deranging in the slightest degree the business of the country, and the purchase of the State bonds by the banks and the exchange of them for their United States bonds would also be made without inconvenience and without interfering with the business of the country. It is true that it would take time, perhaps some years of time, to complete these operations, but what are a few years of time in the life of a nation, especially when there will be results of incalculable value to the entire nation?

Second. Is the proposed plan of currency and relief to the States constitutional?

What is the power now exercised by the Government over the currency? It has created corporations in almost every State in the Union, and authorized them to issue a currency, which currency is signed by their own officers, and countersigned by the Register and Treasurer of the United States. They require these corporations to secure this currency by a deposit with the Government of the bonds of the nation, and they allow these corporations to draw the interest on these bonds. Would it not be equally constitutional if the Government should require the national banks to deposit with it the bonds of the States, or any other bonds, as security for their issues? And would it not be equally constitutional if, instead of the currency being issued by the banks, and countersigned by the officers of the Government, it should be issued directly by the Government, and handed over to the banks? There cannot be a doubt that with such changes in our currency system it would still be constitutional.

Now if it is constitutional to create corporations and give to them the benefit of a currency to be issued by or to them, and secured by a pledge of bonds, State or national, is it not equally constitutional to give State corporations already in existence the benefit of a currency to be issued to them upon a pledge of bonds, State or national?

As to the constitutional power of the States to receive the interest on their bonds proposed to be deposited, if it be constitutional to allow banking corporations to receive for their own use and benefit the interest on their bonds deposited with the Government to secure their circulation, is it not equally constitutional to allow the States to receive for their own use and benefit the interest on their bonds deposited with the Government for the same purpose?

I think, therefore, that the constitutionality of the plan which I have proposed is, as a system of currency, beyond a doubt.

But let us look at it in another aspect, as a plan solely for depositing currency or money with the States for their relief. Is this constitutional? We have in the history of our Government a case, or rather action of the Government, precisely parallel; I mean in all points affecting its constitutionality. The United States many years since deposited with the States its surplus revenue then in its Treasury, subject to be called for at the pleasure of the Government. This was never regarded as unconstitutional. Why should it be regarded as unconstitutional now to deposit with or turn over to the States some millions of currency as proposed? It is true that the surplus revenue was subject to be called for at pleasure; so would the proceeds of the bonds which the States would deposit with the Government be subject to be called for at pleasure at any time after the bonds should become due. If the action of the Government depositing its surplus revenue with the States is constitutional, the action proposed of depositing its currency with the State or apportioning it to them, which is the same in effect, must be equally constitutional.

Third. What are the advantages in the proposed change of currency?

By making the currency exclusively a national one, Government alone would be bound to redeem it. The banks would no longer have a currency to redeem, and consequently in time of specie payment they would not be obliged to curtail their loans and oppress their debtors in order to protect their currency, but could loan their money as freely at such times any other money-lenders. They would also have a very salutary power over their depositors. During our recent panic our national banks were in the same condition as all banks would be that are merely banks of discount and deposit; for payment of specie being suspended, they had no currency to protect. And what did we witness? A combination of the banks in all our principal cities to prevent their currency being drained from them by their frightened depositors, thus enabling the banks to protect the business men of the community when they most needed their aid.

Fixing the amount of the currency and throwing restrictions around the power of changing it gives stability to the currency, and no feature or any system of currency is more important than this; for stability in currency gives stability to values and this prevents their fluctuation, which when very great or very sudden always ends in wide-spread ruin.

The system proposed not only would give stability to the volume of the currency, but would give stability to the system itself, for each one of the States and all its citizens would be deeply and directly interested in and benefited by the system, and we should witness but few efforts for a change and probably never a serious effort to re-establish our old State-bank system of currency.

But the important advantages of the system proposed are its relief to the reconstructed States, its benefits to the holders of their bonds, and its ample provision for the education of the children of all the States.

The amount of additional United States currency to be issued under this system would be about $400,000,000. This would buy largely upward of four hundred millions of State bonds; for many of the bonds would be bought at less than par.

The amount of bonds bought would be withdrawn from their present holders, canceled, and returned to the States. And the national Government would hold in their place $400,000,000 of the bonds of the State, the payment of which would probably never be called for. The interest on these bonds would be 5 per cent. This interest would be paid over, not to the present holders of the State bonds, not to the Government, but to the States for the education of their children.

The advantages of the plan proposed to the tax-payers of the South would be, that they would be relieved of a large amount of their indebtedness by their bonds being bought up for them below their par value; the holders of these bonds would be benefited by having a large amount of these bonds paid which are now almost worthless; the remainder held by them would be rapidly advanced in value, and their eventual payment secured.

All the States would be benefited by the virtual payment of $400,000,000 of their debts, and by the immediate reduction in interest 1 per cent. on that amount of their indebtedness.

But the children of the nation would perhaps have the richest share of the blessings flowing from the plan proposed. The interest upon the $400,000,000 of bonds deposited with the Government would be, at 5 per cent., $20,000,000. This munificent sum would be annually distributed among all the children of the States for their education. This would come to them not from taxation, but from the interest on bonds of the States, which interest now goes to their creditors, and coming from this source it would enable the States to reduce taxes levied and to be levied for schools $20,000,000 annually.

Contrast these results with the present operation of our currency. The entire interest upon the bonds deposited by the national banks now goes to the wealthy stockholders of those banks, and not to the children, rich or poor, of the nation. And for their education the parents of these children have to be taxed $20,000,000 annually.

S. WATSON.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin, for ten days; to Mr. WALLS, for three days; to Mr. PLATT, of Virginia, for one week; to Mr. PLATT, of New York, for three days; and to Mr. SCUDDER, of New Jersey, for three weeks.

JOHN HAMILTON.

On motion of Mr. GUNCKEL, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of John Hamilton, who was an applicant for a pension to the Forty-first Congress.

And then, on motion of Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont, (at four o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BLOUNT: The petition of A. C. Davenport, to be compensated for services as deputy collector and abstract and debenture clerk at the custom-house, Savannah, Georgia, in 1854, during the prevalence of the cholera, to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee: The petition of Mrs. S. T. Palmer, widow of Dr. R. H. Palmer, late surgeon Eighth Tennessee Cavalry, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CLARK, of New Jersey: The petition of Carl Baum, for an amendment of the patent laws so that his invention for propelling boats and rafts on canals by steam, without disturbing the water, may be free to all, to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. WILSON, of Maryland: the petition of Samuel Hambleton, Edward Lloyd, and others, for the erection of a light-house on Bloody Point Bar, the southernmost point of Kent Island, in Chesapeake Bay, to the Committee on Commerce.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, May 14, 1874.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore, (at eleven o'clock a. m.) The Senate will come to order. The Secretary will count the Senators present, and ascertain if there be a quorum present.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I move that the Secretary be directed to call the roll, and then we shall ascertain who are present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Let the roll be called.

The Secretary called the roll; and the following Senators answered to their names:

PRESENT—Messrs. Carpenter, Conover, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Hamlin, Merrimon, Mitchell, Ramsey, Saulsbury, Scott, Wadleigh, Washburn, and Windom—13.

Mr. WINDOM. I desire to say that the Committee on Appropriations have leave to sit during the sessions of the Senate, which accounts for the absence of all the members of that committee, Messrs. MORRILL of Maine, SPRAGUE, WEST, SARGENT, ALLISON, STEVENSON, DAVIS, and DORSEY.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I desire to say in behalf of my colleague [Mr. CRAGIN] that his wife is sick, and he is necessarily detained on that account.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think there is another word of general explanation which ought to be made, that meeting at eleven o'clock as we do, probably a very large number of Senators are now in the building in their committee-rooms. If they had been apprised that we would not do business until a quorum was actually present, I have no doubt there are many Senators in the committee-rooms who would be present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The roll-call shows but thirteen Senators present, not a quorum. The first rule provides:

> The Presiding Officer having taken the chair, and a quorum being present, the Journal of the preceding day shall be read, to the end that any mistake may be corrected that shall be made in the entries.

The attention of the Chair having been called to that subject by Senators yesterday, the Chair has taken the course he has this morning.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Which I entirely agree to; and I ask that my name be entered as present.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, I am here.

Mr. CONKLING. Has an opportunity been afforded to Senators to answer this morning as to their presence?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The roll has once been called for that purpose.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to have my name entered present.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will put in an appearance, although I am very busy with an interesting newspaper at this moment. I will answer to my name.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I am present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's name will be recorded.

Mr. COOPER. I am present.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I hope my answer will be taken. I am now here.

Mr. SPENCER. I am here.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to say for the members of the Committee on Commerce that they were in session in their room and came down meaning to come in promptly at eleven o'clock.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I wish to say the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds are examining witnesses, and the members are necessarily absent.

Mr. TIPTON. Yesterday morning I was one of four who were here at the opening of the session. Having been absent this morning, that balances the account. [Laughter.]

Mr. GORDON. I desire to say that I was in the room of the Committee on Commerce until this moment.

Mr. GILBERT. I wish my name entered as present.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Committee on Commerce have just adjourned, and all the members are now present, I believe, including myself.

Mr. SAULSBURY. If it is in order, I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at twelve o'clock to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No quorum being present, no motion can be received except to adjourn or send for absentees.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, and ask that the yeas and nays may be ordered on that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No motion is in order except a motion to adjourn or to send for absentees.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then I move to adjourn, and ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It would be better to have a call of the Senate.

Mr. CHANDLER. I withdraw the motion to adjourn and move that there be a call of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CONKLING, (when Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN'S name was called.) I wish to state that the Senator from New Jersey was compelled to leave the city temporarily upon an urgent errand.

The roll-call having been concluded, the following Senators had answered to their names:

PRESENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Bogy, Boreman, Boutwell, Buckingham, Carpenter, Chandler, Conkling, Conover, Davis, Dennis, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Gilbert, Gordon, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Ingalls, Kelly, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Oglesby, Patterson, Pratt, Ramsey, Sargent, Saulsbury, Schurz, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Sprague, Tipton, Wadleigh, Washburn, Windom, and Wright—40.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty Senators have answered to their names. There being a quorum of Senators present, the Secretary will read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings.

The journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas, presented the petition of Pottawatomie Indians, praying for payment of the award of the commissioners under the treaty of August 7, 1868; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. PRATT presented the petition of Mary W. Jones, of Fairfax County, Virginia, widow of Commodore Thomas Ap C. Jones, praying that her pension may be increased from thirty to fifty dollars per month; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2345) for the relief of John Clinton, postmaster at Brownsville, Tennessee, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a joint resolution (H. R. No. 95) authorizing the Postmaster-General to perfect title to certain real estate obtained from John W. Norton, a defaulter to the postal Money-order Bureau, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. RAMSEY. The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, who were by a resolution of the Senate "instructed to consider the expediency of providing a further convenience in correspondence known as the 'letter-writer,' with a one-cent stamp, being a new article of stationery adapted for a letter, circular, and newspaper wrapper," have instructed me to ask to be discharged from its further consideration, and I further ask that the communication from the Postmaster-General on this subject be printed.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. PRATT, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Ebenezer W. Brady, late chaplain of the One hundred and sixteenth Regiment Ohio Volunteers, praying to be allowed a pension, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 814) granting a pension to Ebenezer W. Brady.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. PRATT also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 763) explaining the intent and meaning of the fourth section of an act entitled "An act in addition to certain acts granting bounty lands to certain officers and soldiers who have been engaged in the military service of the United States," reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the following petitions, reported adversely thereon, and asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to:

The petition of Ben Alsop, of Owensborough, Kentucky, praying for a pension for services in the war of 1812 as a substitute for his father, Bob Alsop, of King George County, Virginia;

The petition of citizens of Wisconsin, praying that a pension be granted to Abner P. Phelps, for services rendered in the war of 1812;

The petition of citizens of the United States, praying that pensions may be allowed to all soldiers, or the heirs of such, who were mustered into the service during the war of 1812;

The petition of soldiers of the war of 1812, praying to be allowed pensions at the rate of eight dollars per month;

The petition of certain citizens of Vermont, soldiers of the war of 1812, and who served less than sixty days, praying an amendment of the act of February 14, 1871, so as to include all soldiers and widows who have received land warrants under the acts of 1853 and 1855 in its benefits;

The petition of Joshua Herrick, praying to be allowed a pension;

The petition of citizens of the United States, praying for the passage of a law granting pensions to soldiers of the war of 1812 who served less than sixty days;

The petition of Sarah Graffam Glover, of Maine, praying a pension as widow of Captain James Graffam, for services rendered by him in the war of 1812;

The petition of Catharine Middleton, widow of John D. Middleton, praying to be allowed a pension for services rendered by him in the war of 1812;

The petition of Randolph Mott, praying to be allowed a pension for services rendered in the defense of Fort McHenry in the war of 1812;

The petition of John Parrish, of Michigan, praying to be allowed a pension for services rendered the United States in the war of 1812;

The petition of Israel Ober, of Kansas, praying a pension for services rendered in the war of 1812;

The petition of James L. Delong, a soldier of the war of 1812, praying to be allowed a pension;

The petition of Mrs. Susan Leach, of Blair County, Pennsylvania, praying for a pension;

The petition of John D. Clark, praying a pension for services in the war of 1812;

The petition of Benjamin Blanchard, praying to be allowed a pension;

The petition of Catherine E. Small, widow of Colonel Jacob Small, of the Maryland militia in the war of 1812, praying for a pension;

The petition of George Townsend, for a pension for services rendered in 1812, he having served fifty-eight days, or within two days of the time required by the law;

The petition of Jonathan S. Taylor, praying to be allowed a pension;

The petition of Ruth Vaux, a citizen of Kansas, asking to be allowed a pension on account of the services of her husband, Thomas Hatton, in the war of 1812;

The petition of J. C. N. Robertson, a citizen of De Soto County, Mississippi, a soldier of the war of 1812, praying that his name may be placed upon the pension-roll and permitted to draw his pension from the passage of the act of 1871, allowing pensions to the surviving soldiers of the war of 1812;

The memorial of General Henry Raymond and Colonel Abraham Dally, of New York, asking Congress to so amend the pension laws as to allow a pension to all honorably discharged soldiers of the war of 1812, and to the widows of such soldiers, without regard to the time of marriage;

The petition of Jacob K. Marshall, praying to be allowed a pension; and

The memorial of Mary Durang, widow of Chares Durang, a soldier of the war of 1812, who states that the vicissitudes of the war procrastinated her marriage until the year 1816, and that she is excluded from a pension by the general law, and praying for the passage of a special act granting her a pension.

Mr. PRATT also, from the same committee, who were by a resolution of the Senate instructed to inquire into the expediency and the justice of placing all surviving soldiers of the war of 1812, who have been honorably discharged, upon the pension-roll, irrespective of the duration of their services, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. PRATT. The ground of these adverse reports, Mr. President, on these various petitions consists in the fact that a majority of the Committee on Pensions directed me, as its chairman, some days since to report back the House bill without amendment which provides a pension at the rate of eight dollars per month for all the surviving soldiers of the war of 1812 without any reference whatever to the period of their service. The bill also provides for the widows of all soldiers of the war of 1812 who were married previous to the year 1850. There is a further provision in the bill which I reported from the committee, that all those soldiers of the war of 1812 who were upon the pension-roll previous to the act of Congress passed in the year 1862, and who were dropped from the roll in consequence of their adhesion to the cause of the rebellion, shall be restored to the pension-roll, and draw their pension from the period of their suspension.

Mr. SHERMAN. Is that bill pending now?

Mr. PRATT. No, sir. I was stating simply the ground on which the committee directed me to report adversely to these various petitions, because this bill supersedes the necessity of acting on these individual cases, and I was stating the various provisions of the bill which the committee directed me to report. I believe there is still one other petition that I have not reported upon. It is the claim of Mrs. Janette Scott West, who prays for a pension on the ground of her being a widow of a soldier of the war of 1812. She is comprehended in the benefits of this general bill, and the committee therefore ask to be discharged from the consideration of that petition.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Pensions if it is his intention to press to a vote at the present session the bill restoring pensioners who were dropped under the act of 1862? I make that inquiry because at the last session of Congress a bill came from the House similar in its provisions, and I made personal effort myself to get that bill acted upon toward the close of the session and failed. I desire to know if the chairman of the Committee on Pensions intends to press that bill at the present session, because I think it a very proper bill, and one that is demanded by the equity and justice of the case. I hope it will not be allowed to stay on the Calendar without being pressed to a vote at the present session.

Mr. PRATT. In response to the inquiry of the honorable Senator from Delaware, I will say that I reported the bill by the direction of the committee, although I disapproved of some of the features of the bill, and whenever it comes up I will take occasion to move certain amendments. It is my purpose, of course, whenever I can have the ear of the Senate, to call up the bill for consideration. It is proper for any one who feels an interest in the bill to move at any time that the bill be taken up; but as chairman of the committee I shall, whenever an opportunity occurs, call it up for consideration.

Mr. MERRIMON. I wish to ask the chairman of the Committee on Pensions a question. I desire to ask the Senator from Indiana what, if any, provision is made for the soldiers of the Mexican war in the bill to which he has referred?

Mr. PRATT. There is no provision whatever made for soldiers of the Mexican war. The bill relates exclusively to the soldiers of the war of 1812.

Mr. MERRIMON. Is there any bill reported in behalf of the soldiers of the Mexican war?

Mr. PRATT. There has not been at the present session.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 321) authorizing appointments and promotions in the Medical and Ordnance Departments of the Army of the United States, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. BOUTWELL, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 675) to relieve ships and vessels from compulsory pilot fees in certain cases, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Herman Lamprecht, praying to be allowed a pension, reported adversely thereon, and asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. SAULSBURY, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2089) for the relief of Mrs. Louisa P. Molloy, reported it without amendment.

Mr. BOREMAN, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2800) for the relief of Benjamin Crawford, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. GORDON, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1206) for the relief of Charles J. Sands, of Brooklyn, New York, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3073) to amend section 19 of the act approved August 18, 1856, entitled "An act to regulate the diplomatic and consular systems of the United States," reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. BOGY, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 294) for the relief of Joab Bagley, reported it without amendment.

Mr. MERRIMON, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 407) for the relief of Enos J. Pennypacker, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 536) granting a pension to Livinia Ingraham, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Abraham Van Assum, late of Company B, Fifty-first New York Volunteers, praying Congress to pass a special act giving him a pension commensurate with the disability under which he is now suffering from wounds received at the battle of the Wilderness, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. PATTERSON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1791) granting a pension to Augustus L. Yaeger, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Mary P. Jarvis, of Geneva, Illinois, widow of the late Commodore Joseph R. Jarvis, praying to be allowed a pension, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of John Colahan, late of Company L, Third Pennsylvania Cavalry, praying to be allowed a pension and paid arrears of pension, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of David F. Taylor, of Stuart's Draft, Virginia, late of Company M, Ninth Indiana Cavalry Volunteers, praying to be granted a pension from June 30, 1865, to September 30, 1872, at the rate of five dollars per month, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of citizens of New Jersey, praying that a pension may be granted Rhoda Hart, on account of services rendered by her son, Lewis Hart, late corporal Company C, Thirteenth Connecticut Volunteers, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

FERRY-BOAT A. BURTON.

Mr. SPENCER. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3139) for the relief of the owners of the steam ferry-boat A. Burton, to report it favorably, and ask for its present consideration.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why should that be taken out from the general law?

Mr. SPENCER. The Senator from Iowa has charge of the papers and will explain.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be considered as subject to objection after an explanation.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to say a word, and then if the bill is objected to I will not insist on it now. This ferry-boat has been constructed and is now lying at the wharf and cannot be used. It seems that the owners of the boat made a contract for its construction, and the contractors applied to a large iron establishment to furnish the boilers. There was a strike of the hands and they were unable to furnish them. Then the owners were compelled to go to works in Cincinnati and get the iron, they being ignorant of the fact that by the thirty-seventh section of the act of 1871 it was necessary that there should be this stamping upon it. The iron was furnished, and the boilers made, the boat constructed; and when the inspector came to inspect the work it was found that this stamping was not upon it, and he could not inspect. It was impossible that the Secretary of the Treasury could relieve the parties because of this provision in the statute, and therefore the matter was referred to Congress. The bill has passed the House and passed the committee here, and they are quite willing that there shall be an inspection to ascertain if this iron does answer in all respects the strength required by the statute, the only difference being that there is not the required stamp upon it. There is no loss to the revenue.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then why not say to all men that if they do not know what the law is they may build without regard to it?

Mr. WRIGHT. For the reason that this is a case where the work has been already done, and the boat constructed and ready to work.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which directs the proper inspectors of steam-vessels in and for the Galena district to inspect the steam ferry-boat A. Burton, at Nauvoo, Illinois, and to grant certificate and license which shall enable the owners of the steamer to use the same as a ferry boat, notwithstanding the fact that the iron in the boiler on board the boat has no tensile strength stamped upon it, and notwithstanding no stamp at all is found upon the same, if upon due inspection and test the boiler is found to be of good material, properly constructed, and safe, and the vessel otherwise constructed and equipped according to law.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SHIPPING-COMMISSIONERS ACT.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3160) in reference to the operations of the shipping-commissioners act, approved June 7, 1872, to report it back with an amendment, and ask for its present consideration. It is a short bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BOREMAN. I do not object to the consideration of the bill, but I should like to have some explanation of it.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill which declares that none of the provisions of an act entitled "An act to authorize the appointment of shipping-commissioners by the several circuit courts of the United States, to superintend the shipping and discharge of seamen engaged in merchant-ships belonging to the United States, and for the further protection of seamen," shall apply to sail or steam-vessels engaged in the coastwise trade or in the lake-going trade, touching at foreign ports or otherwise, or in the trade between the United States and the British North American possessions, or in any case where the seamen are by custom or agreement entitled to participate in the profits or result of a cruise or voyage.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. There is very little to be said about it. The shipping commissioners act requires the shipping commissioner to see that all men who are shipped on board any vessel shall sign certain shipping articles, and that is to be done before the shipping commissioner. Those articles require a statement of the voyage, the probable length of the voyage, and the position which the seaman shall occupy on board the vessel, the rate of wages, and many other things which go to make up a perfect contract between the seaman and the shipper. It also provides that the agreement between the seaman and master shall be signed in the presence of the commissioner and a certificate made to that effect, that when the vessel returns the seamen shall be paid in the presence of the shipping commissioner, and the shipping commissioner shall see that the agreement is properly carried out. It also provides penalties for taking men to sea without such an agreement, and obliges the captain to have a copy of the agreement posted up in a particular place so that the men on board the ship may see it.

The act provides that this bill shall apply to all vessels running even on short voyages, from Maine, for instance, to New Brunswick, where a vessel may be engaged only two or three days and sometimes only one day in going and returning; and it also applies in a certain sense to the coasting trade and requires a fee to be paid to the commissioner. It is thought to be onerous to the vessels which make short voyages; and this bill is to relieve men engaged in those short voyages and in domestic trade from these requirements of the existing law.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Senator from Connecticut has stated, I believe, the matter very fully; but still I wish to say to my friend from West Virginia that this is a trouble which we labor under in Maine particularly. Vessels sailing from Eastport across Saint Andrew's Bay, a distance of ten miles, are brought within the provisions of the law as it now stands, that being coastwise and not foreign trade. It never was designed to apply to those vessels; and this takes them out of it.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Commerce was in line 9 after the words "coastwise trade" to insert "except the coastwise trade between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended; and the amendment was concurred in.

It was ordered that the amendment be engrossed and the bill read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

CHANGE OF NAME OF A SCHOONER.

Mr. GORDON. The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 793) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to change the name of the schooner Jennie Spear to that of Santa Rosa, have instructed me to report it back without amendment.

Mr. HAMLIN. It will take but a single moment to pass that bill, and I ask that it be acted on at once.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. INGALLS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 815) in regard to instruments in writing required to be stamped by previous acts of Congress; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CONOVER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 816) to change the laws relating to district courts in Florida, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 817) for the relief of the children of John A. Tardy, late major United States Engineer Corps; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HOWE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 818) to authorize the settlement of the claims of the several States for 5 per cent. of the value of Indian reservations; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

TRIAL OF F. A. DOCKRAY IN CUBA.

Mr. CONOVER. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States is hereby requested, if in his opinion compatible with the public interest, to lay before the Senate the correspondence between the Government and our consular agents in Cuba and the Spanish government in reference to the arrest, imprisonment, and trial of F. A. Dockray, a citizen of the United States, for alleged political offenses committed in Cuba.

Mr. CONKLING. I think that had better lie over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over under the rule.

Mr. CONKLING. I think it will be still better to have it go to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CONOVER. I have no objection to having it lie over so that I can call it up at any time. I prefer not to have it referred to the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be laid over.

PHILIP S. WALES.

Mr. CRAGIN. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 745) for the relief of Philip S. Wales, medical inspector in the United States Navy.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear that explained, to know whether it ought to be objected to or not.

Mr. CRAGIN. Surgeon Wales was detailed to establish a hospital during the engagement prior to the taking of New Orleans, and by mistake his name was not borne on the ship's roll. This prize-money is about to be distributed. The bill involves a small amount, four or five hundred dollars, for this officer; and it is agreed on all hands by the Department and those interested that he is entitled to a share equitably.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The prize-money has not as yet been distributed?

Mr. CRAGIN. It will be in the course of two or three weeks.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But he will not be paid out of the Treasury, but only out of the prize-money, like the others, if the bill passes now?

Mr. CRAGIN. Exactly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I have no objection.

The bill was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the Secretary of the Navy to place on the prize-list of the United States steamship Hartford the name of Philip S. Wales, with the rank of surgeon in the Navy, as being entitled to receive his share of the proceeds of the prize-money awarded to the fleet under command of Admiral Farragut, to which fleet Surgeon Wales was attached during the operations resulting in the capture of New Orleans in the month of May, 1862.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

Mr. BAYARD. Yesterday I asked and obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the Senate the petition and papers of Mrs. Frances A. McCauley, stating at the same time in reply to a question of the Chair that I believed no adverse report had been submitted in the case. I have since ascertained that an adverse report was submitted in the case, and I therefore desire that the papers handed to me may be restored to the files of the Senate. My statement was made on misinformation from the person who applied for the withdrawal.

STREET RAILWAY IN WASHINGTON.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There was a bill passed over on the last call of the Calendar on account of the absence of the Senator from Vermont which I ask may be taken up now. It is the bill (H. R. No. 2102) to incorporate the Capitol, North O Street and South Washington Railway Company.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will not object if the bill can be passed without debate; but otherwise I must insist on proceeding with the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the bill?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I shall object to the bill unless it can be so modified as that this road shall not run on Massachusetts avenue. I was not here when the reading of the bill began and have not had time to examine it, but I perceive this road is to run a certain portion of the distance on Massachusetts avenue. I think it important to keep that avenue, the finest unquestionably in the city, free from these railroads.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the bill will come up regularly to-morrow morning, I am willing that it shall go over informally now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the bill being laid over informally until to-morrow morning? The Chair hears none.

The morning hour having expired, the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 733) relating to evidence in the courts of the District of Columbia; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3237) to authorize the First National Bank of Seneca to change its name.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 2989) to authorize the trustees of the Massachusetts Museum of Fine Arts to import and retain for two years certain works of art free of duty; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

FREE BANKING—THE CURRENCY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1572) to amend the several acts providing a national currency and to establish free banking, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. WRIGHT to the amendment of the Committee on Finance, in section 8, line 8, to strike out "50" and insert "25;" so as to make the clause read:

It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to retire an amount of United States notes equal to 25 per cent. of the circulating notes so issued, &c.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, the bill reported from the Committee on Finance proposed the retirement of 50 per cent. of United States notes in proportion to 100 per cent. of bank currency, circulating notes, that might be issued under this law; in other words, that for every two dollars of national-bank notes issued one dollar of greenbacks should be retired, and this process should continue until the volume of United States notes had been reduced to $300,000,000.

In the first place, I may say that I should be assenting to what I believe to be a false fact should I agree that the present lawful volume of United States Treasury notes was more than $356,000,000. It is, I believe, a fact capable of establishment in any court of justice in this country, capable of ascertainment by any tribunal in this country should the question be submitted to it, by any jury of twelve honest, sensible men in the country, that by the laws of this country as at present existing the lawful volume of United States Treasury notes is $356,000,000, and no more. I do not care now to repeat what has been said before here by me and others on this subject excepting to say this: that in order to find supposed lawful warrant for saying that the proper volume of this currency is $382,000,000, the plainest meaning of English words has to be entirely overlooked and denied. A merchant, a banker, any citizen who transacts banking or mercantile business, would be very much surprised when his checks had been paid and canceled and a bank-hammer had been driven through them and they had been returned to his desk, to find that his agent or his clerk could reissue those notes and they could be called good cause of action against him in the hands of the holder; and yet that is just what was done with the notes of the United States Government. Under law the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to retire and cancel them. He reported month by month, year after year, that those notes had been retired and canceled. There has not been a statement of the public debt of the United States published from 1866 to this day—I will not say to this day, but until the fall of 1872—which did not declare that the public non-interest-bearing debt of the United States had been lessened to the amount that Mr. McCulloch's cancellations stated. Mr. BOUTWELL published it, Mr. Richardson published it, Mr. McCulloch published it; and I wish here further to state, as some paper was brought into the Senate a little obscure in its book-keeping phrase, purporting to be an abstract from the Treasury books showing that Mr. McCulloch had issued and reissued at his will these notes which under the law he was directed to retire and cancel, that not believing it possible that such a power could have been intrusted to him—the power to make money plenty or scarce, the power to produce stringency at his will—not believing that such power could ever have been permitted to any man in this country, much less to a Secretary watched by so hostile and adverse a Congress as this was to him and the person under whose administration he was serving, I have asked from intelligent men in the Treasury Department whether there ever was a reissue of any of these United States notes by Secretary McCulloch during his term, and a reissue after they had been reported as having been retired and canceled, and the answer is that there never was. And I have seen it stated elsewhere, in a place to which I am not by our parliamentary rules permitted to refer, that Mr. McCulloch had during his administration undertaken to trifle at his own caprice and pleasure with the financial interests of this country by issuing and reissuing these notes at his will. Sir, I think I am authorized to say that such is not the truth; that when he said these $44,000,000 of Treasury notes were retired and canceled he gave the words their natural and only signification, that they were canceled, that they ceased to exist, that they were dead paper, and not money for use at all.

I know that in these latter days of straitened necessities for argument, all sorts of pretexts, all sorts of excuses, all sorts of so-called decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, that never touched the subject, have been brought up to justify the emission of $26,000,000 by the present Secretary of the Treasury, and they have dubbed this $44,000,000 with a new name; they have called it a reserve, a name that never was applicable to it. It was no such thing as a reserve. It was no more a reserve than are my individually paid checks through which the bank-hammer has been driven, and which now lie as waste paper in my office, a reserve of mine. I might as well speak of these checks paid and canceled as a reserve, as for the Secretary of the Treasury or anybody else to talk of the $44,000,000 as a reserve. It was a misnomer invented for the purpose of misleading, and it does mislead the public mind; and the people of this country ought to know, and they ought to face the danger of the fact, that a Secretary of the Treasury, without distinct and clear warrant of the law, has undertaken to reissue notes which were retired and canceled under operation of law, and up to this day claims to play fast and loose with the business interests of every man engaged in commerce throughout the country by making money plenty or scarce at his pleasure. I confess that I have been amazed at the apathy with which the public have viewed this thing. I have here expressed my disgust, my abhorrence, for the continuation of a system of finance which has no actual value for its basis, the basis of which is credit, the basis of which is public confidence alone, without a particle of value originally. It would be as wise for a merchant to send his ship to sea without rudder or compass as for a nation to embark on finance without having actual value as a standard of the dealings of its citizens. I cannot but believe that when this question is sensibly and calmly submitted to the judgment of the American people, their self-interest, their simple common sense, will show them the great injury that has been inflicted upon them by abolishing a standard of value from the money of the people. They would understand the operation of the abolition of standards of weights and measures; if the shop-keeper was not called upon to give them the pound when they asked for a pound weight, if he was not called upon to give thirty-six inches of cloth when they paid for a yard, they would appreciate the danger of dealing with any man in the absence of a standard of weights and measures. When they come to think that here is the standard of all standards, the standard of value, that which is more important than the weight or measure, the liquid or linear measurement of anything, will they not understand that it is this necessary ingredient of honesty, of fair dealing, the ascertainment of debts, which has been abolished by the action of Congress, and which Congress still refuses in the face of this broad necessity to take one single, even short, step to return to?

Now, Mr. President, my objection to this bill as it stands, the reason why I cannot vote for the measure reported by the committee, is that it has, so far as this section is concerned, a tendency to expansion of the paper volume, a tendency in a direction that makes a return to specie payments more and more difficult. It is, in other words, a step in the wrong direction; and if we are not to take a step in the right direction, I want to take no step at all, but to stand still until the intelligence, the sober second thought of the American people, shall demand a restoration of a standard of value as the basis of public money.

Let us see the effect, because the principle which I object to is simply intensified by the amendment of the Senator from Iowa. The committee report that for every two dollars of national-bank currency issued, Treasury notes shall be retired to the amount of one dollar. Not satisfied with that, the Senator from Iowa desires that four dollars of national-bank currency shall be issued, and for them but one dollar of the Treasury notes shall be retired. Under the plan of the committee $164,000,000 would be added to the national-bank currency, and under that $82,000,000 of the greenbacks would be retired. We should then have $300,000,000 left of Federal Treasury notes, and we should have $518,000,000 of banking currency, making together $818,000,000 of paper money afloat. Under the proposition of the Senator from Iowa we should have $328,000,000 of banking paper currency added to the present volume and a diminution at the same time of $82,000,000 of greenbacks, so that we should have $300,000,000 of greenbacks in circulation at the end of this issue of $328,000,000 of the national-bank currency, or $682,000,000 of national-bank currency, making a total paper volume in this country of $982,000,000. This would be the plain arithmetical result of the proposition of the Senator from Iowa. The proposition of the committee would leave us at the time of the operation of this section with $818,000,000. The other proposes to have $982,000,000.

Mr. President, I presume that the theory of retirement pro rata of the United States Treasury notes is to reduce the volume of greenbacks to such a proportion that the Treasury may be enabled to resume specie payments. That I presume is the theory under which these greenbacks are to be retired. Now, suppose that while they are being retired this remarkable issue of bank currency goes on, and two or three years from this time the Treasury, having but $300,000,000 of paper money outstanding and having a sufficient accumulation of gold, should feel enabled to resume specie payments and proposes to resume specie payments, then what becomes of the national banks? The United States Treasury may be in a condition to resume specie payments; but where will the banks be when they are called upon for specie? Where will they be with their $682,000,000 of paper issues? It is very easy to say that we in legislating here should consider the United States Treasury alone, that we should consider the national credit alone; but, Mr. President, we cannot look at things in that way. We are bound to consider the entire business interests of this country in the laws we pass affecting its finances. This banking system has been created by act of Congress. To do it you have broken down the system of State banks completely. Under the forms of taxation you have compelled and coerced their stockholders to put their capital into national banking institutions; and you cannot in justice to those institutions, you cannot in justice to the business of the country, you cannot in justice to those citizens whose capital has been embarked in these national banks, undertake to frame a scheme by which the Government of the United States may return to specie payments without regarding the capacities of your own creatures, these banks, to do the same thing. I am not an admirer, I am not an advocate of the present system of national banks. I have declared here, and I now declare again, that I do not believe the creation of this banking system was fairly within the purview of the constitutional powers of Congress. I believe the system of distributing currency had better be left to the people themselves, left to the States who are to create their own corporations to carry out the system of handling and distributing currency—known as banking. They know their own wants better than Congress can know them; and I do consider that in view of our experience of the past ten years, if you left the question to the capital of the country it would ask that it should be discharged from the power of the Secretary of the Treasury or of Congress and be remitted to the State charters under which banks conducted their business, regulated by the laws of self-interest and the laws of the States.

But nevertheless here it is; the banks exist; they exist by law; and I for one would do nothing which in any degree should show a disregard of the interest of the national-bank stockholder any more than the interest of any other citizen. I would let him know that I desired that system not to be continued. I would give an opportunity for capital to exert itself in other directions. I would strike out your tax on State-bank issues, and I would permit them to exercise free banking under the laws of the States, subject only to the laws of self-preservation and the great requirement of the Constitution of the United States, that nothing but gold and silver should be made a legal tender for payment of debts.

But under this plan of the committee, and still more under the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa, you may perhaps get your Federal Treasury in a condition possibly to resume specie payments by the reduction of those notes for which the Treasury is directly responsible; but when you have done that, you have made it by the action of this bill impossible for the banks to follow. You would create just as much distress and wretchedness; the bankruptcy would be just as wide-spread, whether it were through the national banks' failure to pay their notes or through the Treasury's failure to pay its notes. We can produce the distress in either way we please; and I therefore can favor no system which does not look at least, if it does not step, toward the restoration of a money of value as the basis for our public debt in all its shapes. And when I see this pretext—I do not use the word offensively—of returning to specie payment by diminishing the volume of United States Treasury notes to $300,000,000, putting them under control and approximating them to the specie-paying power of the Government in the course of a couple of years, accompanied by another measure that completely cuts the throat of that so far as the business of the country is concerned, I stand amazed. It is giving one dollar with the left hand, and then taking two away with the right. It is preparing to make that possible which almost all members of the body have expressed themselves as desiring, (I mean a return to specie payment,) and accompanying it by a measure that completely dashes all hopes of it. How can we undertake to say that specie payments shall be the law of this land with all this authorized currency of the national banks out and no means of redeeming it? Can we undertake to condemn them to bankruptcy? As I said, the ruin of our people, the distress of our merchants, can be accomplished just as much by the failure of the national banks as by the failure of the Treasury to pay specie; and therefore it is that not only do I not agree to the scheme of the committee to retire 50 per cent. of this money when you are issuing 100 per cent. of national-bank notes, but a fortiori, if there has been anything in the reasons I have given for opposing that, I must necessarily oppose the amendment of the Senator from Iowa. That simply intensifies every objection that I think there is to the section; and therefore it is that I trust the Senate will understand and the country will understand that so far as this section is concerned—I am not speaking of the bill in all its sections as the Senator from Illinois did yesterday; I do not wish to fatigue the Senate by my criticisms on it—I merely take this one feature by itself, and I submit to the Senate that it is a scheme of expansion; and not only a scheme of expansion, but it is one that is peculiarly risky, peculiarly fraught with danger to this very national-bank system. You are encouraging the banks to issue more paper when you are preparing yourselves to issue less; and if you do issue less and prepare yourselves to redeem that by giving gold for that which has no value at present, but is a mere matter of public credit, you are preventing them from pursuing the same path with yourselves. I hope that there can be no doubt that this amendment of the Senator from Iowa will not be agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN. Mr. President, I desire to understand as well as I can from the committee some features connected with this bill in order that I may know how to govern my vote upon it. I confess that from the limited examination I have given to it there are some points in connection with it which I do not fully understand. I notice that the latter part of the second section proposes to require the banks to retain a portion of the gold that they receive as interest upon their bonds as a reserve. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee if he proposes to follow this bill with any other bill requiring the government to retain a portion of its gold also as a reserve for the time at which it proposes to resume specie payments?

Mr. SHERMAN. There is no such provision in this bill, nor is it worth while to make any such provision for the accumulation of coin in the Treasury until we have a surplus revenue, which, unfortunately, we have not now.

Mr. WASHBURN. I suppose the object of the committee in requiring the banks to retain a portion of their reserve in coin is in order that they may be better fitted to prepare to resume specie payments at the date mentioned in this bill. Most certainly, no matter what the banks may do in regard to their reserves, the Government must always be in a position to have coin in its possession in order to have confidence and strength for resumption. While I do not object to this particular feature so far as the banks are concerned, yet I cannot see that any great benefit is to be derived unless the Government is also prepared to take the same step in the same direction that is required of the banks.

Mr. President, listening to the discussion upon this bill I have been struck with the great differences of opinion which exist between different Senators from the same locality. Some believe in the greenback circulation and do not believe in the national-bank circulation at all. Some do not believe in the greenback circulation, but believe in the national banks, and would do away altogether with the greenback circulation. Now, sir, so far as I am concerned, I feel in the consideration of this subject that it is not a question upon which we are to look to the interests of the banks by any means. If I could be satisfied that the best interests of the country demand that national banks should be done away with, and that the circulation should be confined to the Government and to greenbacks alone, if I believed that the business of the country and its prosperity would be promoted by so doing, I would say, let your national banks be laid aside. Whatever we can do to promote the best interests of the country and to give it new impulse and stability and courage in the present hour I would be willing to do, and I have no doubt that the majority of this body would take the same step; but the great question for us to consider is, what is the best step to be taken to bring about this result?

But, sir, before I proceed to consider that subject, there are one or two other points in the bill which have troubled me somewhat, and to which I wish to call the attention of the committee. Perhaps they will be able to explain the bill so that I shall have no difficulty about it. I see upon the eighth page that they propose so far as the national banks are concerned that the circulation which has become worn and defaced shall be returned to the city of Washington, and here, without going to the national banks, the notes shall be placed in the hands of some agents of the Government who shall destroy them. It seems to me there is a most serious objection to this feature of the bill. No national bank ought to be willing to have its notes taken possession of and destroyed without passing through its own hands. If the note or the obligation of an individual has gone forth, he wishes to know when that note or obligation is canceled. Therefore, while I agree with the committee that these defaced and worn-out notes should be taken from the circulation and destroyed, it seems to me you should not require them to be destroyed without allowing the officers of the banks to inspect and count and pass upon them in the first instance. They should not be charged with the destruction of $10,000 of their own notes, not a dollar of which have they passed upon and personally know anything in reference to. Before these notes should be destroyed every bank should inspect them and be satisfied that they are their notes and not the notes of some other bank which are destroyed and charged to them.

I know it may be said that the Comptroller and the officers here in Washington will examine into this matter. So, sir, you might say that your neighbor would examine your paper; but if you are to be held responsible for that paper and it is to be charged to you you want to know in reference to it yourself.

I also notice upon the ninth page that the bill says "the amount of the bonds on deposit for circulation shall not be reduced below $30,000." The present law, as I understand it, is that no bank shall be organized with a less amount than $50,000. Whether the committee propose to change this feature of the existing law and allow a bank to be organized with $30,000 instead of $50,000, I do not know; but another portion of the bill states that the existing law shall remain in force as it now is. I ask the chairman of the committee whether he proposes by this section to change that provision, so that a bank may organize under this bill with a capital of $30,000, or what is meant by the change here of $30,000 instead of $50,000? If the chairman says that the committee do not intend to change that feature of the law, should not the $30,000 be changed to $50,000?

Mr. SHERMAN. Since my friend has called my attention to this matter I have carefully examined the bill, and I think under the provisions of the fourth section and the sixth section, taken together, the limitations and regulations and provisions as to the amount of bonds to be held by the Treasurer are not at all changed by the bill; and this proviso was put in for the purpose of excluding a conclusion which might be drawn from the general language of the sixth section. I think myself the proviso might just as well fix the minimum amount for a bank of circulation at $50,000. That is now the law. The reason why $30,000 was inserted is, that under the present law banks without circulation may be organized upon the deposit of bonds to the amount of $30,000. If the Senator thinks it would be better to raise that minimum to $50,000, I have no objection myself to having that amendment made. The purpose was simply to leave the law stand as it is in all respects in regard to the amount of bonds to be deposited and the amount of circulation to be issued on the bonds. No bank issuing circulating notes now can have less than $30,000 of circulation, nor can it have less than $50,000 of capital; and as this limitation of $30,000 relates to the amount of bonds on deposit and not to the amount of capital stock, it would seem proper to keep in the present limitation $30,000; that is, that the amount of bonds at all times deposited shall never be less than $30,000. A bank may be organized with a capital of $50,000, and yet only have a deposit of $30,000 of bonds and a corresponding amount of circulating notes.

Mr. WASHBURN. I only wish to understand the meaning of the bill. I have no particular objection to it, but I could not understand what the object of the committee was in reference to that feature of the bill.

But, Mr. President, while I have called the attention of the committee to these particular features of the bill, they are not the greatest difficulties with which I have had to contend. I know it is said that the country is in a condition in which it is very desirable that we should do something on this subject, and I do not know but that this measure may be the best one that can be adopted for the satisfaction of all sections of the country. If I can be satisfied of that fact, I shall be most ready to second the measure; but I feel that while it may be desirable that something should be done, it is not desirable that we should take a step which may place us in a worse position than the position which we already occupy; and I say to the committee in all candor that if I can understand this bill at all I have most serious doubts in regard to the effect it would have upon the country. I do not wish to do anything here by which the business interests of the country will feel that they are in the dark in regard to the future. They have felt, so far as the standard of the currency of this country was concerned, so far as the value which regulated the currency was concerned, that the great difficulty was that it was liable to be changed by Congress at any hour, and the very fact that the standard was liable to be changed by Congress has created an uncertainty and a dread in every portion of the business community. The trouble with me about this bill is that if we pass it there will be a greater uncertainty hanging over those interests than possibly could hang over them as we are situated without any bill at the present hour.

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] yesterday asked the committee what would be the effect of this bill—would it be contraction or would it be expansion. Well did the committee say that they could not say what would be the effect of it. No man can tell what will be the effect. No business community can tell what will be the effect in the end. That the immediate effect will be contraction no one can doubt for a moment. There can be no question that when you take your 5 per cent. to place with the Treasurer you take some $17,000,000, which contracts your greenback currency to that amount in the first step. No one can deny that when you take your reserves from the commercial centers and place them in each individual bank, if the argument be true that these commercial centers are using these reserves at the present day for loans, the effect of taking these reserves will be to contract your currency to the extent that the banks in the commercial centers use those reserves to loan upon. So far as these two items are concerned then, to start with, there can be no question that the effect of the measure will be contraction.

But then the question arises, how many banks will organize under this bill? If you organize banks to the amount of a few millions of dollars, then you increase the currency by the organization of those new banks. But the point to which I wish to call the attention of the committee in reference to the bill is, what assurance have we that any bank will organize under this bill? Take your bankers in the country and tell me what inducement have they to organize a new bank under this bill? Why, says my friend from Ohio, we have given them the opportunity of free banking. I believe in free banking. When you have a specie basis, when you have a commercial center of redemption, when you have all your provisions made, let your banking be free, and let every State and every community have the same chance and the same opportunity. But if this bill passes and becomes a law a banker will examine it and say; "If I organize a bank under this bill I must go and purchase my bonds and pay 15 or 16 per cent. premium for those bonds, and I will get my $90,000 of circulation on the $100,000." In other words, he must pay $15,000 premium for $90,000 of circulation to start with.

Now, I ask the chairman of the Finance Committee as a bank man if he would advise any company, any corporation, under this circumstance, to organize a new bank? Would he not say as a business man that he could not advise such a step? He would rather advise to wait two years and a half, when instead of paying $16,000 premium for his $100,000 of five per cents he can get them at cost, and therefore he will not organize a bank when the whole interest on his $100,000 of bonds during the two and a half years is less than the premium. Would not he as a business man, would not you as a banker, say, "I will take my $100,000 which I have and my $16,000 which I have got to pay as premium, and I will invest it and take my 7 per cent. interest, and when the two and a half years roll around I can take that money with all its accumulation and subtract from it the $100,000 and have left some twenty-five or thirty thousand dollars, and with the $100,000 I will take my bonds and then I will commence to bank with it." Is it not natural? Can a business man do different from that if he looks to his own interest? If I am wrong, the committee will show me my error; if I am correct, then how under this bill will new banks be organized when they see what stares them in the face in that regard? It does not seem to me to be natural.

But again there is a worse difficulty than this which troubles me. I do not want to contract this currency at the present time. I do not want to do anything to throw an additional cloud over the business interests of the country at the present hour. I see banks organized all over the country. They look and see this bill. Why, says the bank with its circulation to-day of a million, my bonds are worth, if they are 5 per cents, 16 per cent. premium; if they are 6 per cents, they are worth 20 per cent. premium; why should not I sell those bonds? Why should not I surrender my circulation? Why should not I take my money and invest it at 7 per cent.? In two and a half years I can buy back those same bonds at par. As a business operation, would it not be for the interest of the bank to do it? Could they not do far better by surrendering their currency rather than by taking more?

My friends from the western part of the country want more circulation. I do not believe that there will be any difficulty in regard to that if this bill passes. I believe that many banks would wish to surrender their circulation for the reasons I have suggested.

But, Mr. President, I know there are difficulties. I know it is said that New England has too much circulation. I know it has been often assumed that my own State has more than its share. I am not here to say that that is not true. I ask no favors and no privileges for my own State that I am not willing should be granted to every other State in the Union in this regard; but let me say to Senators that we did not take hold of this national banking system readily and willingly. It was no mere anxiety and rush on the part of my State to go and seize more than her share of the banking capital of this country. We had our own State banking institutions, and we believed them to be as sound and as satisfactory as it was possible for banks to be. When this national system came into existence it was desired that all the old State institutions should surrender their State charters and organize under this new system. My State had received a revenue from her State circulation. For thirty-five years, taking it from 1830 to 1865, she had not only received all her revenue, but when the war broke out she had between eight and nine million dollars in the treasury over and above all the taxes that had been levied in the State during the thirty-five years; and when during the rebellion she taxed her citizens so that in the last year of the war the taxes of that State were $4,700,000, after taking out all those taxes the revenue which she had received from her State banks was enough to cancel it all except about $500,000. Therefore it was that the people of my State disliked to surrender these institutions and to enter into the national system, for they would be obliged annually to levy a severe tax upon themselves. "But" the governor of the State at that time, in a message to the Legislature—and a truer and more patriotic man or one more capable of taking into consideration the interests of the whole country never occupied that position than John A. Andrew—took the ground that "we must not narrow and circumscribe our vision simply to our own State. True, we must impose a State tax upon our people if we surrender our banks to the national Government, but the good of the people at large, the interests of the whole country, demand it; therefore let us give up our State banks and go into this national system." What then? Some of our State banks were fearful. They knew what they could do under the State system. Then Congress forced them and placed a tax of 10 per cent. upon them, driving every one of them into this system. It was an experiment. Every bank hesitated. They knew they were prosperous under the State system, but they were obliged to adopt the national system. Now they pay annually into the United States Treasury $1,100,000 of taxes, and our people are taxed annually about $2,000,000 to meet their revenues.

I mention this not to say that the State of Massachusetts ought to retain her present banking capital, but simply that the Senate may understand that we did not rush into this business. It was not because we wished to take the advantage of anybody, but it was simply because we were compelled to do so.

The Senator from Illinois says that at the present time no bank can make a profit unless its deposits are greater than its circulation. If that statement be true there is not a bank in Massachusetts, outside of its large cities, that can make any profit. You may look over this country and, with the exception of your great commercial centers and some of your large cities, you will find that the deposits of a great majority of banks outside of those points do not come up to their capital, but fall far below it. In many cases they are not one-half of it; in some cases not one-fourth part of it. But however that may be, the profit on circulation after paying all these taxes is so small that it is not a question to be contended about.

What I say is that if we have got more circulation than belongs to us you have a provision to take it from us. Take it from us, then, and carry it to the West or to the South. We have our currency, not for the State of Massachusetts or any other State, but it is a currency for the country at large; and valuable as was our State currency, and valuable as was the State currency of the State of New York and some other States, there is no State currency in my view that will compare with the national currency. The very fact of our placing the national stamp upon our bills makes them current in every section of the country, and in many other countries besides our own; and we have a confidence in it; we feel safer with the national stamp upon it than it is possible to feel in regard to any State issue whatever.

The Senator who just spoke [Mr. BAYARD] advocated the idea of our going back to our State systems. Sir, who knows what may be the laws which may regulate the issues of this State or that? Who knows what changes may take place, and how you may have a surplus to-day and a scarcity to-morrow? But if you regulate it by the nation, and if you can have a fixed standard of value which is not subject to be changed by legislative action, it seems to me we have the best circulating medium there is in the world. It is not simply a question what shall be the profit of this State or that State, but what currency can we have regulated properly that will assist and aid the business interests in every section of the country in the best possible manner to transact their business; and if there is one currency that will bring about that result better than any other, that is the currency that we need. We have a restriction, we have a regulation over our national institutions which it is impossible to have over any other institutions. Gentlemen recollect that during the panic of last fall our strongest banks that were not controlled by the nation, that were not held under obligation to make reports of their condition, and were not confined within certain rules which had been established by the Government, those very banks in which we placed the most implicit confidence, almost every one of them, went down and failed us in our hour of need; and then we felt more than ever the importance of having institutions which we could understand, whose condition we could ascertain monthly if we desired it, and that the whole country might have confidence in, and that we might feel that they were not regulated as private banks.

Sir, so far as banks are concerned, as I said before, if they cease to be of benefit to the business interests of the country, if they cease to assist those business interests better and more cheaply to transact their business than they otherwise could do it, then I care very little about them. I know that as you regulate those institutions and as you plant them in different sections, you furnish facilities for the business interests of those sections scattered all over the country which it is impossible for them otherwise to have. I know there would be no trouble if you had no bank circulation so far as our great commercial centers are concerned; your bills and your currency naturally would concentrate in those great commercial centers. But if you had no banks scattered in the sparsely settled portions of the country you would find that whenever there was a scarcity of currency those sections of the country would not have any currency; the commercial centers when there was a scarcity would absorb it all. But when you have your banks of issue with a proper redemption system, they take their circulation and they carry it into all these localities and they furnish to the business facilities of those localities this currency, as it is impossible to do without them. Ah, but, says some one, should we not have local banking institutions? True; and how should we regulate them? They would take all the advantages of the business interests they saw fit in that community, and you could not check them; you would know nothing in reference to their standing, and if they failed the business interests there would suffer and you could not help it. They would charge just what they chose, and the business interests would have this tax placed upon them. We talk about our railroad facilities; we talk about cheapening transportation; but is it not just as important that you furnish the best possible currency and at the best possible rate to all the business interests of the country in order to lift from them the burdens that necessarily come upon them as it is to furnish transportation? And when your banks cease to do that, they cease, as it seems to me, to be of the value which we desired they should be, and it is of but little consequence whether they continue or not.

I did not intend when I rose to occupy more than a single moment, and I do not propose to continue this discussion. But, as I said before, whatever we do we cannot afford to do anything which shall leave any uncertainty in the minds of the business community. I believe that they feel that we are pledged to travel directly toward resumption, not necessarily hastily, not so as to bear down the business interests of the country, but that we have pledged ourselves that our aid shall be given in that direction; that we justified ourselves before the country and before the world in regard to our legal-tender act simply on the ground that it was a necessity, and that in order to save the life of the nation we had a right to avail ourselves of that necessity; but that as soon as peace was declared we would take the earliest practicable opportunity to return to our condition previous to that act. I know full well that when we passed the first act to redeem a certain portion of greenbacks monthly I voted for it, and the object was to carry out that pledge. We subsequently decided that we would stop that retirement and leave, as we said, the country to grow up to our currency; that we would not reduce it; but we did substantially say to the country that we would not go in the opposite direction, but would let the country go on and prosper, and that without interfering with the business interests of the people we would endeaver to resume at as early a day as was practicable.

Now I do not wish to take any step which shall look as if we were taking the backward ground and the downward track. I do not wish those who represent the South or the West to be placed in such a position that they will be obliged to say to their constituents "We can get no circulation." You have an act already to take $25,000,000. I say take it as fast as it is wanted, and use it, and have the same privileges and the same advantages that we have; and if the day shall come when we can resume without injury, so that we have a fixed standard of value which is not liable to be changed, so that the business interests of the country may feel confident that they know what is before them, and can make their plans accordingly, then I would open the door to free banking and let the institutions in every section of the country avail themselves of the opportunity.

My friend on my right yesterday asked what guarantee we should have that there would not be too much circulation under that state of things. With such a standard there will be no difficulty, for each bank would be obliged to take care of its circulation, and you would find that the banks in my State would surrender, so far as the great cities are concerned, most speedily a large portion of the circulation which they now hold, because they would not want to take the responsibility of redeeming that circulation.

One word more and I have done. I know there is a feeling that the stress and panic which came so suddenly upon us last fall were owing to the fact that we had not sufficient currency. It seems to me that that was not the great difficulty. We had plenty of currency, but we could not have the benefit of it. There was a want of confidence, and many of our best institutions locked it up, some a million, some eight hundred thousand, some five hundred thousand dollars, and so on, in order that they might be able to answer the demands of their customers. When you take into account the fact that during the last few years since the war we have expended some $600,000,000 in railroads, and when you take into account the fact also that we have been increasing our business operations and building roads all over the country, when you take into account the fact that in our chief city from seventy-five to one hundred million dollars of property was blotted out of existence in a single day, when you take into account the fact that in one of our western cities but a short time since a similar calamity occurred—with all these expenditures and this extension of business and these losses, is it to be wondered at that when the day came in the fall that some of our banks broke there was a want of confidence? Our strong men, who in former years had stretched out their arms most liberally to assist those in need, were so tied up by the failure of the corporations which I have referred to, that it was all that it was possible for them to do to take care of themselves.

I recollect very well that when the Union Pacific Railroad was completed the question came up immediately in regard to building the Southern and Northern Pacific roads. I voted against both those propositions, not because I did not believe in them. I believed that they should be constructed; but I said "we have spent so much money, and I am sorry to say many millions more than we ought to have spent on the Union Pacific, that the business interests of the country cannot afford to let us undertake to build these two great lines at the present time. We ought to wait at least ten years before we undertake another such enterprise." Gentlemen, look at it as you will, the amount of money that we have put into these great enterprises and into various other enterprises of a similar nature, has taken from our business interests so much, that we lack not so much currency or bank-bills as we do capital. We were poor, and the business men felt it as they never felt it before. Our railroad companies failed; contractors failed; and when they failed they brought disaster upon our great business corporations, and when they failed they brought calamity upon our merchants, our merchants upon our importers and our laboring men, and every rank and class of citizens, from the highest to the lowest, felt the effects of that terrible calamity. But it was not in my view owing to a want of currency. You might have issued another $100,000,000, and it would only have bridged it over for the moment. It was because we had launched out into these various corporations and works of construction to such an extent that we found we had not means to take care of the legitimate business interests which we were called upon in that hour to protect.

Mr. President, if I could feel that this bill would relieve us, if I could feel and be satisfied that the country would be better with it, I should be most happy to vote for it; but it seems to me that if currency is what you want, much as I regret to have it taken from our section so far as our banks are concerned—not that I care for the currency, for we have a surplus; it is redundant there—I feel that every business man in the country knows what it means. He does not know but that the volume is to be increased under this bill. He does not understand how to make his plans for the future. Therefore I think it would be an uncertain step which I most sadly fear this measure might bring upon us.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. WRIGHT,] upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I ask that the amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is in section 8, line 8, to strike out "50" and insert "25;" so as to read:

It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to retire an amount of United States notes equal to 25 per cent. of the circulating notes so issued.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. LEWIS.] If he were here he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

Mr. INGALLS, (when his name was called.) The pair with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] which I announced yesterday still continues. If relieved from this obligation I would vote "yea." I do not know how he would vote.

Mr. KELLY, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. NORWOOD.] If present he would vote for this amendment, and I should vote against it.

Mr. RANSOM, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. STOCKTON.] If present he would vote "nay," and I should vote "yea."

Mr. SPRAGUE, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.] He, if here, would vote "nay," and I should vote "yea."

Mr. WADLEIGH, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. PEASE.] If present he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] is absent. He is paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] on this vote. If he were here he would vote "nay."

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. In behalf of my colleague, [Mr. FERRY,] who is absent, I would say that if he were here, on all questions which relate to expansion, he would vote against it. I understand that he is paired with the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BROWNLOW,] who would vote for expansion. I make this statement to show the position of my colleague.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 32, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Bogy, Boreman, Cameron, Carpenter, Clayton, Conover, Dennis, Dorsey, Ferry of Michigan, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Harvey, Hitchcock, Johnston, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morton, Oglesby, Patterson, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Spencer, Tipton, West, Windom, and Wright—32.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Chandler, Conkling, Cooper, Davis, Edmunds, Fenton, Flanagan, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Howe, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Sargent, Saulsbury, Schurz, Scott, Sherman, Stewart, Thurman, and Washburn—24.

ABSENT—Messrs. Boutwell, Brownlow, Buckingham, Cragin, Ferry of Connecticut, Frelinghuysen, Ingalls, Jones, Kelly, Lewis, Norwood, Pease, Ransom, Sprague, Stevenson, Stockton, and Wadleigh—17.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. I offer the following amendment in section 8, line 6, after the word "act" insert "in excess of the highest outstanding volume thereof at any time prior to such issue;" so as to read:

And within thirty days after circulating notes to the amount of $1,000,000 shall from time to time be issued to national banking associations under this act in excess of the highest outstanding volume thereof at any time prior to such issue, it shall be duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to retire an amount of United States notes equal to 25 per cent. of the circulating notes so issued, &c.

I trust there will be no objection to this amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not understand it.

Mr. WRIGHT. I will explain it. It may occur in issuing national-bank circulation from time to time after this act goes into effect, under the free-banking provision, that while in one month there may be an issue of three, four, five, eight, or ten millions, there may be also a retirement. There may be some months when bank circulation will be withdrawn and there be no increase. The object of this amendment is that in case there shall be a retirement, say in one month of $5,000,000, and then the next month there shall be an issue of $4,000,000, a retirement of greenbacks shall not occur on that $4,000,000 without reference to what may have been withdrawn by the banks, but that the retirement shall only take place as there is an actual increase of the volume of the bank circulation over and above the highest point reached heretofore. For instance, suppose the bank circulation shall run up to $400,000,000, and then because the banks want to retire their circulation they bring it down to $390,000,000, and afterward there shall be an increase of $4,000,000; I do not want a retirement of greenbacks on that $4,000,000 over and above the $390,000,000, and no retirement until you get up to $400,000,000 again. I supposed that was the intention of the section, and I want these words put so that there can be no mistake about it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not now understand the amendment, although I have been listening with attention to the Senator from Iowa; nor is it material, for I think as a matter of course the Senator ought to perfect the bill as he desires. I cannot now vote for it. I have no desire to interfere with the amendments he may offer. I ask that the amendment may again be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I have not the slightest objection to this or any other amendment that may be moved to the bill; but I yesterday gave notice that after the adoption of this amendment, if it should be carried, I would move to lay the bill upon the table. I do not think it worth while to take any more time on this bill, as the time of the body is valuable. I therefore move that the bill and all amendments be laid upon the table.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CONKLING, (when Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN'S name was called.) Perhaps I ought to state again that the Senator from New Jersey, if here, would vote for this motion. He is paired on this and kindred motions with the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. INGALLS, (when his name was called.) The announcement of the Senator from New York renders it unnecessary for me to say that my pair continues with the Senator from New Jersey. If present I presume he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

Mr. RANSOM, (when his name was called.) On this bill I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. STOCKTON,] but as I am assured that that Senator if here would vote "nay" on this motion and I vote "nay," I will record my vote.

Mr. SPRAGUE, (when his name was called.) On this question I presume I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.]

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 20, nays 36; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckingham, Chandler, Conkling, Davis, Edmunds, Fenton, Flanagan, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Sargent, Schurz, Scott, Sherman, Stewart, and Washburn—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Bayard, Bogy, Boreman, Cameron, Carpenter, Clayton, Conover, Cooper, Dennis, Dorsey, Ferry of Michigan, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Harvey, Howe, Johnston, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morton, Oglesby, Patterson, Pratt, Ramsey, Ransom, Robertson, Saulsbury, Spencer, Tipton, West, Windom, and Wright—36.

ABSENT—Messrs. Boutwell, Brownlow, Cragin, Ferry of Connecticut, Frelinghuysen, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Jones, Kelly, Lewis, Norwood, Pease, Sprague, Stevenson, Stockton, Thurman, and Wadleigh—17.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. MERRIMON. I desire to offer a substitute for the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a pending amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. MERRIMON. There is but one amendment pending, I believe.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa to the amendment of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the amendment be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is to insert after the word "act" in line 6 of section 8 the words "in excess of the highest outstanding volume thereof at any time prior to such issue."

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to ask the Senator form Iowa whether the highest standard of notes ever issued was not $400,000,000; so that there would be no diminution of greenbacks at all until the bank circulation shall have reached $400,000,000? Is that it?

Mr. WRIGHT. I did not hear the Senator.

Mr. SHERMAN. The highest amount of issue was $400,000,000. Does this amendment prevent the diminution of greenbacks until the amount of bank-notes reaches $400,000,000?

Mr. WRIGHT. It does not touch the greenbacks at all.

Mr. SHERMAN. What is the effect?

Mr. WRIGHT. I will explain. The section now provides that there shall be a retirement of twenty-five cents of greenbacks for each dollar of national-bank circulation issued. It also provides that within thirty days after circulating notes to the amount of $1,000,000 shall from time to time be issued to national banking associations under this act, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to retire an amount of United States notes equal to 25 per cent. of this circulation. My proposition is that, instead of allowing a retirement for each million of national-bank circulation that may be issued without reference to what was the volume prior thereto, the Secretary shall not retire until we get up to what was the maximum volume before that of national-bank circulation.

As I attempted to explain and gave as an illustration, suppose the national-bank circulation at any time shall reach $400,000,000; you will have been retiring 25 per cent. on each million issued, thirty days thereafter. Now, suppose it should occur that ten millions of national-bank circulation issued should be withdrawn by the banks; they withdraw their circulation and lift their bonds, as they may do; then the bank circulation is reduced to $390,000,000. The next month suppose there shall be $4,000,000 of national-bank circulation issued, that would make $394,000,000. As the bill stands now, the Secretary of the Treasury would retire one million of the greenbacks. My proposition is that he shall not retire in such a case as that till we get to $400,000,000, and above that. That is to say, he cannot retire upon an increase of national-bank circulation until we get above what was the highest volume thereof at any time prior to that. If there be a retirement of twenty or thirty thousand dollars of national-bank circulation and then there shall happen to be an increase of one million, it cannot be asked that you shall retire $250,000 for that million, for thus it might occur that you would retire all the greenback circulation down to $300,000,000 and have no increase of national-bank circulation.

Mr. MORTON. The principle of this amendment, as I understand it, is this: that if there should be a new issue to new banks of $1,000,000 of national-bank notes and a retirement of national-bank notes by old banks to the amount of $200,000, leaving the increase of national-bank notes $800,000, the retirement of greenbacks shall only operate against the $800,000 and not against the million.

Mr. LOGAN. That is it.

Mr. WEST. It prevents duplicate retirement.

Mr. LOGAN. Exactly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. INGALLS, (when his name was called.) On this question I should vote "yea" were I not paired with the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN.]

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 30, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Bogy, Boreman, Cameron, Carpenter, Clayton, Conover, Dennis, Dorsey, Ferry of Michigan, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Harvey, Hitchcock, Johnston, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morton, Oglesby, Patterson, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Spencer, Tipton, West, and Wright—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Buckingham, Chandler, Conkling, Cooper, Davis, Edmunds, Fenton, Flanagan, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Howe, Morrill of Vermont, Saulsbury, Schurz, Scott, Sherman, Stewart, Washburn, and Windom—23.

ABSENT—Messrs. Boutwell, Brownlow, Cragin, Ferry of Connecticut, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Ingalls, Jones, Kelly, Lewis, Morrill of Maine, Norwood, Pease, Ransom, Sargent, Sprague, Stevenson, Stockton, Thurman, and Wadleigh—30.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. I offer the following amendment: In section 9, line 14, strike out "5" and insert "4½."

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the yeas and nays on that amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CONKLING. Perhaps it is an idle work, but nevertheless I propose that the Secretary shall as usual report this amendment so that we may know what it means. It has been simply announced to be to strike out "5" and insert "4½." Nobody knows what that means, I take it.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed in section 9, line 14, to strike out "5" and insert "4½," so as to read:

After ten years from the date of their issue and bearing interest payable quarterly in such coin at the rate of 4½ per cent. per annum.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. LEWIS.] If he were here he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. INGALLS, (when his name was called.) If not paired with the Senator from New Jersey upon this question, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 32, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Bogy, Boreman, Carpenter, Clayton, Conover, Davis, Dennis, Dorsey, Ferry of Michigan, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Harvey, Hitchcock, Johnston, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morton, Oglesby, Patterson, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Spencer, Tipton, Washburn, West, Windom, and Wright—32.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Conkling, Cooper, Edmunds, Fenton, Flanagan, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Howe, Schurz, Scott, Sherman, and Stewart—15.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Boutwell, Brownlow, Buckingham, Cameron, Chandler, Cragin, Ferry of Connecticut, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Ingalls, Jones, Kelly, Lewis, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Norwood, Pease, Ransom, Sargent, Saulsbury, Sprague, Stevenson, Stockton, Thurman, and Wadleigh—26.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to offer another amendment. In section 9, line 12, I move to strike out "ten" and insert "fifteen," so that the clause will read:

And thereupon the Secretary of the Treasury shall, in exchange for said notes, deliver to such holder an equal amount of coupon or registered bonds of the United States in such form as he may prescribe, of denominations of fifty dollars, or some multiple of that sum, redeemable in coin of the present standard value, at the pleasure of the United States, after fifteen years from the date of their issue.

Mr. ANTHONY. I beg to make a suggestion in the interests of the expedition of business. We have all made our record on these various amendments which tend in one direction, and the majority in the Senate is very decided. I think it is hardly necessary to waste the time of the Senate in taking the yeas and nays on every amendment. A division will answer the purpose of ascertaining how close the vote is, and if it should be found to be very close we might take the yeas and nays; but there is no necessity for taking the yeas and nays for the purpose of enabling any Senator to make his record, which is fully made on both sides. I hope, therefore, we shall take this vote by a division, and that unless the vote be very close, we shall not be troubled with the yeas and nays.

Mr. WRIGHT. In this case I suppose there will be no objection to this amendment. I think the Senator from Ohio will not object to this amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not object to any amendment that the Senator chooses to put on the bill.

Mr. WRIGHT. Then I think we had better have the yeas and nays on this amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not call for the yeas and nays. I concur entirely with what has been said by the Senator from Rhode Island. It is utterly idle to call the yeas and nays. I have not called for them at all.

Mr. ANTHONY. When I first came into this body the yeas and nays were not called once a month, certainly not once a week, and now we call them upon every petty question. I think it is a great waste of the time of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa demands the yeas and nays on this question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. INGALLS. On account of my pair with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] I am restrained from voting "yea" on this proposition.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 31, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Bayard, Bogy, Boreman, Carpenter, Clayton, Conover, Dennis, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Harvey, Hitchcock, Johnston, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morton, Oglesby, Patterson, Pratt, Ramsey, Ransom, Saulsbury, Spencer, Tipton, and Wright—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckingham, Chandler, Conkling, Cooper, Davis, Flanagan, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Howe, Morrill of Vermont, Scott, Stewart, and Washburn—16.

ABSENT—Messrs. Boutwell, Brownlow, Cameron, Cragin, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Ingalls, Jones, Kelly, Lewis, Morrill of Maine, Norwood, Pease, Robertson, Sargent, Schurz, Sherman, Sprague, Stevenson, Stockton, Thurman, Wadleigh, West, and Windom—26.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. In section 9, line 1, I move to strike out the word "January" and insert "July," and in line 2 to strike out "seven" and insert "eight;" so that the section will read:

That on and after the 1st day of July, 1878, any holder of United States notes to the amount of $1,000, or any multiple thereof, may present them for payment, &c.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Is an amendment to that amendment in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The amendment of the Senator from Iowa is an amendment in the second degree. We are acting on the committee's amendment, and this is an amendment to the committee's amendment. I do not see how you can have another amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. An amendment would be in order.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. If this amendment should be adopted will it be in order to move to strike it out and insert another?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. When the bill comes into the Senate, it would be. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. WRIGHT.]

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I now move an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert what I send to the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator to move an amendment to the pending amendment of the committee by striking out all after the word "that," the first word of the amendment. That amendment is in order, and it will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

So much of the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes," as provides that no circulation shall be withdrawn, under the provisions of section 6 of said act, until after the fifty-four millions granted in section 1 of said act shall have been taken up, is hereby repealed; and it shall be the duty of the Comptroller of the Currency, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, to proceed forthwith to carry into execution the provisions of section 6 of said act, and, to enable him to do so, he is hereby authorized and required, from time to time, as needed for the execution of the said section, to make requisitions upon each of the national banks described in said section, organized in States having an excess of circulation, to withdraw and return so much of their circulation as by said act may be apportioned to be withdrawn from them, or, in lieu thereof, to deposit in the Treasury of the United States lawful money sufficient to redeem such circulation; and, upon the return of the circulation required, or the deposit of lawful money, as herein provided, a proportionate amount of the bonds held to secure the circulation of such association as shall make such return or deposit shall be surrendered to it.

SEC. 2. That upon the failure of the national banks upon which requisition for circulation shall be made, or of any of them, to return the amount required, or to deposit in the Treasury lawful money to redeem the circulation required, within thirty days, the Comptroller of the Currency shall at once sell, as provided in section 49 of the national-currency act, approved June 3, 1864, bonds held to secure the redemption of the circulation of the association or associations which shall so fail to an amount sufficient to redeem the circulation required of such association or associations, and with the proceeds, which shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States, so much of the circulation of such association or associations shall be redeemed as will equal the amount required and not returned; and if there be any excess of proceeds over the amount required for such redemption, it shall be returned to the association or associations whose bonds shall have been sold. And it shall be the duty of the Treasurer, assistant treasurers, designated depositaries, and national-bank depositories of the United States, who shall be kept informed by the Comptroller of the Currency of such associations as shall fail to return circulation or to deposit lawful money as required, to assort and return to the Treasury for redemption the notes of such associations as they shall come into their hands until the amount required shall be redeemed.

SEC. 3. That from and after the passage of this act it shall be lawful for the Comptroller of the Currency to issue circulating notes in the manner and proportion now provided by law to associations organized or to be organized in those States and Territories having less than their proportion of circulation, under an apportionment made on the basis of population and of wealth, as shown by the returns of the census of 1870: Provided, That the whole amount of circulation issued to such banking associations, and withdrawn and redeemed from banking associations under the provisions of this act, shall not exceed $46,000,000, and that such circulation shall from time to time be withdrawn and redeemed only as it shall be necessary to supply banks in those States having less than their apportionment.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I have few words to say upon this amendment. It is offered in satisfaction of a complaint that inequality exists between States in respect of bank circulation. Lack of equality is a complaint always to be heeded. I forbear to dwell now upon the cause of the particular inequality in question. I say nothing of the fact that strenuous and hostile measures and efforts brought the banks of the States under the national system and caused them to accept circulation offered them for want of other takers. Suffice it to say that New York and some other States have more than their quota respectively of bank circulation.

My amendment will change this. Forty-six million was the increase of bank circulation provided by a measure devised by expansionists which lately won its way in vain through the Senate. The amendment adopts the same sum, and places it all at the disposal of deficient States as soon and as fast as they will take it. If the offer be accepted, well; if it be refused, for one I shall seek the best thing then to be hoped for during this session of Congress. I mean no action whatever touching the finances, and no attempt at further legislation.

In the present mood and temper of Congress, if this tender of banking advantages be not accepted, the best thing left is an end of the session—a dispatch of needful legislation, the appropriation bills, the civil-rights bill, and but litle else, and then an early adjournment. We can thus take down the sword—the sword which has been hanging by a hair for five months over the head of every business man, while Congress has drifted upon a sea of talk. When the industries of the country are relieved from the suspense springing from the dread that Congress may do we know not what—when the incubus of uncertainty is lifted from enterprise and labor, the energy of the nation will in some measure retrieve and vindicate themselves. We can at least leave trade free to fight its own battle, we can take the hands of Congress off its throat. An adjournment will do this. If, however, accepting $46,000,000 as the need of deficient States in respect of bank circulation, the Senators representing the sections in which need is supposed to exist will unite with Senators representing the States from which it is to be taken, we can redress the only grievance which has even an apparent reality.

Therefore, although this amendment may deprive New York and other States of some bank circulation, without expressing any opinion now upon the justice or injustice of the complaint made or its good or bad faith, without attempting to forecast the result which alone can show whether a real need of bank currency exists, I will vote for the amendment, because it will present to the option of deficient States all that we have been told by their Senators they need or think they need.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Mr. President, I do not like the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York. It does not appear to me that it would be just and equitable toward the State of New York or toward any of those States which now have, as it is said, more than their proportion of bank circulation. But we are driven to this alternative: We are to accept this or something like it; we are to relinquish that which we think belongs to the States of the North and East; or we are to put upon our statute-book a banking act which increases the irredeemable currency, which makes no effort to redeem it and to make it better for three years, which opens the business interests of the country to all those fluctuations and changes which will follow an increase of irredeemable currency; and those in my judgment are evils much greater to business interests than the mere privation of a little or a good deal of bank currency. Of the two evils, I prefer that Northern and Eastern States shall relinquish so much of their circulation as is regarded as a surplus, rather than to adopt the other alternative of floating upon a sea which will carry us, in my judgment, toward ruin.

This proposition may be hard in one sense for the people whom I particularly represent, although I do not intend to represent merely the people of the State of Connecticut. I would rather represent, so far as in my power, the business interests of the country, and those business interests will be somewhat imperiled by this amendment; but to no such degree as they will be if instead of yielding or giving or offering a portion of our circulation to those who feel that they have not their fair proportion of circulation, we shall have an increase of irredeemable currency. I say we shall not be injured as much in the one case as in the other, and I prefer to take the least of the evils and to vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask for the yeas and nays upon this amendment, as it is a matter of importance enough to justify it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senate already knows that it was with a good deal of reluctance and with much hesitation that I consented to share in the responsibility of the passage of the bill as it was reported from the Committee on Finance. It provided all the way through for an increase of paper money to a pretty large extent, depending, however, somewhat upon doubts whether or not under the present condition of the money market banks would be organized under the bill to a very large extent. I felt that while bonds were worth 115 in gold, and while the advantages to be derived from the circulation were not greater than they are, we probably could risk free banking upon the basis of this bill.

But since all the restrictions and all the limitations that looked toward redemption now or in the future have been stricken from the bill, as a matter of course I cannot support it, and I appeal to Senators now, as sober, sensible men, having in charge the interests of forty million people, whether it is worth while, with the diversity of opinion upon this bill, with the probability of its fate in the future, with the difference of opinion in regard to its effect upon the public credit, with the wide difference of opinion in regard to the main question at issue, whether any more paper money ought, under any circumstances, to be issued without coin redemption; whether it is wise for us to waste our time on the passage of a bill of this kind as it now stands—a bill to authorize free banking just so far as and to any extent to which any one is willing to buy bonds at their present market value, and issue paper money upon, without one single provision for coin redemption, and a provision only for currency redemption so far as mutilated and defaced notes are concerned, which nobody expects to go far, with no promise even of a conversion into a bond until four and a half years hence, in July, 1878, and then only in a bond which in the money market of the world for the last forty years would be under par in gold, a 4½ per cent. bond. What is the use of our wasting time for a day upon the discussion in detail of a bill like this?

But the Senator from New York now offers to us a proposition which was reported substantially from the Committee on Finance, except that that only provided for $25,000,000, with the assent of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WRIGHT] and the assent of the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY,] to correct the long complained of inequality in the distribution of bank circulation. I have heard that subject on the stump so much and among the people in common conversation so often that I am tired and sick of it. It is a source of infinite complaint that the New England and Eastern States got the advantage in the distribution of the bank circulation; and although I know very well that they got it under the decision of the Comptroller, and got it under circumstances which entitle them to hold it unless the public interests are advanced by taking it from them, yet it has been so constant a source of local complaint that I think this is a proper occasion for us to accept on the part of the West and South the generous and manly tender now made us by the representatives of those States where this excess of circulation exists. We can now at least secure a redistribution of $46,000,000 of this excess of circulation, which is probably more than will be absorbed for two or three years. Why not accept it? It has been the cause of local complaint, not that the general circulation was not large enough, but that the local circulation was too small. In every part of the States of Illinois and Indiana and Ohio and Missouri the tables of the Comptroller of the Currency have been laid before the people showing how much deficiency there was in Nebraska and Kansas and Missouri. Here is an opportunity to have that inequality corrected. It is now offered, and offered by the representatives of the very States where this excess exists. Why not accept it? I shall vote for it with great pleasure, and I am very glad indeed to see that the representatives of those States having this excess of circulation are willing to allow it to be withdrawn from them and distributed to the West and South where they make great claim of hardship on account of this inequality.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I have endeavored all my life to be a practical man, and I propose to be so on this question. I do not suppose there is a man in this Senate who believes that this bill in its present shape can become a law. We hear a great deal of the wants of the South and West. I do not think there is a Senator here who believes that this bill will become a law and supply those wants. But now we have a proposition for the redistribution of the bank currency, and we have the support in that proposition of the States that have an excess of currency according to the principles of distribution now provided by law.

Now, sir, the question is simply this, and no sophistry can hide it: shall we take this advantage which is within our reach—not an advantage of one section over another, but the advantage of justice and equality—shall we realize this practical good, or shall we trample it under foot and pass a bill through this body that no human being believes will become a law? That is the question; and on that I cannot hesitate for one single moment.

Long ago I, in a humble way, called the attention of the Senate, and on the stump called the attention of my constituents, to the unequal distribution of the currency under the national banking law. I did not condemn those States which had obtained more than their share when other States refused to take it or declined to take it or were unable to take it; but I did say that the time had come in the exercise of that power which was reserved to us by the national banking law to redistribute the currency and the banking facilities of the country. Then, sir, I could not wholly succeed. It is true that we passed an act for the redistribution of some portion of that currency, which has become a dead letter owing to some defects that have prevented its execution; but now, free from difficulty, free from obstacle to its execution, here is a proposition that will give to the South and West $46,000,000 of currency; and the question is, will you take this practical and attainable measure, or will you vote it down and pass a measure which you know full well will never become the law of this land?

Mr. MORTON. I have but a single word to say in reply to the Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on Finance. He represented this bill in his speech a few minutes ago as a bill of abominations.

Mr. SHERMAN. O, no!

Mr. MORTON. I think that was the substance of the Senator's remarks. He said that without provision for the resumption of specie payments, with all guards and limitations stricken out, the bill is now a measure for the indefinite expansion of the currency. I beg leave to remind my friend from Ohio that the time has hardly elapsed for him to have forgotten so soon that this bill is his bill, that there is no principle involved in this bill now which was not in it when he reported it to the Senate and which he did not advocate yesterday in his speech. A majority of the Senate have changed the bill in two respects: in regard to the proportion of greenbacks to be retired, and in regard to the rate of interest upon the bond to be issued for it. These are the two material amendments. I believe one or two other amendments have been made not very important in their character, and certainly not affecting the principles of the bill. The bill in its principles is just as it was reported by the chairman and a majority of the Finance Committee; and when the Senator denounces it as stripped of all limitations and stripped of all guards, as a bill without merit, he is but condemning his own handiwork. Did he expect that his bill would be accepted by the Senate without amendment, and that we should not be at liberty to exercise our discretion in regard to all the provisions of this bill while still retaining its essential principles? This, Mr. President, is all I have to say.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not desire to reply to my friend from Indiana because he knows very well that he is doing injustice to me, and therefore I will not press my reply. I wish to state, however, that I assented to this bill and reported it, as the Senate know very well, with great doubt about the propriety of many features of it, especially as to free banking without some positive provision for redemption. But as to this bill now being the same bill reported from the Finance Committee, it is absurd to talk about its being so.

There were three provisions in the bill that looked to redemption, and those provisions had been reduced to their smallest possible quantum in order to allow us to report the bill and to vote for it. One provision required the redemption of our notes in the near future in something equal to coin. Now the Senate have substituted instead of gold coin a bond which in the money markets of the world would be worth to-day probably from eighty to ninety cents. In other words, the Senate have proclaimed an additional depreciation of the greenbacks, and now a 4½ per cent. bond cannot be sold in the money markets of the world at par in greenbacks; and therefore you propose four years hence to redeem the outstanding greenbacks in that which is not now to-day worth par in greenbacks. To call that a proposition looking toward specie redemption is simply an absurdity in terms.

Besides that, the object of the bill as reported was to appreciate the value of the greenback, so that the increase of bank-notes would be counteracted by the withdrawal of greenbacks, and the 50 per cent. reduction was only yielded as the last point of compromise, as the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHANDLER] yesterday stated as the half-way point where friends who differed with each other could meet. When we had gone to that extreme by yielding to some extent the principle of inflation and providing for an increased amount of paper money on the retirement of half that amount of greenbacks, when we were thus providing constantly for an expansion and also in some degree for an improvement in the value of greenbacks, we are met by another proposition to take away one-half of what was to be secured in the way of redemption by this provision of the bill. In other words, $400,000,000 of paper money will be issued to $100,000,000 of paper money retired—an increase of $300,000,000 of paper money if the bill goes on to that extent, and so pro rata to any extent that it may go. Besides, the time for doing this has been postponed until July 1, 1878, a period I think beyond the reach of most of those who now hear me, beyond the time for which they can speak.

It seems to me with these great and radical alterations in the bill that the whole character of it is changed. It is no longer a bill providing for a redemption of the notes, but it is a bill providing for their permanent depreciation.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator will pardon me, to test whether it is a change or not, 25 per cent. having been stricken out, suppose you strike out the other 25 per cent.; would that be any change?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly. You now have a bill providing for their permanent depreciation. At the day you fix, no mortal man here can say to me that this 4½ per cent. bond which you promise to pay will be worth coin. You do not even promise four years ahead to redeem your notes in coin; and yet we are all here to-day under the highest pledge of honor to redeem these notes at the earliest practicable day in coin. Now we propose to redeem them four years hence in a bond which we know is not worth coin.

The qualified redemption in a 5 per cent. bond was at least an approximate approach to specie payments, because in the money markets of the world that bond is worth par in coin; and to-day when we make the tender it is worth coin. So when we said we would give the holders of these notes two years and six months hence a gold-bearing 5 per cent. bond worth to day 102 cents in gold, that was a promise of specie payments. But now you have changed all that; you do not reduce the volume of the greenbacks to any appreciable extent; you postpone the time of doing this; and then instead of offering coin or its equivalent you offer a whetstone, that which to-day is worth less than the paper that you promise to redeem with it. That is the way I look upon it. But as a matter of course I do not desire to call the Senator from Indiana to an account. I have heard him often, and I expect to hear him again in the future, and I have no doubt I shall hear all over the Western States this complaint against the East of their monopoly of paper money. Here it will be said Massachusetts has $90,000,000 when it ought only to have $40,000,000; New York has so much when it ought to have only so much. I call the attention of every Senator and of the country and of every man in the West and South to the fact that here is a tender of more than half of this surplus, immediately, now, to-day. If that tender is refused, let this complaint no more be made by the section from which I come.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I voted with the majority for the change of the rate of interest from 5 per cent. to 4½ per cent., and I confess that I cannot understand the Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the Finance Committee, when he says that by that vote we have permanently depreciated the greenback currency. I may be mistaken, but I voted with the belief that by the time named in this bill a 4½ per cent. bond will be equal to par in gold. I believe so now. Four years ago the chairman of the Finance Committee himself reported a bill by which he limited the amount of 4½ per cent. bonds to $300,000,000, and provided for a bond at 4 per cent. to the amount of a thousand millions.

Mr. SHERMAN. My friend will allow me to say that on the contrary the Senate Committee on Finance presented a bill providing for a 5 per cent. bond; and that amendment about a 4 and a 4½ per cent. bond was ingrafted on it in the House, and it has proved an utter and absolute failure; but we had to agree to it in order to get $500,000,000 of six per cents funded into five per cents. To secure that we had to provide for 4 and 4½ per cent. bonds, of which not a dollar has ever been issued.

Mr. ALLISON. I allude now to the substitute for that House bill reported by the Finance Committee of the Senate, in which they made provision for three classes of bonds and for funding greenbacks into a 4 per cent. bond; and I refer to the speech made by the Senator from Ohio on this floor on that subject. The bill of 1870 as reported by the Finance Committee provided for a funding of the greenbacks into a bond bearing interest at 4 per cent. and not 4½ per cent. It provided also for $300,000,000 of 4½ per cent. bonds, payable fifteen years after date at the pleasure of the Government. That is the provision now inserted in this bill, and the Senator from Ohio at that time, I believe, claimed that a 4½ per cent. bond payable in fifteen years would be very nearly equal to a 5 per cent. bond payable in ten years.

Mr. SHERMAN. I must correct my friend in a point of fact. I am quite sure that I never reported a proposition to fund the greenbacks into any bond less than 5 per cent. It has been suggested to me that after the passage of the bill by the House I may have reported the House bill back from the committee after they had amended it by striking out the 5 per cent. bond provision and inserting three classes of bonds. Undoubtedly I did report it back.

Mr. ALLISON. I remember very well that in the bill reported by the Finance Committee as a substitute for that House bill there was a provision by which the greenbacks were to be funded at 4 per cent. Now, four years afterward, when the credit of our Government is infinitely better than it was then, we are told that because we provide for the funding of greenbacks into a 4½ per cent. bond, we are in favor of their permanent depreciation. I do not agree to that. I cannot assent to that, especially in face of the fact that these 4½ per cent. bonds could now be sold, were it not for the fact that there are lying behind them about $175,000,000 of 5 per cent. bonds that are worth two per cent. premium in gold to-day. And yet the Senator from Ohio complains of us because we strike out a provision providing for the funding of United States notes two and a half years from now into a bond that is worth 2 per cent. premium in gold to-day, and not only for the funding of the greenbacks but providing for the permanent refunding of all the 6 per cent. debt of the United States, because that is what this ninth section is. It is not only a provision about the greenbacks, but it is a provision for refunding $1,200,000,000 of 6 per cent. bonds into a permanent 5 per cent. bond that is above par in gold to-day. I know very well and other Senators know very well that there is a scramble to-day for the balance of the 5 per cent. loan, at par in gold, among the moneyed men of the world. Yet it was proposed here in this bill, for the purpose of appreciating greenbacks, to fund them into a bond that is now worth a premium in gold and to refund $1,200,000,000 of 6 per cent. bonds into that same class of bonds. I cannot vote for such a bond, but I am willing to consent to the refunding of these $1,200,000,000 of 6 per cent. bonds into a 4½ per cent. bond, because that is I believe as low a bond as we can fund them in.

When the bill of 1870 was reported the 5 per cent. bonds were 4 per cent. below par. They have appreciated in gold since that bill was passed 6 per cent. Now, is it not fair to presume that a 4½ per cent. bond will appreciate to par by July, 1877?

I will say to the Senator from Ohio that I voted with him against extending the time to 1878. I would be quite willing to make it July 1, 1877; but I cannot consent to be put in the category of Senators voting to permanently depreciate the greenback currency, when I propose that it shall be funded into a bond bearing 4½ per cent. interest, which bond was agreed to by the chairman of the Finance Committee four years ago.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to say that, upon recalling the circumstances, I remember very well, as the debates will show, that in reporting the bill providing for the funding into 5, 4½, and 4 per cent. bonds, I stated that our conviction was that not one dollar would ever be funded into a 4 or a 4½ per cent. bond, but that the House had adopted those rates, and to secure the funding of $500,000,000 of sixes into five per cents, I reported the bill and asked the Senate to pass it.

Mr. ALLISON. Why is it that the four and a half per cents cannot be put upon the market? It is because the five per cents have not been exhausted. As a matter of course, you cannot sell a 4½ per cent. bond at par in gold while there is a 5 per cent. bond yet to be sold at that rate. The Secretary of the Treasury does not; but he could this day sell every single dollar remaining of the 5 per cent. loan at par in gold without commissions. He does not do it; and I will say to the chairman of the Finance Committee that if this bill passes as reported, a 5 per cent. bond in gold never will go above par, because the greenbacks can of course be converted into that bond, and the 5 per cent. bonds would remain at par and we never could sell a bond bearing a lower rate of interest until we in turn got them out of the way, which would take perhaps twenty or thirty years longer.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Secretary of the Treasury can sell $200,000,000 of 5 per cent. bonds now at par in gold and does not do it and redeem the 6 per cent. bonds, it is his fault, not mine. I doubt very much whether it can be done.

Mr. ALLISON. I say it is my belief.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is a question for the Secretary of the Treasury to settle. The law authorizes him whenever he can sell 5 per cent. bonds at par in gold to do so and call in 6 per cent. bonds.

Mr. ALLISON. Is it not perfectly plain that these bonds can be sold at par when they are now at a premium in gold?

Mr. SHERMAN. There I think the Senator misleads the Senate, and is perhaps misled himself. The fact is, that the 5 per cent. bonds now have interest accrued on them, and I imagine they are only a fraction above par in gold, when that is considered.

Mr. ALLISON. Between 1 and 2 per cent.

Mr. SHERMAN. If that is so, it is clearly the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to sell those bonds at par in gold and redeem an equal amount of 6 per cent. bonds under the funding act.

Mr. ALLISON. No doubt of it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think it can be done, because I cannot imagine that the Secretary would not have availed himself of that state of the money market to carry out the funding law. But the fact is, as was known at the time, that the 4 and 4½ per cent. bonds never have been sold, that they cannot be sold, that there is no prospect of their being sold; and there is no fact in our financial history or in the present condition of the money market at home, or the foreign money market as to the French or Prussian loans, that would justify the expectation that we could sell a 4½ per cent. bond at par in coin.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish to ask my friend from Iowa a question. When he speaks of a 5 per cent. being sold at 102, does he refer to the quotations in the market?

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly.

Mr. THURMAN. Does not the Senator know that the 102 includes the accrued interest?

Mr. ALLISON. I think I know what it does include, and if the Senator from Ohio will look at the market reports, he will find that a 5 per cent. bond of the United States, with the interest payable quarterly, is worth about 115¼, so that it cannot include any quarter's interest in the premium. In other words, it is, without the interest, between 1 and 2 per cent. premium in gold this day in the money market at New York, or was a day or two ago. I want to call attention to the fact that this bill as reported proposed to refund the public debt of the United States two years and a half from now into such bonds, and because of the vote to reduce the interest we are stated to be in favor of a permanent depreciation of United States notes.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I have the quotations of the 12th of this month, which show the new United States five per cents to be 115⅝ to 115½, while gold is 112 and a fraction.

Mr. SHERMAN. The question then would be at what time the interest on the new fives is payable.

Mr. ALLISON. They are at a premium necessarily.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am told that there is nearly a quarter's interest due to be deducted from that price. But whether that be so or not, I am very glad the Senator from Iowa has brought out the fact that the 5 per cent. bond is at par in gold. But remember that under the operation of the bill as reported from the Committee on Finance we are not bound to give a bond for the greenbacks. We may pay in coin. The bill as reported from the committee was coin redemption on the 1st of January, 1877. Now it is altered to bond redemption on the 1st of July, 1878.

Mr. MORTON. The coin redemption is left in.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. The option is left with the Secretary of the Treasury to pay coin instead of bonds. That provision remains as it was drawn by the committee. It leaves the option with the Secretary; in case there is coin in the vaults of the Treasury that the paper shall be redeemed in coin instead of bonds; it allows him to exercise his discretion in case he has the gold.

Mr. SHERMAN. But you provide a bond that is not at par in gold, and that you have no fact in our history to show can be maintained at par in gold.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I have quoted from the New York market reports to show that the 5 per cent. now stands enough above par to verify the statement of the Senator from Iowa that a 4½ per cent. bond will be at par in coin by the time fixed.

Mr. SHERMAN. On the contrary, it is just one-ninth less. The difference between a bond running for a period of years is just the difference between 4½ and 5 per cent., which is 10 per cent. If a 5 per cent. bond is worth to-day 102 in gold, taking the statement as true, although there must be some mistake about it, I think, then these bonds are only worth 92.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from Ohio if time is not an element in the value of a bond? Is not a fifteen-year bond at 4½ per cent. worth more than a ten-year bond at 4½ per cent?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. ALLISON. Therefore time is an element. Now, if we fund our debt into 4½ per cent. bonds, it will be known to the holders of those bonds that we are not likely to change that rate until we pay them off; but if we fund this debt into a 5 per cent. bond, there will be a constant apprehension, as the chairman of the Committee on Finance knows perfectly well, in the holders of the bonds that when the ten years expire we shall again seek to refund the 5 per cent. into a bond bearing a lower rate of interest. Thus the five per cents will be always a shade less valuable in proportion than the 4½ per cent. bonds. I see the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BUCKINGHAM] shakes his head. That is the argument made by the Finance Committee. I am only repeating it. It has been made over and over again on every funding bill that has been reported to the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do you believe it yourself?

Mr. ALLISON. I do.

Mr. MERRIMON. I move to amend the proposition of the Senator from New York by striking out all after the word "that" and inserting what I send to the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina moves to amend the amendment of the Senator from New York.

Mr. CONKLING and Mr. EDMUNDS. That is not in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is in order.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Chair be kind enough to state how?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to Rule 12 recently adopted reads as follows:

That Rule 12 be so amended that pending a motion to strike out and insert, the part to be stricken out as well as the part to be inserted shall each be regarded for the purpose of amendment as a question, and motions to amend the part to be stricken out shall have precedence.

The bill stands in this attitude as the Chair understands: The Committee on Finance reported a substitute for the bill, and that has been amended several times. The Senator from New York moves a substitute for the substitute of the committee as amended, which is an amendment to that amendment. The Senator from North Carolina then moved to amend that amendment, which is an amendment in the second degree upon the part proposed to be inserted.

Mr. CONKLING. If I understand the attitude of the question, neither does the rule nor the explanation of the Chair cover this case. If the Senator from North Carolina wants to amend the text of that which I seek to strike out, he is in order. If he seeks to amend the text (in the sense I mean of perfecting the text) of that which I offer, I will not at this moment say he is not in order. But I submit to the Chair that when the committee reported back the House bill and reported an entire substitute for that bill, and a motion is made to strike out the whole of it and amend by inserting other provisions in its place, the process of amendment, speaking of the whole bill, is for the time being exhausted. I wish again to qualify my remark by recognizing the rule which gives the Senator a right to perfect the text before it is stricken out, treating each version of the bill as a question, as the rule says. But that does not impair at all the judgment which I have, with deference to the Chair, that when a motion is made to strike out and insert what the Chair calls a substitute, it is not in order, after the third degree has been reached, to go on. And before taking my seat I suggest that if this be in order, when the Senator has made his motion some other Senator might move to strike out what he has offered and insert something else; and where is it to stop?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It must stop precisely where the rule stops it. The part to be stricken out, which is the original bill, is one thing; the part to be inserted is another thing. Now, each one of these things is by this rule declared to be a question, and each one may be amended in the first and second degree, the amendments offered to the text of the bill taking precedence. Now, the Senator from New York has moved one amendment to that matter which the committee recommend to be inserted. The Senator from North Carolina moves a second amendment, which is precisely what the rule allows. The principle which the Senator from New York is now contending for is precisely what the present occupant of the chair ruled some weeks since; but it gave so much dissatisfaction to some Senators that the rule was amended in that particular by the Senate.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the amendment reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the word "that," in the first line of the pending amendment——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Which amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from New York. This is to strike out all after the first word and to insert what will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the words proposed by Mr. MERRIMON to be inserted, as follows:

That every banking association created under and in pursuance of an act entitled "An act to provide a national currency, secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved June 3, A. D. 1864, be, and the same is hereby, required on or before the 1st day of July, A. D. 1875, to retire from circulation its circulating notes, and surrender the same to be canceled and burned, as now provided by law for the cancellation of mutilated and worn-out circulating notes of such associations; and if such association shall fail so to retire its circulating notes, then it shall be the duty of the Comptroller of the Currency to retire and cancel the same as now provided by law for the redemption of such circulating notes of any such association failing to redeem its circulating notes in United States notes.

SEC. 2. That as fast as $100 of such circulating notes are retired as provided by this act, the Secretary of the Treasury shall issue a like amount of United States notes, similar in all respects to such last-named notes now in circulation, and the United States notes so to be issued shall be used either to purchase or redeem the public debt or to meet the current payment of the expenses of the public service.

SEC. 3. That all laws and clauses of laws imposing a tax on notes of State banks greater than the tax imposed on the circulating notes of national banking associations be, and the same, so far as they provide for such greater tax, are hereby repealed.

SEC. 4. That 50 per cent. of duties on imports may be paid in United States notes.

SEC. 5. That on and after the 1st day of January, 1877, any holder of United States notes to the amount of $1,000, or any multiple thereof, may present them for payment at the office of the Treasurer of the United States, or at the office of the assistant treasurer at the city of New York; and thereupon the Secretary of the Treasury shall, in exchange for said notes, deliver to such holder an equal amount of coupon or registered bonds of the United States in such form as he may prescribe, of denominations of fifty dollars, or some multiple of that sum, redeemable in coin of the present standard value at the pleasure of the United States, after ten years from the date of their issue, and bearing interest payable quarterly in such coin at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum. And the Secretary of the Treasury may reissue the United States notes so received, or, if they are canceled, may issue United States notes to the same amount, either to purchase or redeem the public debt at par in coin or to meet the current payments for the public service. And the said bonds, and the interest thereon, shall be exempt from the payment of all taxes or duties of the United States, as well as from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority; and the said bonds shall have set forth and expressed upon their face the above-specified conditions, and shall, with their coupons, be made payable at the Treasury of the United States: Provided, however, That the Secretary of the Treasury, in lieu of such bonds, may redeem said notes in the gold coin of the United States.

SEC. 6. That the United States legal-tender notes shall be redeemable in gold and silver coin at the Treasury of the United States on and after the 1st day of January, 1878; and for the purpose of providing the necessary fund for that purpose the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and required to reserve and set aside from the surplus revenues the sum of $25,000,000 per annum in gold and silver coin; and if the surplus revenue shall not be sufficient for that purpose, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to sell any part of $100,000,000 of 5 per cent. twenty-year gold-bearing bonds, at not less than par, for the purpose of procuring coin at the rate of $25,000,000 per annum, the same to be applied as herein provided.

SEC. 7. That on and after the —— day of ——, A. D. 187—, the fractional notes of the United States, commonly called "fractional currency," shall be redeemed at the Treasury and the subtreasuries of the United States in silver coin; and such notes so redeemed shall be canceled and account of the same kept, and they shall not be reissued.

Mr. CONKLING. Wishing to conform to the ruling of the Chair, I beg to inquire whether I am right in understanding the Chair to say that amendments to the text of the bill were entitled to precedence?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly; the rule expressly so declares.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I offer the amendment which I send to the table, and offer it as an amendment to the original text of the bill, to come in as I have marked it, after the word "that," following the enacting clause.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York proposes to amend the part of the bill moved to be stricken out by the Committee on Finance, which takes precedence over the amendments pending to perfect the portion intended to be substituted. The amendment will be read.

Mr. CONKLING. To relieve the Senate from hearing it read, I will state that it is exactly the amendment which I offered a few moments ago to the bill reported as a substitute by the Committee on Finance, there being a change of only one word; and that change I did not make to render it competent, because it is in order without any change. I offer it, my purpose being to obtain, if I can by a modest exercise of perseverance and patience, a square vote upon the proposal to take from the States in excess and give to the States in deficiency this currency in respect of which there has been so much clamor. Therefore, although the amendment is not repeated for substance, it is repeated for form, in order that under the ruling of the Chair the Senate may be brought to a square vote upon this proposition.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont will state the point of order.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. It is that the proposition of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] is a revenue bill. It proposes to repeal the tax of 10 per cent. on the issues of State banks; it also proposes that one-half of the revenue from customs duties shall be paid in legal-tender notes, which would have the effect of reducing the tariff at the present time 6 per cent. or one-half of the amount collected through the premium on gold. I suppose it will not be contended on the part of any Senator that a proposition of this kind is not to all intents and purposes a revenue bill, which the Senate cannot originate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. THURMAN. I agree with the Chair in overruling the point of order. I do not think it is a question of order at all. But it will be recollected that when the former bill was pending I offered an amendment providing that a certain portion of the customs duties could be paid in legal-tenders, and many Senators belonging to the majority on that bill declared themselves in favor of the proposition, but objected to it because they said the House of Representatives would object to that as a revenue measure, and that it would kill the bill in the House of Representatives if my proposition were adopted. So they voted against it, while they declared themselves to be in favor of the proposition in the abstract. They said that it ought not to originate in the Senate, because if it did it would kill the bill in the House. Well, sir, if that was good reasoning then it is good reasoning now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish the Senator from New York would withdraw his amendment to the text. I want to move to amend the fifth section of the bill myself, but his amendment covers the whole ground.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator will indicate his amendment, I may withdraw mine for that purpose.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My proposition is to amend the original text of the bill in the fifth section by so changing it as to require the banks to keep only one-half of their lawful-money reserves in their own vaults, instead of the whole, as the fifth section prescribes.

Mr. CONKLING. I have no objection to that, and I withdraw my amendment for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York withdraws his amendment to the text of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to insert after the word "keep," in the third line of the fifth section of the House bill the words "one-half of;" so as to read:

That each of the said associations shall keep one-half of its lawful-money reserves within its own vaults at the place where its operations of discount and deposit are carried on.

Mr. CONKLING. Now I renew my amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; let me have a vote on this.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York moves to amend the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is that in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I give it up. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that the surprise of the Senator from Vermont is very natural, as he was not here at the time the discussion on this question took place which resulted in an amendment of Rule 12 of the Senate. The Chair entertained precisely the view of amendments that has been claimed to-day by the Senator from New York and that is now claimed so earnestly by the Senator from Vermont, and the Chair so ruled; but some Senators were much disaffected with the ruling; and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] asserted that the appropriation bills never could be carried through the Senate on any such principle, and that the law was the other way; and thereupon the Senate passed this amendment to the twelfth rule, which undoubtedly changes the rule entirely, and makes four amendments instead of two in order before the Senate; and the Chair has now ruled what the new rule requires.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I submit with all deference to the decision of the Chair, as I always do when I cannot help it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can appeal from the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; I think under this amendment to the rules the ruling of the Chair as to the text of the bill is right. I do not see any help for it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In that case the Chair would not advise an appeal. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALLISON. As I had some little controversy with my friend from Ohio across the way as to the relative value of the United States new fives, I have obtained the quotations of to-day. The new fives are 115⅝ with thirteen days' interest accrued. Gold is 112¼. So I think the premium will be found to be a little over 2 per cent.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am in hopes the Secretary of the Treasury, if he has not found that out before, will at once act upon that and fund promptly and rapidly the 6 per cent. bonds.

Mr. ALLISON. I have hoped so for some time, but he does not seem to act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment moved by the Senator from New York to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. HOWE. I want to say a word about that amendment. I am in a most unfortunate predicament, and have been ever since this financial debate commenced. I seem to be outside of all healthy organizations. [Laughter.] That is embarrassing. I could get along with that, however, if it did not seem to me that everybody else was outside of all healthy organizations. I cannot vote for the amendment of the Senator from New York, and I presume there are a great many who cannot; and strange to say my reason for not voting for it is not what honest men would generally assume it to be, that it is a sort of robbery of one section of the country. I have got past all scruples of that sort. The time was when I had scruples about even larceny; but I have gotten over all that on these questions.

Mr. President, it is offered as a substitute for another proposition. I sympathize fully with the sentiment of the Senator from Ohio that it is a great reproach to our laws that this privilege of issuing notes and circulating them as money is now a monopoly. I agree that it is a reproach that a very large part of that privilege is enjoyed by one section of the country to the exclusion of other sections, and I know that it occasions a great deal of complaint. I know that this measure moved by the Senator from New York will remove that complaint for a while—will postpone it.

Mr. MORTON. Simply transfer it.

Mr. HOWE. Yes. It is very likely to create another complaint.

It may heal a sore in one part of the country; but, in spite of the magnanimity exhibited here by representatives from the East, I have no sufficient assurance that it will not leave a sore right there. But as a choice of means for removing this reproach aimed at by the Senator from New York I do not think this is so wise, then, as the bill as it now lies on your table. That does not withdraw any privileges, any franchise from anybody. It simply extends this privilege of banking to all portions of the country without restrictions. You say that that embarks us on a bottomless sea of inflation. In one sense it does; and in another it does not. There will be no restriction upon the privilege of banking corporations to issue notes; but it must be remembered that every one of them will have to give ample security for the redemption of its notes. In what? Not in coin, which I am sorry to say we cannot expect as long as you keep your paper afloat, which your law declares to be a legal tender for all debts; but they agree to give ample security that they will convert all these notes in just that kind of money now received in payment for all debts, and it must be remembered that under the operation of this bill every one of these legal-tender notes will be a little better than it is to-day. That is a great fact. You will have an increased paper circulation, convertible as your present paper circulation is, and also convertible into something worth more than anything into which you can convert your present circulation.

I am profoundly sorry that you do not consent to make that lawful money even better than it will be made under the operation of this bill. I regret extremely that you reduced the 50 per cent. to 25 per cent. Still if you reduce it 25 per cent. it will make it a little better. You have got to give a great deal, I know, to get rid of a little; but I have come to the conclusion that you had better pay the price. Feeling as I do that you never can have a healthy financial system until you get rid of this stuff which you call money, and which you make a legal tender and a substitute for real money; believing that the first step is to get rid of that, I have come to the conclusion to make almost any sacrifice to induce the banks to give it up, for I think they are the ones who stand in the way to-day. I am not sure but that I would consent to work for them by the day before long if they will not consent to give it up on any other terms. Therefore I think I would rather take the bill as it stands, providing only for a redemption of twenty-five cents in legal-tenders so often as one hundred cents of bank notes go out. That will begin to appreciate that kind of paper. I think no Senator will deny that. That is desirable. My honorable friend over the way [Mr. THURMAN] shakes his head vehemently.

Mr. THURMAN. My friend cannot consider me as a chief justice of the common pleas did Sir Bartholomew Shower, who being at bar and having shaken his head, the chief justice said, "the learned counsel might shake again, but the law is even so." The Senator cannot say that to me when he asserts that if we issue four paper dollars for one that we withdraw from circulation we are getting nearer to specie payments.

Mr. HOWE. I did not say any such thing as that we were getting nearer to specie payments by it. I said that for every dollar of legal-tenders you withdraw you appreciate the balance. Is there any doubt about that?

Mr. THURMAN. I say that if you issue four dollars in paper money for one dollar that you withdraw, you depreciate the whole mass of the paper money.

Mr. HOWE. That is quite doubtful, I think; but if I am mistaken in my mathematics, if I am mistaken in supposing that the less you have of these legal-tenders the better they are, the nearer they approximate to coin in value, I will give up reasoning on this subject. I do not know why you had better not add to this. When the proposition was to increase the amount there was not any difference between the Senator from Ohio and myself. We then both agreed that to add to the amount was to depreciate the value. I do not see why he and I should divide on the counter proposition, why he and I cannot agree on the counter proposition that to diminish the amount is to appreciate the value. So, therefore, I am obliged to part company with my honorable friend from New York; I shall feel lonely until I get back again; but I had better leave him now.

Mr. BOUTWELL. If I understood the statement of the Senator from Wisconsin, I beg leave to differ with him in one particular. I do not admit that the reduction of the volume of United States notes and at the same time an equal increase in the volume of bank-notes appreciates the currency of the country. Substantially the whole volume remaining the same, the price of gold—other things being equal—would remain the same. There can be no doubt about that. For all the purposes of business, the two classes of currency are substantially the same thing, and therefore I feared that this bill as it was reported from the committee was a bill for inflation; I am sure that it is now; and as I am opposed to every form of inflation as postponing the day when we can resume specie payments or bring up paper money to an equality with gold, I am opposed to every movement in that direction; and I am sure that every such movement is fraught with evils to which those that we now suffer are not to be compared, and we move in a direction from which ultimately we shall be obliged to retreat, and at an immense cost of revenues, of public prosperity, of individual and public wealth.

The real fact is that we have to-day and have had since 1862 more paper money than the country could carry and keep it at an equality with gold. That is demonstrated by the continuing fact of its depreciation, and that which has been the effect in times past, circumstances remaining the same though differing in degree, will continue to be the effect hereafter. Therefore, if we are in favor of measures direct and specific for the resumption of specie payment, there is but one measure that has any value in it, and that is to contract the volume of paper money. As is well known, I am in favor of holding the volume where it is; but I would much prefer to contract it than to expand it.

Now one word as to the proposition submitted by the Senator from New York. I do not accept as true that the North and the East are in any degree chargeable with wrong-doing from the circumstance that they have now more than their proportion, whether measured by population or by wealth, of the banking circulation of the country. They took it at a time when other sections of the country were either not prepared or not willing to undertake the business. But, after all, there is such an element of justice in the demand for equalizing the bank circulation of the country, and as it is an alternative measure against inflation, I am sure that all that section of the country, and especially the people whom it is my honor to represent, would much prefer (although it would be attended with some evils for the moment) a transfer of the surplus from time to time from the North and East to the South and West. For one, I am prepared to accept that as a measure which will furnish banking facilities for the South and West for the present—and by the present I mean, probably, from one to two years—and in the mean time, with a difference of condition growing out of the increasing prosperity of the country, we can then consider, or our successors can consider, whether that policy shall be further pursued or not. But a system of free banking without a specie basis is a system of inflation, a system of waste, and of ultimate ruin.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. President, before the vote is taken on the amendment of the Senator from New York, as I voted for it once, I desire to say a word——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair asks the Senator to suspend for a moment that the Chair may explain the status of this question. In the first place, here is a bill. The committee reported a substitute; that is, reported to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and insert certain other matter. Now, by way of perfecting the part to be stricken out, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] moved to amend the fifth section. Thereupon the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] offered an amendment which the Chair understood to be an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, and ruled it to be in order. Since that ruling was made, however, the Chair has examined the amendment of the Senator from New York and finds that it is not an amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont, but an independent motion to strike out the whole bill, which motion is already pending on the recommendation of the committee, and is the principal question now before the body. Therefore the Chair is of opinion that for that reason the amendment of the Senator from New York is not in order, and that the motion made by the Senator from Vermont is the pending question.

Mr. CONKLING. Then, Mr. President, I must ask the Senator from Vermont to release me from the improvident acquiescence that I gave to his request to withdraw my amendment to enable him to offer his. I ask him now to withdraw his amendment, to the end that I may be put in statu quo.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am induced to do that from the fact that if we were to wait half an hour longer I should begin to find that my own amendment was not in order, and we should have lost half an hour in discussing it. I will withdraw that, and if I have the power I will withdraw the bill itself in order to get a vote.

Mr. CONKLING. Then my amendment is in order, I think.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks not, and for this reason: The principal question now pending is whether this bill shall be stricken out and something else inserted in place of it. Now, this rule provides that in such case the bill itself and the matter proposed to be inserted shall each, for the purpose of amendment, be regarded as a question; but that the amendments offered for the purpose of perfecting the text shall have precedence over those offered to perfect the substitute. Now, any amendment which changes the language of the original text, leaving some part of the original text, is undoubtedly in order, because that is perfecting the text; but a motion to strike it out altogether is not in order, because that is the motion now pending on the report of the committee.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I change my amendment thus: I move to strike out the substitute reported by the committee, commencing with the beginning of the second section. The first section of that substitute, after the fashion of English legislation, gives a title to the national-bank act of 1864. I think that is convenient; and therefore I make no war upon that; but I move to strike out the residue of the matter reported by the committee to be inserted, commencing after that, and to insert the amendment which I have sent to the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To strike out all after the first section of the substitute?

Mr. CONKLING. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is out of order at present. Does the Chair understand the Senator from New York to modify the amendment which he offered before to the substitute?

Mr. CONKLING. I am trying to hear the Chair, but I am unable to do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair inquires whether the Senator from New York now proposes to modify the amendment which he has already proposed, and which is pending to the substitute, by retaining part of it?

Mr. CONKLING. I have offered two amendments, both of which, if they were both in order, would be pending. The amendment which I offered first being an amendment to the report of the committee, I have not withdrawn, modified, or disturbed; nor do I wish to do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the limit of amendment in that line is exhausted.

Mr. CONKLING. As to what the committee has reported? The original text remains open to amendment, does it not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. Does it not remain open to a motion to strike it out?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The whole of it?

Mr. CONKLING. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. CONKLING. Then will the Chair inform me to what the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina is pending?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the Senator from New York first moved an amendment to the substitute; that thereupon the Senator from North Carolina moved an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from New York. The Senator from New York then, not withdrawing his amendment to the substitute, offered another amendment to the text of the bill, which the Chair has ruled out of order. Now here is the bill; the committee recommend that it all be stricken out and certain matter inserted. The Senator from New York moved an amendment several minutes ago, which is still pending, to amend that substitute; and the Senator from North Carolina has made a subsequent motion which the Chair understands to be an amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from New York.

Mr. CONKLING. Now is the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina amendable?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not. That is the second amendment to the question.

Mr. CONKLING. Is the bill in any of its phases open to amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill may be amended in any way with a view to perfect it; but a motion to strike it out altogether is not in order, because that does not perfect the bill.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I offer the amendment which lies on the table of the Secretary as an addition to the bill; and I say to those who with me are striving to get a vote on this question if we can——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion is in order.

Mr. CONKLING. O, yes, sir; there are several ways by which I think under the ruling of the Chair we can get a vote, and I am going to try them all myself if I live and can find them out. Therefore I move now to add my amendment to the text of the bill, saying to those who like me want to appease the shrieks of locality and do away with this great injustice under which States are languishing, that if this amendment prevails, I will then move to strike out the text to which it is to be added, so that everybody will now under the ruling of the Chair have an opportunity to vote for the proposition per se with all its merits and all its imperfections on its head, just as if it had been in order, as I should have died believing it was but for what the Chair has told me, to offer it as a substitute, because after it prevails I shall move to strike out what goes before it and that will leave it standing; so that now my motion is to add it to the text of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that motion is in order.

Mr. MERRIMON. What becomes of the substitute offered by the Senator from New York?

Mr. CONKLING. That is pending. That is another amendment.

Mr. MERRIMON. But it is the same proposition.

Mr. CONKLING. I am trying to use a double-barreled gun in firing at my mark. That amendment is still pending; and offering a separate amendment like that except that it differs in one word, I now address myself to the original text of the bill by way of addition.

Mr. MERRIMON. But is it competent for the Senator from New York to use a double-barreled gun? [Laughter.]

Mr. TIPTON. If it is parliamentary and admissible, I will claim the privilege of understanding that the proposition of the Senator from New York contemplates no addition of one single dollar to the present amount of currency; and therefore I shall vote against it.

Mr. WRIGHT. I was about to say when the point of order was raised that I understood then the question before the Senate to be on the substitute of the Senator from New York. It being decided that the substitute is not before the Senate, it is now before the Senate in the nature of an addition to the pending bill, with the avowed purpose on the part of the Senator from New York to move to strike out the rest of the bill and leave this as the only bill which is to be passed on this subject. I therefore trust that the friends of the bill as it stands now will understand the question precisely as it is, so that no one shall be deceived. It is a plain, straightforward proposition to add this to the bill, and then move to strike out all of the bill except the addition.

I have just this to say: I want a vote on the question at once. If it be true of the bill now before the Senate, and perfected as far as we have gone, as was said by the Senator from Ohio farthest from me, [Mr. THURMAN,] that no sensible man can ever expect that it will become a law, we have a statute on the book already which gives the very distribution that is contemplated by this addition. I trust, therefore, that no one will be deceived by this proposed amendment.

Mr. THURMAN. We have a statute for the redistribution of some portion of this currency, $25,000,000, I think. This amendment of the Senator from New York proposes $46,000,000. The statute for the redistribution of $25,000,000 has been found impossible of execution. This amendment of the Senator from New York removes all impossibilities or obstacles to its execution. There is the difference between the two.

But, Mr. President, I must address myself a little to the Chair on these rulings which have quite passed my comprehension, I must be allowed to say. The Senator from New York moved to strike out all the original text of this bill after the word "that," in the first section, and insert other matter in lieu of the matter stricken out, and the Chair rules that that is not in order because——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is mistaken, or the Chair is, as to the motion of the Senator from New York. The Chair understood it to be a motion simply to strike out the whole bill.

Mr. THURMAN. No, sir; the Senator from New York moved, as I understood, to strike out all after the word "that," and insert precisely the same proposition which he had offered before to the substitute of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not so understand it.

Mr. THURMAN. I thought the Chair could not have so understood.

Mr. CONKLING. May I be allowed to inquire what was the understanding of the Chair?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has stated it five or six times; and cannot make it plainer by restating it.

Mr. CONKLING. I was not asking the Chair to restate his ruling. I understood the Chair to observe that he did not understand that the Senator from New York offered the same amendment and offered it as just stated by the Senator from Ohio. Upon that point I beg to inquire what I was understood to be attempting to do?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the motion of the Senator from New York is to add the matter which he sends to the desk.

Mr. THURMAN. That is the subsequent motion.

Mr. CONKLING. That is the last version which was given it; but the Senator from Ohio was speaking of what I first offered, if the Chair will allow me; and he stated it precisely as I endeavored to state it, precisely as I should have stated it had I known how, precisely as I never doubted the Chair understood it until the Chair stated that he did not so understand. If I can find out what I have moved myself, that will be a triumph of art that we have not reached so far in these various rulings.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state his understanding of it. He understands that in the first place the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] after we left the substitute and came to the bill, moved to amend a certain section. The Senator from New York, as the Chair understood him, moved to strike out all of the bill. The Chair ruled that out of order because it was not an amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont. Thereupon, as the Chair understood, the Senator from Vermont being appealed to, withdrew his amendment, and thereupon the Senator from New York moved to add the same matter to the text of the bill as an addition to it, which the Chair ruled to be in order.

Mr. THURMAN. The Chair has forgotten that before the Senator from New York moved to add this matter to the text of the bill, he moved to strike out all of the text of the bill after the first word "that," and to insert the matter which he had before moved to insert as a substitute for the report of the committee. That is the real fact of the case.

Let us take this matter chronologically; and I hope I am not trespassing, for we ought to get to the right rule on this subject. The first motion made by the Senator from New York was to strike out all of the substitute reported by the committee after the first word "That," and to insert the sections submitted by him. That was his first motion, as I understood him. The next motion made was by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] to amend the amendment offered by the Senator from New York. A question was made by the Senator from New York whether that amendment was in order. The Chair ruled that it was, and in my judgment very properly, because as I understand this rule the original text of the bill is one text, and the substitute reported by the committee is another text, and each may be amended in the second degree; but in putting the questions the question on amending the original text has precedence. That I understand to be the rule. Now, the Senator from North Carolina having moved his amendment the Senator from Vermont rose and asked the Senator from New York to withdraw his amendment in order to allow him to offer an amendment. The Senator from New York acceded to the request and withdrew his amendment, without any objection being made to his doing so. Therefore it was withdrawn. Thereupon the Senator from Vermont offered his amendment, and then the Senator from New York offered his amendment, which he had before offered as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont; that was precisely the way of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. And the Chair ruled it out of order on the ground that it was not an amendment to the amendment, but was an independent proposition to strike out the whole bill.

Mr. THURMAN. I am stating exactly how it was offered. Then some debate went on. The Chair ruled that it was not an amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont, and not being so it was not in order as an amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont. Thereupon the Senator from New York moved to strike out all of the original text after the word "That," and insert the sections which he had before offered. That was his motion; and the Chair ruled, as I understood it, that that was not in order on the ground that that was not perfecting the original text. That struck me——

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will allow me right there, the ruling of the Chair was this: not that it was not perfecting the text, but because the motion was already pending before the Senate to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and insert what was reported by the committee.

Mr. THURMAN. Not at all, because the very rule allows you to perfect the text first and gives precedence to such a motion. Now, it appears that the Chair misunderstood the motion made by the Senator from New York, because certainly the Chair could never have intended to rule that striking out all of the original text after the word "That" and inserting other matter in lieu of it was not a lawful mode of perfecting the original text. How could the Chair decide that it was not reinstating the original text with the change of but a single word, striking out all after the word "That" and inserting the same matter with the change of a single word? Certainly it is not for the Chair to decide how much the change is or how little it is that is made. A motion to strike out all after the word "That" and insert the original text is a motion to perfect the original text. That I do not understand to be controverted. But as I understand now, the Chair did not apprehend that it was a motion to strike out all after the word "That" and insert, but that it was a motion to strike out the entire original bill, which would have been a wholly different motion. It seems to me, therefore, that the Chair must see that the motion made by the Senator from New York to strike all after the word "That" in the original text and insert his amendment was a perfectly proper motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Chair did see it he could not help it at present, because there is no point of order now raised; but the Chair does not see it. We started out with a bill and the proposition of the committee to strike out all of the bill and insert certain other matter. Now, what is the effect of such a motion as the Senator from Ohio says the Senator from New York made, to strike out all of the bill and insert something else? That is in substance merely moving to amend the substitute which is to be placed for the original bill on the recommendation of the committee. The committee had previously recommended that the original bill after the enacting clause should be stricken out; and the question before the Senate on that recommendation was, Shall the whole bill be stricken out and certain matter inserted? The motion of the Senator from New York, in effect, was to strike out the same thing and insert other matter than that which the committee recommended to be inserted; that is to say, his motion was to change, that is to amend, the matter to be inserted. The Senator from New York already had his motion pending to amend the substitute, and it is pending now, and the Senate will return to it whenever the amendments on the bill are finished.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As this discussion seems to be as valuable to the country as any that can be had on this subject, I should like to continue it a little on this question of order; and inasmuch as the rules allow a discussion of the general subject to bring up anything for debate, of course the discussion of a point of order is perfectly proper.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will simply say that there is no point of order pending.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, sir; I am discussing the bill itself, and upon that, to illustrate the propriety of the bill, I propose to discuss the question of order, with the permission of the Chair, as that has been allowed hitherto on all manner of topics. I do not think it ought to be the law, but it is.

Now, Mr. President, I respectfully differ from the opinion of the Chair, and merely as matter of principle, because it is of no consequence here. It is impossible to avoid coming to a vote all around on each one of these propositions. No amount of ingenuity can escape that at last. But as a question of principle I wish to suggest to the Senate, where there is an amendment like the one I offered to the fifth section of the bill, for the Chair to hold as a matter of order that another amendment in lieu of that which goes to the whole bill, if you please, cannot be received because it is an entirely independent proposition, is a ruling which cannot be upheld.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Can two motions be made to amend the bill at the same time, one to amend the first section and one to amend the fourth section, and both be pending at once?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, sir; I will say they cannot for the sake of the argument; but that does not happen to be the motion, and it does not, in my judgment, fall within the province of the Presiding Officer to decide what motions Senators shall make within the rules, and a motion to amend another motion by the rules is allowable. It may suit the judgment of the Chair as perfecting the bill, or it may not. It would depend in the opinion of the Chair upon what its merits were, using the term "perfection" in its proper sense. The Chair may think the motion of the Senator from New York to propose something else in place of what I propose as an amendment to my proposition is an advantage to the bill, or he may not. Now, if the Senate has reached a point, or any deliberative body has reached a point where it is within the province of the Chair to decide upon the orderly propriety of an amendment according to his notions of whether its effect would be advantageous or disadvantageous, then I must say we have reposed more power in the Presiding Officer than I should be willing to repose in any except the present one.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator will excuse the Chair for a moment, the Chair never entertained any such thought and said no word which justifies any suspicion that he did.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I express no suspicion; quite the reverse. I beg the President not to misunderstand me. I am not expressing any suspicion, because I have none. That is the last thing in my mind. I am speaking of the precise question which the Chair has taken the liberty, and very properly, to express his opinion upon to the Senate when no motion was pending on the subject; and that is, that I, having a motion pending to amend the fifth section of the bill, the Senator from New York had a perfect parliamentary right to move to amend that motion of mine; and that I believe the Chair agrees to. Then the question is, how shall he amend it? He says, "I will amend it by substituting in place of that a motion which goes not only to that section," to which my motion applies, "but to all the other sections except one word in them." Now, then, the Chair holds that it is within the province of the Presiding Officer to determine whether that is an amendment to my amendment or not. When you look at the Journal you will find that in form it is. Therefore it drives the Chair to determine as a question of substance, whether substantially the amendment in the second degree is one which relates precisely to the subject of the amendment in the first degree. That, I respectfully submit, is not within the province of the Chair to decide, because all the books on the subject, as all our experience, show that sometimes it is the object of an amendment to so distort the first amendment as to show that it will produce a result entirely different from that which the mover of the first amendment intended, to make it absurd if you please; but the Chair never can determine that an amendment is out of order because it is absurd. It might keep the Chair very busy indeed if it did that. That is not within the province of the Chair, and I am sure the Chair would agree with me on that subject.

That being the case, if the Senator from New York chooses to move "to amend the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont, by striking out the provision that he proposes to strike out, and else the text to which it relates, and to insert in lieu of it" something else which is entirely different, it is in order; because it is one of the objects of an amendment, whether made in good faith or in bad faith, for that does not touch the question, to change the proposition as it would stand if the amendment were not proposed. Amendments are not proposed to do the same thing that already stands in the bill; amendments are proposed to make changes.

Now, suppose I had moved to strike out section 5, or had moved to strike out all the sections but the first section, can it be doubted by anybody that the Senator from New York would have been entitled to move as an amendment to that amendment, instead of that to strike out the whole of the sections and insert something different, so as to make the proposition in his judgment more acceptable to the Senate and better for the public interest? That has never been questioned. Then are we to say as a matter of order that the question of the allowability of an amendment in the second degree depends upon the extent of the first amendment? That has not been the practice of the Senate; it has not been the practice of any legislative body; it is not within any rule.

The rule only says that you may move an amendment to an amendment already pending. Whether that amendment is broad or narrow is a question for the Senate to determine in voting it in or in voting it out. It is not a question of order for the Chair to determine, whether he will entertain it because it may change the proposition or may not. That I respectfully submit, I beg the Chair to believe me when I say with entire respect for the sincerity of the judgment of the Chair in pronouncing his opinion.

Mr. MORTON. I understand there is no point of order before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands not.

Mr. MORTON. Discussions of rules and points of order are always interesting, especially when there is no point of order pending, because they come then simply in the way of general instruction and edification. I think gentlemen who have paid great attention to points of order and spent much time in understanding them ought to have frequent opportunities of making a proper exhibition of the knowledge that has been acquired.

When this question comes up for a vote I shall desire to say a few words in reply to the Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I propose to discuss the main question now, with the gentle permission of the Senator from Indiana, who kindly delivers a lecture to the Chair and to the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from New York and myself on the subject of points of order; and he certainly makes the very proper proposition that those gentlemen who understand points of order, or think they do, should have a frequent opportunity of airing them. That is perfectly true, because if it were not so the Senate would not here stand upon an equality. Gentlemen who from their extensive reading on subjects of finance and the high respect they are known to have for all writers on that subject, and the thorough acquaintance that they have with the philosophy of the social economies and of the wealth of nations, &c., are sometimes allowed, I believe, to express themselves quite frequently upon that topic; and when they do, not only the Senate but the wide world listens, not merely with satisfaction but with delight, to that kind of theory which declares that we are to send the books I believe to the dogs—I have forgotten the expression—and to take to the first impulses of nature.

Of course, Mr. President, that is perfectly right, and I do not blame the Senator from Indiana for taking frequent opportunity to express his views upon every phase of the philosophy of the Government as it respects finance; but he ought not to be envious of smaller people than himself who do not understand such subjects but only contribute the little knowledge they have upon mere points of order and the rules of the Senate. If I and the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from New York had studied the subject of the wealth of nations and the value of paper currency and its effects upon the progress of the world in history as much as the Senator from Indiana, we should be enabled undoubtedly to enlighten the world, as he has, and perhaps we should vote as he does; but as we do not pretend to any such thing, he ought to allow us the poor privilege of exercising our minds now and then upon these little rules of the Senate of which we have some faint conception.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING.]

Mr. CONKLING. May we have the yeas and nays on that?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CRAGIN. Upon all questions in relation to this bill I am paired with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. LEWIS.]

Mr. INGALLS. My pair with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] prevents me from voting "nay" on this proposition.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Upon all questions relative to this bill I am for to-day paired with the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. PEASE.] If he were present he would vote "nay," and I should vote "yea."

The question being taken by yeas and nays resulted—yeas 27, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Bogy, Boutwell, Buckingham, Conkling, Cooper, Davis, Edmunds, Fenton, Flanagan, Gilbert, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Jones, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Sargent, Saulsbury, Schurz, Scott, Sherman, Stewart, Stockton, Thurman, and Washburn—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Boreman, Carpenter, Clayton, Dennis, Dorsey, Ferry of Michigan, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Harvey, Howe, Johnston, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morton, Ogleaby, Patterson, Pratt, Ramsey, Ransom, Robertson, Spencer, Sprague, Tipton, Windom, and Wright—29.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brownlow, Cameron, Chandler, Conover, Cragin, Ferry of Connecticut, Frelinghuysen, Hager, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Kelly, Lewis, Norwood, Pease, Stevenson, Wadleigh, and West—17.

So the amendment of Mr. CONKLING was rejected.

Mr. WRIGHT. I offer an amendment to the substitute reported by the committee, which I send to the desk.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suppose that is in order. Everything appears to be in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the status of the question now to be this: returning to the substitute, the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] has the first amendment pending. To that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] has an amendment pending, which exhausts the amendments that can be pending at the same time in that line.

Mr. WRIGHT. Do I understand those are amendments to the original bill or to the substitute?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To the substitute.

Mr. WRIGHT. Then I give notice that I shall offer the amendment which I have sent to the desk.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be reported for information. We shall all vote for it no doubt.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the proposed amendment, which was in section 9, lines 15 and 16, to strike out the word "may" and insert the word "shall;" so as to make the clause read:

And the Secretary shall reissue the United States notes so received, or, if they are canceled, shall issue United States notes to the same amount, &c.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] to the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] to the substitute of the committee.

Mr. MERRIMON. I have but a word or two to say in explanation of the amendment which I have offered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear that amendment reported again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be again reported.

The Chief Clerk again read the amendment of Mr. MERRIMON.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, I will say just now that it would have given me pleasure to vote for the proposition of the Senator from New York if I could not do any better in the interest of the section of the Union which I represent; but we have a fair prospect that we shall get something better than that, and therefore I voted against his proposition.

The scope of the amendment which I have offered and which is about to be voted upon, is to wipe out the whole national banking system, to retire the national-bank circulation and substitute for it United States Treasury notes, and to adopt such a policy as will tend to appreciate United States notes to the standard value of gold and silver and also to virtually give the States permission to organize State-bank systems if they see fit to do so, making either these Treasury notes, or any other security they may see fit, the basis of such banking systems as they may adopt.

In my judgment there are many very serious objections to the present national banking system, into which I do not propose to go at the present time. I will content myself by saying—I have had occasion to advert to it on former occasions in the Senate—that it is a vast monopoly, upheld at the expense of the American people; that it confers favor and pecuniary advantage on comparatively few; that such favored few realize vast profits that the people ought to realize and that ought to go in the interests of industry rather than in the interests of the capitalists of the country.

These national banks receive from the Government annually interest amounting to about $24,000,000 in round numbers. If the system should be struck down, as I propose, and United States notes substituted for the national currency, the Government would save, in the way of interest upon the public debt, $21,000,000 annually; and it seems to me it is as well to save that amount.

Under the present national banking system any person who owns $100,000 of national bonds may deposit them with the Treasurer of the United States, receive the interest annually upon that sum, 6 per cent. and in gold at that, and not only that, receive 90 per cent. in currency, for which he pays nothing at all or perhaps a slight tax. I see no reason why this advantage should be conferred upon any particular class of the American people and much less the capitalists of the country, to the prejudice of those who carry on the great industries of the country.

Then, sir, this national banking system is more or less under political influences, inasmuch as it is so closely allied with the Government. I am utterly opposed to allowing political parties to influence the monetary interests of the country. The business men of the country ought to determine the banking interests, what measure of currency is necessary, and the character of the currency. It seems to me all the Government ought to do is to grant charters to banking associations and restrain capital in that way, but that capital ought to be entirely free and independent of political influences, whether those influences come from one direction or from another or from one party or from another.

To this great end is the first section of the proposed amendment. It provides for retiring all the national currency that is now in circulation throughout the Union.

The second section provides for substituting United States Treasury notes for that national currency, and this end is to be accomplished, if the banks shall surrender their circulation, by the 1st day of July, 1875. If they will not do it, then the Comptroller of the Currency is to compel them to do it within as short a time as it is possible for him to do it after that; and as $100 of the national currency is retired, the Treasurer is required to issue a like amount of United States Treasury notes, so that the volume of circulation of the country is not thereby decreased.

The third section provides a repeal of all acts of Congress which impose a tax upon the circulation of State banks greater than the tax imposed upon the circulation of national banks.

The fourth section provides that 50 per cent. of the duties on imports may be paid in United States notes. The object of that is to appreciate the United States notes and to bring them up to the gold standard as soon as may be.

The fifth section is the ninth section of the substitute reported by the Committee on Finance for the pending bill. That is another measure in the interest of specie payments, or rather a measure with a view to appreciate greenbacks to gold.

The sixth section is for the like purpose. In order to return to specie payments we are obliged to prepare to that end, and therefore the sixth section provides for an accumulation of gold in the Treasury, $25,000,000 per annum. That gold is secured from the surplus revenues, if there shall be such, and if there is none, then the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to sell 5 per cent. bonds until that amount is accumulated in the Treasury for four years.

The seventh section provides for retiring the fractional currency in circulation.

It seems to me, Mr. President, if this measure should prevail and the currency of the country would be United States notes, there could be no complaint of monopoly; there could be no complaint of political influences; the vast sum of $21,000,000 would be saved annually; the people of the several States would be allowed to organize local banks and have a local currency for their own convenience, and to promote local industries without any let or hinderance on the part of the United States.

If the objection should be raised that this is too great a volume of greenbacks and therefore they would be depreciated, it seems to me there is no force in that, for the Government is as good for $800,000,000 as it is for $400,000,000. Nobody doubts the solvency of the Government; nobody lacks faith in the Government. The only great end that need be looked to in case this substitute should go into operation is to appreciate the greenbacks to the standard of gold. These measures provided for that end I am sure would have a strong tendency in that direction. They might not have the desired effect, but if they should fall short of it Congress at some future period could go on and provide other means looking to the same end until the end should be attained.

There can be no doubt about the power of Congress to displace the national-bank system in the way and manner I have provided in this amendment, for it is provided in the sixty-fourth section of the act mentioned in the first section of the amendment in these words:

That Congress may at any time amend, alter, or repeal this act.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to say but one word before the vote is taken on the amendment. I concur entirely in many of the views expressed by the Senator from North Carolina, as I have often said, upon the general question as between greenbacks and national-bank paper; but I suggest to my good friend that at this time the bill is almost perfected as it stands, and this is perhaps not an opportune moment to present that question, especially in view of the many sections contained in the amendment. While I am in favor of the general principle, I shall feel constrained to vote against the amendment in view of the present condition of the bill, and I trust it will not carry.

Mr. MERRIMON. I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. THURMAN. I shall vote on this question without the slightest reference to the relative merits of greenbacks and national-bank notes. If this amendment be adopted there is an end of this bill. Everybody knows that. If this amendment be voted down and the amendment of the Senator from New York be adopted, then the South and the West will get such relief as is afforded by $46,000,000 more bank currency.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] to the amendment of the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING.]

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. PEASE;] but believing that he would vote "nay" on this proposition, I shall also vote "nay."

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. As an amendment to this bill, I will vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 8, nays 43; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Cooper, Dennis, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, McCreery, Merrimon, and Ransom—8.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Bogy, Boreman, Boutwell, Buckingham, Cameron, Carpenter, Clayton, Conkling, Davis, Edmunds, Fenton, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Hager, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Johnston, Logan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Patterson, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Sargent, Scott, Sherman, Sprague, Stockton, Thurman, Tipton, Wadleigh, Washburn, Windom, and Wright—43.

ABSENT—Messrs. Allison, Bayard, Brownlow, Chandler, Conover, Cragin, Dorsey, Ferry of Connecticut, Frelinghuysen, Howe, Ingalls, Jones, Kelly, Lewis, Norwood, Pease, Saulsbury, Schurz, Spencer, Stevenson, Stewart, and West—22.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the Senator from New York.

Mr. WRIGHT. I suppose the amendment I sent to the Chair is in order now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is in order.

Mr. WRIGHT. Then I insist upon it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Where does it come in?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is in section 9, lines 15 and 16, to strike out the word "may" where it occurs in both those lines and insert the word "shall;" so that the clause will read:

And the Secretary of the Treasury shall reissue the United States notes so received, or, if they are canceled, shall issue United States notes to the same amount, &c.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. HOWE. Ought not the Senator to provide some penalties in case the Secretary does not reissue them, or does he intend to do that? [Laughter.]

Mr. WRIGHT. I propose this amendment at present. That is the only question pending. What will follow it is another question.

Mr. CONKLING. There is a very handy statute in that respect relative to continental money which the Senator could use. [Laughter.]

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 25, noes 14.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I move to amend, in line 14 of section 9, by striking out beginning with word "and" and down to the word "service," in line 19. The words proposed to be stricken out are "and the Secretary of the Treasury shall reissue the United States notes so received, or, if they are canceled, shall issue United States notes to the same amount, either to purchase or redeem the public debt at par in coin or to meet the current payments for the public service."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont to the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now recurs on the amendment of the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] to strike out all of the committee's amendment after the word "that" and insert other matter.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let that be reported, so that we may know what it is exactly.

The Chief Clerk read the words proposed to be inserted, as follows:

That so much of the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes" as provides that no circulation shall be withdrawn under the provisions of section 6 of said act until after the fifty-four millions granted in section 1 of said act shall have been taken up, is hereby repealed; and it shall be the duty of the Comptroller of the Currency, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, to proceed forthwith to carry into execution the provisions of section 6 of said act; and to enable him to do so, he is hereby authorized and required, from time to time, as needed for the execution of the said section, to make requisitions upon each of the national banks described in said section, organized in States having an excess of circulation, to withdraw and return so much of their circulation as by said act may be apportioned to be withdrawn from them, or in lieu thereof to deposit in the Treasury of the United States lawful money sufficient to redeem such circulation, and upon the return of the circulation required or the deposit of lawful money, as herein provided, a proportionate amount of the bonds held to secure the circulation of such association as shall make such return or deposit shall be surrendered to it.

SEC. 2. That upon the failure of the national banks upon which requisition for circulation shall be made, or of any of them, to return the amount required, or to deposit in the Treasury lawful money to redeem the circulation required within thirty days, the Comptroller of the Currency shall at once sell, as provided in section 49 of the national currency act, approved June 3, 1864, bonds held to secure the redemption of the circulation of the association or associations which shall so fail, to an amount sufficient to redeem the circulation required of such association or associations, and with the proceeds, which shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States, so much of the circulation of such association or associations shall be redeemed as will equal the amount required and not returned; and if there be any excess of proceeds over the amount required for such redemption, it shall be returned to the association or associations whose bonds shall have been sold. And it shall be the duty of the Treasurer, assistant treasurers, designated depositaries, and national-bank depositories of the United States, who shall be kept informed by the Comptroller of the Currency of such associations as shall fail to return circulation or to deposit lawful money as required, to assort and return to the Treasury for redemption the notes of such associations as they shall come into their hands until the amount required shall be redeemed.

SEC. 3. That from and after the passage of this act it shall be lawful for the Comptroller of the Currency to issue circulating notes in the manner and proportion now provided by law, to associations organized or to be organized in those States and Territories having less than their proportion of circulation, under an apportionment made on the basis of population and of wealth, as shown by the returns of the census of 1870: Provided, That the whole amount of circulation issued to such banking associations, and withdrawn and redeemed from banking associations under the provisions of this act, shall not exceed $46,000,000, and that such circulation shall from time to time be withdrawn and redeemed only as it shall be necessary to supply banks in those States having less than their apportionment.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from New York, not because I believe it would give any special advantage to the people of the South or West. I do not believe that a redistribution of any portion of the banking capital of this country would do any particular section of the country good. Nevertheless as there has been complaint made that the South and the West have not their fair proportion of the banking facilities afforded by the country, I think it proper to remove that objection; and I will therefore, to gratify the South and West, vote for the amendment. I believe that that will not remedy the evils of our present financial system. I think the difficulty rests not in the distribution of the banking capital, but rests in the monetary system of the country itself. I believe that to-day our whole system ought to be revised, and that some other financial policy ought to be adopted which will give relief to the business interests of this country.

Sir, it was said by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WASHBURN] this morning that we had the best currency which had ever existed. I cannot subscribe to any such doctrine as that. What is our currency to-day? Greenbacks and national-bank notes and fractional currency, worth not exceeding eighty-eight cents in the dollar. There never was a period in the history of this country before the inception of this system when the currency of the country was at any such discount. There never was a period in the history of the United States under State banking institutions where the loss to the people was so great as it is to-day by the depreciation of the currency furnished by the Government.

We had under the State banking system sometimes institutions that became insolvent, and we had in certain States banks whose notes were at a discount; and yet I venture the assertion that there never was lost upon State-bank issues, upon the failure of State banks and upon the discount put upon their notes, the same amount that to-day is lost by the depreciation of the currency furnished by the Government. Why, sir, upon our $800,000,000 of greenbacks, bank-notes, and fractional currency, the depreciation amounts to at least $100,000,000. Point to any period in the history of this country when the depreciation upon State-bank issues ever amounted to half that sum.

Now we have a currency that no man can tell what its value will be to-morrow; we have a currency that no man can tell what its value will be one month or twelve months from the present time; and I therefore differ entirely with the honorable Senator from Massachusetts when he says that our currency to-day is the best the country has ever had. I believe emphatically that it is the worst currency we have ever had. I admit that there is an advantage in having a currency that will circulate in every part of the country, but when that advantage is bought at so dear a price as a depreciation in amount of at least 12 per cent., I cannot subscribe to the view which he presents, that it is the most valuable currency that we have ever had. I, however, will vote for this amendment of the Senator from New York; and I take this occasion to say again that while you attempt to have a legal paper currency in this country, which is a departure from what was understood to be the legal tender contemplated by the Constitution; when you have, in other words, two standards of value, a paper standard which you make a legal tender, and a gold standard, you will necessarily exclude gold from the circulation. No country has ever yet maintained, or ever can maintain, two legal standards of value differing so widely as irredeemable paper and gold always do. It is utterly impossible. That which has intrinsic value itself will give way and become an article of merchandise, and the paper legal standard will be substituted in its place. That has been our experience, and it has been the experience in every country wherever the attempt has been made to have two legal standards differing in their intrinsic value. You never can maintain them both at the same relative value, because that which is the most valuable becomes an article of merchandise, and that which can be used in its place will be substituted. We ought at this session—and it is getting late in the session—if possible to adopt some measure that will give the country a better currency than we have; and until that is done the complaints which we hear to-day from the business portion of the country will exist. You will never have stability in values, you will never have stability in the business interests of the country, until you return back to the legal standard, until your legal standard is the most valuable standard that can be brought about.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I desire to make an inquiry. Is this question on striking out the substitute?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. This supplants the whole bill. It is not an addition to the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It supplants the substitute of the committee.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I meant the substitute.

Mr. DAVIS. I regard this as a long step in the right direction; and coming as I do from a State south of the Potomac and which has less currency than it is entitled to under the existing law, I shall vote with pleasure for the amendment of the Senator from New York. I propose to show in a very few words how much and what relief this amendment will give the States south of the Potomac and west of the Ohio.

The State of Virginia, under this amendment of the Senator from New York, will get over $2,000,000 of currency; West Virginia nearly half a million; North Carolina, $2,200,000; South Carolina a little over a million; Georgia over $2,000,000; Texas, $1,700,000; Kentucky, $1,300,000; Tennessee, $2,600,000; Missouri, $4,400,000; Ohio, $1,900,000; Indiana, $995,000; Illinois, $3,862,000; Michigan, $1,400,000; Iowa, $2,100,000; Minnesota, $1,900,000. I give round numbers. It is a well known fact that the six New England States have in excess of what the law contemplates they should have $70,000,000. The five Middle States of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland have about $9,000,000 excess. The fourteen Southern States, including the District of Columbia, have $51,000,000 less than they are entitled to under the act of 1870. Giving, as this amendment does, to all the States South and all the States West, without an exception, an additional amount of national-bank currency and some of them large amounts, particularly to Illinois, Ohio, Kentucky, and Missouri, who will be especially benefited by it, it appears to me that the Senators representing those States cannot vote against the proposition, particularly when it is evident that nothing better and nothing as good, in my opinion, can be had.

Mr. CONKLING. I have made a modification of my amendment at two places, for no purpose, however, except to render perfectly plain the meaning, or more strictly speaking the amount. The amendment that I have made is merely to carry into the first section the words "to the amount of $46,000,000," in place of referring as it did at first to the language of another act. Then I have inserted in the last section the words which are merely formal words, "so to be;" so that the amendment reads:

> That the whole amount of the circulation issued to such banking associations, and so to be withdrawn and redeemed, shall be $46,000,000.

It does not change the sense at all, but merely renders the sense unmistakable and apparent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be so modified if there be no objection.

Mr. MORTON. I desire to say a word in regard to the scope and effect of this amendment. This amendment is offered as a substitute for the bill, to take the place of the entire bill. It is a total abandonment of any increase of the currency. It is to take the place of any proposition looking to the enlargement of the currency to meet the wants and demands of the country. We know very well that if this sop was extended and should become a law, any effort after that time to procure an enlargement of the currency, an increase of it, would be ineffectual. It is intended for that purpose, that it shall be a complete settlement of the question as to the expansion or the increase of the currency. Whatever may be the growth of the country, the demands when business shall revive, there can be no enlargement of the currency. It is a fixed thing, it is a cast-iron amount. We are then to stand upon the policy avowed by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] of doing nothing, what has sometimes been called "masterly inactivity," but which I should characterize by other words; that this country is to stand still and undergo the squeezing process by the lapse of years till our currency is brought to par by mere contraction, comparative contraction. Comparative contraction is going on all the time as the population and the wealth of the country increase. We may have immediate contraction by reducing the volume of the currency, but we have comparative contraction, the same thing in effect precisely where the volume of the currency is held to a certain amount and the growth of the country goes on.

The Senator from Massachusetts this afternoon repeated a proposition that he stated once before, that the currency of the country was now superabundant; and he proved it by the fact which he asserted, that it was depreciated. His proposition is that when we get the currency of the country at the proper volume, exactly enough of it, then it will be at par without any provision for its redemption. The necessity of gold redemption is dispensed with by that theory. All we have got to do is to have the volume of currency just at the point where it is enough, and then it will be at par without any other provision. The Senator laid down that doctrine once before. I do not agree to it. I do not agree that you can bring your legal-tender currency to par by simple contraction, as long especially as that currency is in part depreciated by law and is not made a legal tender, and is not received in payment of certain obligations and certain forms of taxes.

Mr. President, we have heard much said about a return to specie payments, but we have not found anybody—no; I will not say that, because I believe some Senators heretofore have offered propositions—but there is no considerable number of Senators, I believe, who are willing to resort to the means necessary to acquire gold in order to redeem these notes. There is no considerable number who are willing to increase taxation for the purpose of acquiring gold to redeem these notes, no considerable number who are willing to hoard gold in the Treasury until it accumulates in sufficient quantities for that purpose. But we have had roundabout methods prescribed. Now we fall back upon the simple policy of doing nothing; that is, of letting the volume of the currency remain fixed while the population of the country goes on and the business of the country too, if it should be able to revive under the pressure that now prevails.

But, Mr. President, aside from these considerations, I believe that this proposed transfer of $46,000,000 of bank circulation is a delusion. It will never be realized. When I am told that the banks in the East will give this up willingly and cheerfully, I must be excused for expressing my utter incredulity. I know when this proposition was first brought forward two or three months ago the banks of Providence, Rhode Island, came forward with one accord, even when it was limited to $25,000,000, and protested earnestly and strongly against it; and I am sure that the banks in the East will regard it as a hardship, and they will regard it, too, in the light of a violation of what may be considered as vested rights.

Another thing they will do. They will throw all obstacles in the way of the organization of banks in the West and South when the currency is to be taken from them. They have powerful means of doing that. The banks of New York have it in their power to discourage and to throw great difficulties in the way of the organization of banks in the West and South. The Senator from Massachusetts told us himself how it was in regard to the negotiation of one hundred millions of 5 per cent. bonds abroad, that when it was understood that the gold was to be brought to this country on the negotiation of those bonds the banks of the Old World refused to give it their countenance and the bonds could not be negotiated; their influence was against it; it was fatal. But when it was understood that the five per cents were to be exchanged for the six per cents and no gold was to be withdrawn, then their influence was the other way.

Mr. President, I have no faith in any good coming to the West and South from the adoption of this proposition. I do not believe it will ever become the law; if it does, I do not believe it will ever be executed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, if what the Senator from Indiana says is correct, that no good will come to the West and South from the transfer of forty-six millions of banking facilities into those States that are deficient, then certainly there can have been no injustice at any time hitherto in the banking facilities and in the currency having been located in the States where they are.

Mr. MORTON. I did not say what the Senator puts in my mouth. I did not say no good would come from the transfer. I meant to say that the transfer will never be made.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Well, Mr. President, I suppose the RECORD to-morrow, if it is not corrected, will show what the Senator did say, and then we shall know whether he said what I understood him to say or not. The Senator now, at any rate—and he has a perfect right to do it, because I do not wish in the slightest degree to misunderstand the Senator or have any other person do it—takes the ground that good will come of this transfer if it can only be made. That is the side of the fence he is upon. If that is true, then this measure proposed by the Senator from New York will be of benefit to the people of the West and the South if it can be carried out, for if carried out it will furnish them with forty-six millions of banking currency, banking facilities, the means of doing business, of making discounts, effecting exchanges, and all that sort of thing. That must be undeniable. Then the simple question on this amendment of the Senator from New York, so far as it is opposed by the Senator from Indiana, is: is this act, if it is passed, capable of being carried into effect? Is there power enough in the United States, in the administrative departments of its Government, to carry out a law of Congress which declares that certain circulation, which exists only by law of Congress and is placed in the various States only by a law of Congress, shall be changed to other States for purposes of equality? Upon that question the Senator from Indiana expresses his doubt; more than doubt, his belief, that it is practically impossible of execution. Why? The only reason he has given is that the influence of the banks will be against it.

Well, Mr. President, taxation is a disagreeable thing to the people, and you may say that the influence of tax-payers is against paying taxes; but did anybody ever hear of a government refraining from imposing taxation or failing to collect it on the ground that paying taxes is a disagreeable thing? Does the Senator mean to have this body and the country believe that the administrative department of the Government of the United States cannot carry a law changing the location of banks from one State to another and changing banking facilities from one State to another into execution, and that the banks will go into rebellion and resist by force the execution of this act? Of course the Senator cannot seriously mean any such thing. His only purpose must be, if he will pardon me for saying so, to stimulate his adherents if he has any, to stimulate his associates in opinion if he has any, in sticking to what I call the delusion of the bill as it now stands amended, in order to defeat this proposition which is made to the South and West in a spirit of generous honor and good feeling on the part of the Eastern States in order that every cause of complaint may be removed, be it a sound one or an unsound one, that every feeling which the South and West may have that they are not fairly treated in the present distribution of money may be removed, and that they may have, if they desire it, every dollar of their share and as fast as they can take it up. That is the proposition; and yet this proposition is attempted to be defeated by a Senator from a Western State that either has or has not—I am sure I do not know which—its proportion of circulation, upon the ground that although the law would be beneficial if carried into effect, although it would accomplish the purpose that the people of the South and West have at heart and relieve their necessities, yet you are to vote it down because there is not strength in the Government to deal with these various banks from whom the money is to be called in!

Mr. SHERMAN. Allow me to call my friend's attention to the last section, where he will see that the authority to organize new banks and get the additional currency takes effect at once and is not to wait until the withdrawal of circulation from the existing banks.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I was coming to that in a moment. I say, Mr. President, that it is obvious that the opposition of the Senator from Indiana to this proposition of the Senator from New York must have some profounder ground than that he fears there is not power enough in the Government of the United States through the medium of its Treasury and Executive Departments to change these banking facilities from one State to another.

Now I come to the second proposition which the bill is to contain if this amendment prevails; and that is that it does not depend upon the will or the wishes of the banks in the States having more than their proportion at all. It is not possible to deny to the people of North Carolina or Indiana any part of this $46,000,000 on the ground that it cannot be got out of the banks in the State of Vermont. The Government of the United States gives to those States their share of the $46,000,000 at once, and it does not wait until it can get it from the banks of Vermont, it does not wait until it can compel the banks of Rhode Island to withdraw their circulation and turn it into the Treasury; but it issues this circulation in advance to those who wish to establish banks in the Southern and Western States. They can begin to-morrow if the bill pass in this shape.

Then suppose that any bank in an Eastern State resists, what is the result? The very result that the Senator from Indiana is so much in love with, that you will have an inflation of the currency, or an expansion, or an increase, taking whatever term he likes, by just that amount. If you cannot get this money in you will have increased the total of the circulating medium in the country by $46,000,000; so that if the Senator from Indiana is right in his fears, then he will have accomplished, if he will go for this amendment, precisely what he wants. That is to say, he will have got an increase of $46,000,000 of the circulating medium of the country. But if he is wrong, as I feel sure that he is, and the eastern banks obey the command of the Government and retire their circulation, as they cannot avoid doing because their bonds are in possession of the United States and the United States can take in this money themselves and take the bonds for it, then you have the result of leaving the currency of the United States precisely where it has stood since 1868, a period of six years, during which period of six years I beg Senators to remember the prosperity of this country has been almost unexampled taking the whole period together; business has expanded; railways have been built; manufactures have increased; and commerce has spread itself more and more over the country; production has enlarged; wealth has increased; the people live better and have more money. The only cause of your panic last fall was not the fact that there was not money enough, because every man who had anything to sell except for a temporary period of two or three weeks was able to get the money for it in a moment and to get a high price, but that certain great houses who had overtraded and overextended their business out of all proportion to the capital they had collapsed, and that produced a feeling of insecurity and panic and distress everywhere, and you have exactly the hard times that you would have in France to-day or England to-morrow when exactly such an event occurs. It cannot therefore be said that the distress of last fall and winter was occasioned or enhanced in the slightest degree by the fact that the currency of the United States was six hundred and fifty or seven hundred millions instead of a thousand millions. That was not it. The causes that produced the distress are the causes that exist in society everywhere under all systems, and that will continue to exist forever. That is to say, there will be a period of prosperity and an increase of business until speculation and enterprise shall have overdeveloped themselves, and then there will come a collapse for the time being, and things will settle to their normal attitude and go on again.

Why, Mr. President, is there any wheat in the West to-day now left unbought because money cannot be furnished to buy it? Is there any farmer anywhere upon the prairies who cannot take his wheat to the nearest depot or the nearest landing and sell it for cash, and at a high price? Not one. Is there a pound of cotton or tobacco in the South that does not command a price in cash according to the demand for the commodity in foreign or home markets and without any difficulty upon the score that money is not to be had to make the exchange? No man can assert that. Therefore what the South and the West need, if they need anything, is what has been so well stated by some of the Senators, the facility of establishing centers of capital in their various places from which exchanges and loans and discounts and deposits may flow and be received for the convenience of the societies and communities in that region of the country. Very well, here it is; take it. What more can you ask?

Mr. President, if this bill as reported and amended by the Senate were to pass there would be no more money in the country. The men who are to go into free banking in order to get their currency must first have cash to buy bonds with; and if it is a distress for cash that makes this inflation necessary, how are you going to begin your inflation until you get your cash? Of course it cannot be done; but in the way now proposed by the Senator from New York, if there is any capital in the South and West to be invested, if there is any capital anywhere in the country that is willing to invest itself in banking enterprises in the South and the West, all that capital has to do is to come forward and transfer itself and its business from one part of the country to the other.

Now, if those parts of the country—and every part has an equal interest in it—that are supposed to have this excess propose to give it up to those who have a deficiency, should there be objection to that? Should it be said that that is a delusion, and that it is designed really as a fraud upon the South and the West, when it appears, as has been stated by the Senator from Ohio, in this very amendment that the fraud, if there were one intended, is incapable of perpetration; because the South and West get this transfer of currency by an immediate issue from the Treasury Department, without waiting for any of the banks to be called upon to surrender that which they have in excess. Therefore the Senator from Indiana will see I think (because he intends to be candid, I do not doubt) that the notion he suggests that this could not be carried into effect on account of the resistance of eastern and northern banks is one which will not bear the test of an examination.

Mr. President, the prosperity and welfare of this country is universal. There cannot be a prosperity of one part for any long time without the prosperity of the other. There cannot be a distress in one part of the country for a long time without its reacting upon the other, any more than you could have a stream or a lake where one part was to be full of floods and of water and the other part was to be arid and dry. The interest of the whole people in commerce and in the exchange of commodities is identical. The welfare of North Carolina is the welfare of Vermont. The welfare of Texas is the welfare of New York. The welfare of the Southeast and Northwest is the welfare of New England. Therefore let us look at this question in the light of something like a broad nationality, and do not let us suppose that either section is to profit at the expense of the other, because in the long run it cannot be done. There can be no advantage gained in this Republic of ours (and I am thankful to the Supreme Ruler of events for that fact) by any one part of the country over another, because its people is one people; its interests are one interest; its prosperity is one prosperity; and its adversity must be one, even as we saw in the times of sad civil war, the distress and wrong upon one side (if there was a wrong, I will say, because I do not wish to speak of what was right or wrong about that now) work a reactionary distress and wrong upon the other. Nothing can be done, where there is one homogeneous people as ours is, that shall injure one part to the gain of the other in the long run, or profit one part without the profit of the other.

Let us, then, endeavor to keep the money worth as much as it is now, because what the people want is good money, and if there be an inequality which Senators desire to redress, let us wipe out that inequality and give to the States that desire more banking facilities the opportunity to have them, and then go on with the state of the currency and with the prosperity of the business of the country as we have gone on for six years without any difficulty on account of the fact that there was not money enough. The difficulty has been the one that will still cling to us and cling to us all, that we have not money that is good enough until we are able to redeem and do redeem the promises of this Government in the coin that we promised to pay them in.

I hope Senators from the South and West will reflect, before they vote against this proposition, that it is one which answers the demand they make for banking facilities; it is one which transfers capital, if it is possible to transfer capital, and that depends upon private ownership, to the places where it is needed, and which still keeps the steady hand of conservative influences in respect to the expansion of currency upon the volume that exists in the United States, and thus enable us to do as we have done in the six years past, prosper and grow wealthy out of a currency that has been stable and that has been steadily appreciating in value from that day to this. Shall we go forward in this appreciation and make the currency more and more valuable day by day by the growth and development of the prosperity of the country, or shall we make more currency and depreciate its value in order to afford what may be thought to be a temporary relief? That is the choice between these two propositions. Can there be any doubt which one ought to be chosen?

Mr. MERRIMON. I have already said that if I could not do any better I would take this proposition, imperfect as I believe it is; but I believe I can do better in the interest of that section of the country which I immediately represent.

Now, sir, if anything appears clearly, it is that there is not only a necessity, but a very strong popular desire, that there should be a moderate increase of the currency in this country under our present system of finance. It was made manifest last fall. It was so clear and impressed itself so thoroughly upon all minds that the Chief Magistrate of the United States, in communicating with Congress, felt called upon to call the subject to the attention of the two Houses; and I desire to read an extract from his message. He used these words:

> I submit for your consideration whether this difficulty might not be overcome by authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue at any time, to national banks of issue, any amount of their own notes below a fixed percentage of their issue—say 40 per cent—upon the banks depositing with the Treasurer of the United States an amount of Government bonds equal to the amount of notes demanded; the banks to forfeit to the Government, say, 4 per cent. of the interest accruing on the bonds so pledged, during the time they remain with the Treasurer, as security for the increased circulation; the bonds so pledged to be redeemable by the banks at their pleasure, either in whole or in part, by returning their own bills for cancellation to an amount equal to the face of the bonds withdrawn.

He said further, speaking of the period since the close of the war:

> During the same period there has been a much larger comparative contraction of the currency. The population of the country has largely increased. More than twenty-five thousand miles of railroad have been built, requiring the active use of capital to operate them. Millions of acres of land have been opened, requiring capital to move the products. Manufactories have multiplied beyond all precedent in the same period of time, requiring capital weekly for the payment of wages and for the purchase of material; and probably the largest of all comparative contraction arises from the organizing of free labor in the South. Now, every laborer there receives his wages, and for want of savings-bank the greater part of such wages is carried in the pocket, or hoarded until required for use.

I read these extracts from the President's message to show what were the impressions at that time on the mind of the President, who above all other men ought to inform himself on such subjects. But did we not have that strong evidence of this great necessity, this great popular desire, this imperative demand, the long discussion of four months which has transpired in this Hall and in the other wing of the Capitol must certainly put it to rest in the mind of any disinterested person. If anything has been made to appear, if the truth could be made to appear, it has been made to appear clearly here that there is a demand for a moderate increase to say the least, if not for a very great increase; and I have been impressed with the idea that even if our currency were to reach the total amount fixed by the previous bill which we passed, we should not have enough to supply the wants of the country in an ordinary time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to ask the Senator a question for information. He says it has been made to appear here that there is a demand for more currency in the country. I wish to ask him how—what is the evidence that we have had here of that fact?

Mr. MERRIMON. I was just going on to remark upon that point, and I will do it now, I trust, to my honorable friend's satisfaction. I take it that the members of the Senate are pretty well informed about the wants of their constituents. We are, or ought to be, statesmen; we are in some measure politicians; and we are familiar with the immediate wants of the constituents we represent. After a discussion of four months, after hearing his side and our side of the question debated almost beyond a parallel, the whole monetary influence of the country being brought to bear in various ways, the Senate solemnly declared that there was a necessity for an increase.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to ask the Senator a question, with his permission.

Mr. MERRIMON. Certainly.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I want to know if the approbation of the nation has not been manifestly in favor of the action by which that bill did not become a law?

Mr. MERRIMON. I do not think that is material to the purpose now. So far as the question of increase of the currency goes, I do not think the view of the veto message on that point is sustained by the people. I have no sort of doubt that an overwhelming majority of the American people desire an increase of the currency to-day. They demand it. We have evidence that they do demand it by the majorities that appear here on every vote that is taken on the pending measure.

But I was going on to show my honorable friend from Vermont what evidence I had that there was a popular demand for this increase. We have the evidence here before us. We had evidence when the bill which was vetoed passed this branch of Congress. We had stronger evidence in the other branch. That bill passed that House by an overwhelming majority. It did not afford scarcely a tithe of the relief demanded by that popular branch, which represents as thoroughly as it can be represented the popular voice. When you go into the business thoroughfares, when you look out in every direction, when you see the languishing condition of industry everywhere, no man who desires to arrive at a correct conclusion, it seems to me, can doubt that there is this popular demand.

Gentlemen talk about a better currency. Well, I have no doubt the people would rather have a better currency; but if they have got to have such a currency as we have, they want enough of that to answer their purposes. So I say, Mr. President, that what we want is some increase. It is not pretended that the pending amendment affords one dollar of increase, and in the language of the Senator from Indiana, used on a former occasion, I regard this proposition as a mere tub to the whale. It is a cheat; and if we of the South and West allow it to pass, we shall be, when our people in those sections are calling for bread, giving them a stone. There may be something in it, but I do not believe there is much, in view of the fact that I feel we can get more relief from the bill before us if we shall go on and conclude it as was contemplated by a majority at the outset. I shall vote for that bill against this proposition. If this was all I could get I would take even this little morsel, but I do not believe it is all I can get. I believe it is our duty to go on and give an increase. We do afford an increase of the currency, and we avoid the objection put forth by the President in his veto message, because the bill as it is about matured by the majority goes on to provide for free banking and at the same time provides a means of redemption. Therefore filling almost the requisite prescribed by the President as necessary in order that any proposition may meet his sanction, we have met, it seems to me, his views. We shall, if we pass this bill, in some measure meet the message, and also the popular demand of the nation on the other hand; and I trust every gentleman who desires an increase of the currency will vote against this amendment, and then will vote the measure through.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, of course it is not my business to act the prophet as to what may become of this bill if the Senator from North Carolina represents what he considers to be the majority upon the subject. I do not know whether it will be vetoed or not; I do not care whether it will be vetoed or not. My business is simply to know whether it is right or not; and I suppose that is the business of the Senator from North Carolina, though he is the best judge of that. I will say, however, that reading the veto message which has been referred to, and reading this bill as it has been perfected by the Senator from Iowa against the views of the committee, it would not take the change of many words, and those merely in the title, to make this message apply to this bill with as much force as it did to the other. I may be mistaken; I only have the two papers before me, and in making a careful comparison of what this bill proposes and what this message says, they are as wide apart as the east is from the west and as right is from wrong.

Mr. MERRIMON. I beg to suggest to my honorable friend from Vermont, if he will allow me to do so, that in what I said I did not anticipate what the President would do; and it seems to me out of order that we should anticipate his action. He acts within his sphere, and we act within our sphere and without reference to his probable action at all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It would have been better, if I may be permitted to say so, for the Senator from North Carolina to have said that a little while ago instead of saying what he did say that this measure——

Mr. MERRIMON. I was alluding to the President's message of December last, and I read from that. My honorable friend from Vermont has suggested by way of argument, certainly not in terms, what we may expect from the President of the United States if we should pass this measure in the shape the majority propose to pass it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not by any means. I beg to stand on my own footing in that respect. I only called the attention of the Senate to the fact, adverted to by the Senator from North Carolina and not by me except in reply, that this measure as adjusted now by the Senator from Iowa, and as it is to be further adjusted in the same direction by the majority, was so framed as to meet the views of the President of the United States. I do not quote his language, but I quote the substance of what he said. If I am wrong the Senator can correct me. I am not wrong, Mr. President.

Mr. MERRIMON. What I said was that this bill did not contravene the views of the President.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think the Senator did not use the word "contravene," or any word equivalent to that. I am not caviling about terms with the honorable Senator from North Carolina; I am speaking about substance. This measure has been urged by him upon the Senate of the United States as having one merit at least, if it had not any other, and that was that it would meet the views of the President of the United States. Then I say in reply, and solely in reply, that I have here the views of the President of the United States sent to Congress upon a bill, and when I take those views and take the bill and compare them, I repeat what I said before, they are as wide apart as the right in the message is from the wrong in this bill. That is my opinion; but of course nobody understands that I am speaking for any one but myself, and I am expressing an opinion upon documents that are before the Senate for its consideration. That is all. Therefore I do not wish to be told by the Senator from North Carolina, if he will excuse me, that I am arguing to induce any Senator to vote one way or the other upon this bill without any reference to ultimate possibilities. I believe it to be an entirely improper thing to do. I believe it is the business of the Senate to act upon its own responsibility and its own honest judgment and its own sense of responsibility to the people whom it represents in that long and sober judgment of theirs that was intended by the Constitution to outgrow and overcome temporary fluctuations and panics and disturbances and clamors, and to be the settled judgment of the people of the United States covering a period as long as a Senator's term is, and that is six years.

That brings me to the other branch of the subject discussed by the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. MERRIMON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. EDMUNDS. With pleasure.

Mr. MERRIMON. Does he regard the voice of the Senate and the House as nothing as reflecting the popular will and demand and necessity?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I cannot say that I regard it as nothing. I regard it as entitled to great respect. There are a great many delusions in this world; and although they unhappily exist, we nevertheless respect the views and opinions of the people who entertain them. The honorable Senator—and I make the allusion not in the slightest degree as impugning him or his people—the honorable Senator and his people at one time labored under the impression that the two sections of this country would get on better together if they were separated. I thought otherwise; I think he thinks otherwise now. There are thousands of such instances. They illustrate the fact that although the opinion of Senators is entitled to respect, it does not prove that that opinion formed as following a clamor from a panic is an opinion that will live for six years. The difference of opinion about the separation of this country only lasted four years, or a little over. We all got over it in four years. Now the Constitution has given us six to get over this delusion, as I think it is. I may be deluded myself; I am not claiming any advantage in that respect over anybody——

Mr. MERRIMON. I believe I shall say nothing offensive to the honorable Senator when I remind him that an insane man always supposes that all the rest of the world is deranged, certainly the majority.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from North Carolina can judge for himself. I certainly do not wish to interfere with his right to judge of his own position. [Laughter.] It is his privilege to think so, and I respect him in it, although I should not be disposed to send him across the Eastern Branch for that reason by any means. [Laughter.]

Now let us return, after the joke is over, to the question of where is the public opinion. Public opinion ought to be consulted; but I repeat what I was going on to say when my friend interrupted me, that the public opinion which we are bound to consult, and the only public opinion which we have a right to consult, is that long and sober public opinion which covers a period of time wider than a temporary excitement, wider than the explosion of a Philadelphia banking house, wider than the clamor of a people in the winter time for more cash which they have not got the property to exchange for, but that sober, settled conviction which is the opinion of all good men, the consensus bonorum, which depends upon intelligence, upon cultivation, upon experience, upon observation of the progress of society for a period of years. There is no public opinion that is entitled to weigh for a moment that springs up in a month or in a day, because you have no means of testing whether it is the public opinion or whether it is a simulated shadow which has no foundation or substance in it. Therefore I should ask to be excused from voting for inflation of the currency if I believed that in December last, when the message of the President which has been read was sent to us, there was what the Senator would call a public opinion in favor of the inflation of the currency, because I should then have believed, as I believe now, that whatever of this so-called public opinion existed has almost entirely died off or been burned out and to ashes by the sober reflection of intelligent men in all parts of the country, by the memory and experience of men engaged in business and in finance, by something, it may be of the distribution of the debates of this body where the experience of every people and every nation has been brought forward who have undertaken to help themselves out of embarrassments by an increase of an irredeemable paper currency. I believe that the people of this country have some respect for that wisdom which is gained by experience, the opinion of some Senators to the contrary notwithstanding; and I believe, therefore, that in spite of whatever sneers we may have against information that has been obtained from history and human experience, the people of this country in the South and the West as well as in the East, when they come to reflect on this subject as they have done, when they come to have it studied out and laid before them as has been done, if they ever had been laboring under a temporary notion that an inflation of the currency benefited them, have in a very large degree changed their minds.

I have here a statement which I believe appeared in the Chicago Tribune a day or two ago, which may perhaps illustrate this topic of which I now speak:

CHICAGO, May 13, 1874.

The Tribune this morning publishes replies to the circular sent to the press of Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, Kansas, Missouri, and Nebraska, asking how each stood on the President's veto of the currency bill. A summary shows that of 933 papers answering the circular, 514 sustain the veto, 408 oppose it, and 11 are non-committal. Of those sustaining the veto, 295 are republican and 217 democratic; of those opposing the veto, 234 are republican and 174 democratic. Indiana, Missouri, and Kansas are the only States where a majority of the papers oppose the veto.

I do not know that this statement is true; but I believe from what I myself have seen of the newspapers of the various parts of the country that it is true. I know that I had occasion to read a southern newspaper not long since, published at Atlanta, the capital of Georgia—I think the leading democratic paper of the State; certainly one that had a very good appearance, and which spoke as if it was speaking ex cathedrâ—and that in its leading editorial on the subject of the bill then pending, which has since been vetoed, it pronounced any scheme of inflation as in violation of all human experience, and in violation of the soundest principles of the administration of the affairs of a people, and as sure to be followed by injury instead of benefit. I do not give the words, but the substance. I have the papers down stairs in my committee-room.

Mr. GORDON. Will the Senator allow me one word just there? I cannot be drawn into the debate I think, but I simply want to make a statement. As the Senator has spoken of the papers in my State, let me mention to him that the agricultural convention of Georgia, which I believe is the most intelligent body of men that we have assembled there at all, unanimously, without one single vote to the contrary, passed resolutions indorsing the action of the Senate, myself among them, upon the financial question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should have expected that, and I think that does not in the least degree diminish the force of what this leading newspaper of Georgia stated and of what may after all be the reflective public sentiment of that State. I believe it was in his own town that I read this newspaper, at Atlanta; but I know that the honorable Senator is so popular in that State that any convention that met there would indorse him and any measure that he had supported, or oppose any measure that he had opposed, just as in old times the democratic party used to indorse anything that Andrew Jackson did; and I confess that I respect the people of Georgia for it.

Mr. GORDON. The Senator will remember that some gentlemen voted with me on that question who generally act with him.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That may be; and I think if your papers were asked to indorse those gentlemen they would not do it now. [Laughter.]

Mr. MERRIMON. As my honorable friend is quoting the newspapers of the South, I beg leave to say that out of sixty-odd papers in my State, four-fifths have disapproved the veto message of the President; and of the republican newspapers, more than a majority have disapproved of it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not question that the Senator from North Carolina is right in saying that the republican newspapers in the South disapprove of the veto, and as he disapproves of the republican newspapers he ought to be in favor of the veto. [Laughter.] I do not see any way of dodging that. [Laughter.]

Mr. MERRIMON. I will take care of that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But to come back again, if we may, to the money question——

Mr. SARGENT. Will the Senator from Vermont allow me a moment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir.

Mr. SARGENT. I have taken some pains to look over the southern papers and I have extracts from a few, two that I should like to call the attention of the Senate to. The Daily Picayune, published in New Orleans, says, speaking of the veto of the former bill:

We rejoice that it has been killed, and we respect and applaud President Grant for giving it its coup de grâce. The people want no more irredeemable paper currency; there is more now in the country than they are able to get—than they can borrow or exchange products for. What they want is relief from too heavy burdens of taxation, and laws protecting labor and promoting production, confidence, and regularity of exchanges and values. These they can never secure by swelling the volume of paper currency. Inflation is the remedy of speculators and moneylenders.

The Mobile Register, which I hold in my hand, says:

We congratulate the southern democratic inflationists for the lesson in statesmanship that Ulysses Grant has been allowed to teach them.

I have here the Savannah (Georgia) Advertiser and Republican, which in an article headed "The Veto" says:

The Cabinet session held before the veto was promulgated is said to have been long and earnest, and the most important one held during their present administration. The message itself is before the country, and the country, our readers included, are at liberty to judge of its merits and of the causes which produced it

If it is a fair and honest step in the direction of the resumption of specie payment there is no cause for weeping.

Again, toward the close of the article, it says:

If the crop season is favorable, and there are no violent political or social changes before the business season opens, general confidence may be restored and the bankers may turn this money again into the legitimate channels of trade, and make the coming season the beginning of many prosperous ones. In the mean time we may indulge the hope that as inflation is settled we may hail hard coin as a circulating medium again, after many years of absence.

I have an extract, also, from the Memphis Avalanche, which says:

There was something more than sarcasm in Congressman COX's suggestion to make every greenback dollar a legal tender for three dollars, every two dollar greenback a legal tender for six dollars, and so on. It would but carry the logic of inflation to its legitimate conclusion. A piece of irredeemable paper known as a dollar may as well be declared three dollars as a third that sum.

I have noticed other leading papers in the South, democratic as well as republican papers, and I find this view is by no means exceptional.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now I will go on, but not for a long time, because I do not wish to weary Senators, and we ought to pass this bill to-night in some way, I suppose.

The Senator from North Carolina says there is a pressing demand for this money—a cry for it. Now, ought we to yield to that cry, supposing it to exist? We ought, if it is a cry founded in reason; and we ought not, the Senator will agree, if it is not a cry founded in reason. We have no business to-day to pass a law giving the people $50,000,000 more of depreciated currency or any kind of currency unless the interest of the people demands it; and we are placed here for six years in order that our own judgment may stand, if it may be, against the will of the people of to-day, provided we feel satisfied that at the end of six years the people will say, "We bless you that you resisted our false and insane clamor for some relief which you were wise enough not to give us." That is my idea of the constitution of this Government.

But let us look at it practically. The people want more money we are told. I do not deny that each man wants more in his own pocket of what there is. Everybody does that; and it is right, if he can get it lawfully. That is not what the Senator means. He means that the States and communities need to have more money, not as an increase of wealth, because giving them this money does not increase their wealth any, as the Senator very well knows; they have to pay for this money; and if you issued $1,000,000,000 to-morrow, and the people were ready to take it, the next day the country would be no richer than it is to-day. If it would be, then all of us would go not only for $1,000,000,000 but for $10,000,000,000, because we would all be rich by a mere act of legislation. Of course nobody contends for that. What is it, then? It is that communities need a circulating medium to enable them to make use of the wealth that they do possess, in selling their products handily and getting cash for them, and using that as a medium to buy something else. That is it. Now will somebody point out to me any place in the United States for the last two months where any man had anything to sell that was the product of the earth—the agriculturist of Georgia, the agriculturist of North Carolina, the wheat-raiser and the wool-raiser of the Northwest, or the seller of pine lumber—where any man has had anything to sell that he has produced or bought, that he could not get a market price for it that averages well with the market price of similar commodities for the last six years? Is not wheat bearing a good price in the Northwest? Is not tobacco in good demand in the South? Is not cotton a product that sells for the going price of the Liverpool market, freight and insurance out, readily at every seaport in the South, and up every creek and every bayou, and for cash? No man can dispute it, I think.

Mr. MERRIMON. All over the South it is very difficult to get money. I could present much information on that point if it were necessary. But I would ask the Senator can he point to a single mercantile association or manufacturing company that has taken the trouble to approve the veto message of the President?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not understand the Senator.

Mr. MERRIMON. I ask if the Senator can point to a single instance in which any industrial association in the country has approved of the President's veto message, or any manufacturing establishment? Can he present any case in which the industries of the country have approved of that paper?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I can answer for the manufacturing establishments of Vermont and the industrial associations of Vermont, where we regard industry as much that which produces something from the soil and from the mine and the quarry as that which produces it from the loom or from the anvil; and speaking for all the industrial associations of Vermont, for him who cuts the forest or plows the land or raises the wheat or the corn, for him who works the mine or the quarry or turns the marble into the works of art or the iron into the bars or the nails, for him who turns the wool into cloth or the cotton into fabrics, I say every one of them approves the message of the President of the United States and regards him as having delivered the country a second time from that which threatened to curse it and destroy it.

Mr. MERRIMON. And that section has $70,000,000 in excess of its share of the bank circulation of the country.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And they tried before, as they offer now with entire willingness and gladness to give it to the Senator and to his associates just whenever and as fast as they want it.

Mr. MERRIMON. I beg to correct the honorable Senator. Not two months ago the banks in New England sent memorials here protesting expressly against this redistribution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very good. If the society in New England was organized upon the notion that the Senator seems to entertain of what makes up the body of society, for he apparently supposes that the bankers are New England, he may be right; but I beg leave to assure him that the bankers are not New England; the bankers are not Rhode Island, even in that small State where there are so many banks. It is the people of whom I am speaking, and not of any particular banker or corporation, who may have a natural and personal reluctance to give up the privilege of banking as much as he does now. I am not speaking of those persons.

Mr. MERRIMON. My recollection is that the honorable Senator himself opposed it on a former occasion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I beg the Senator's pardon. I stated on a former occasion, as I would state now if there were any use in it, that when the bankers of New England and the Eastern States took this circulation, the inhabitants of the Southern States were unwilling to take it. They were somewhat more than unwilling to take it. They had a circulation of their own; they did not want this. To be sure, that circulation has rather fallen through; but I do not think it is to be imputed to New England, or the North, or the East, that they were committing any wrong upon the people of the Southern States when in 1863 and 1864 they took up this circulation, there being no application for it from any place south of Mason and Dixon's line that I know of. I do not think, looking West, that it is just or fair for western people or western Senators to impute any blame to New England or to the East for taking up this circulation when they did, to aid in carrying on the war, and when their State banks were driven out of existence to force them to take it, when they did not take it to the exclusion of any application from a western State. We only took it as the West and East were acting together then, as I hope they will always act together, and with the South, too, for the common benefit of the country, to carry on a great enterprise that we had on hand. They had not the money and capital in cash to take this currency and set up the banks with to the same extent that the East had. The consequence was that they did all they could and wanted to do at that time, and we did all we could and wanted to at that time; but the result is that the distribution is now unequal. The West and South now feel able and desirous to take some portion of this banking facility. Very well; we say in God's name, amen; take it; although we do not want you to take it in the sense that we admit that when we took it we were plundering you. We were not; we were aiding you; but now if times have changed and you are in a condition to take it, we say amen; take it; but do not as you take it impute to us any wrong against you for having taken it at the time we did.

Mr. MERRIMON. I do not want the honorable Senator to assign me and other gentlemen here a false position, which I am sure he does not do intentionally. We did not say that New England had plundered the South; we did not say they had plundered the West; we did not say they had plundered the Government. We said as a matter of fact that they had received an excess of circulation of over $70,000,000, and we cited the fact that they required such a vast amount of circulation as an evidence that an increased circulation was necessary in the West and South. We made no such imputation against New England as is now suggested.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The statement must have been made for some purpose. The statement was that we had got more than our share. Then if we say we give it up, there is nothing left to be said about it, is there? But, Mr. President, the Senator says that the point is that it shows that New England and the Eastern States require this vast amount of circulation, $70,000,000 more than their share, to do their business. Again the Senator is mistaken. The circulation which went to the eastern and northern banks immediately found its way to every corner of the country, and you can find now the greater proportion of the circulation of the North and East in the Southern States wherever any man has anything to sell, than you can in any part of the country East where he has not anything to sell. The moment the money is issued by the banks in loans it goes to those parts of the country where the business requires it. If there is cotton to be bought in the South, the money is paid for the cotton; if there is wheat to be bought in the West, the money is paid for the wheat; and then if the man who had the cotton or the wheat to sell does not owe somebody else, he keeps the money; if he does owe somebody else, he ought in honor, as he will, no doubt, pay that somebody else; and finally the man will get the money to whom it belongs. If he happen to reside in the city of New York, what in the name of Heaven is the Senator going to do about it by legislation? Can you do anything? Of course you cannot.

It will not do, then, to say that this $70,000,000 in excess which it is said we have is something which has been taken by the East because it was necessary for our purposes to do the business of New York, Pennsylvania, New England, and Ohio, if that has an excess, and I do not know whether it has or not. No such inference is to be drawn, and the Senator has no just right to deduce from it the argument that every part of the country requires $70,000,000 in the same proportion to its population because $70,000,000 went to New England and to New York. It was not taken upon the idea that the business of those places required it in the sense of doing their business alone. Business is not bounded by State lines, business knows nothing about geography, it knows nothing about politics. The money goes where the commodities are that are wanted, and the commodities go where the money is to pay for them. So that all there is in anything of this question and of the change of circulation, or the increase of circulation, is merely an increase of circulation to inflate prices and without making anything a cent more valuable than it was before, or a change of circulation to induce the conveniences and comforts of banking in other sections of the country. If the West and South absolve us now and say, "We will not take that which we have claimed it is our right to have," I hope we shall never hear again any complaint of the fact that the banking currency of the country is located where there was the money to take it.

Mr. BOREMAN, (at five o'clock and forty-five minutes.) I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. O, no; we can vote now.

Mr. SHERMAN. I said yesterday that I would call for the yeas and nays on this motion if it was made before the bill was disposed of. I have no longer any interest in this bill, and if the Senator from Iowa desires an adjournment, he will relieve me from all trouble about it and I shall make no objection.

Mr. WRIGHT. I said yesterday that I would second the request of the Senator from Ohio to sit the bill out this evening.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I hope we shall do it.

Mr. BOGY. I hope we shall adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) It is moved that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

Several SENATORS. No; call for a division.

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, I will call for a division.

The motion was not agreed to, there being on a division—ayes 16, noes 26.

Mr. MERRIMON. I ask leave to make a report.

Mr. HAMLIN. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made and it cannot be received now. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. BOGY. Is that offered as a substitute, or by way of addition?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As a substitute for the committee's amendment.

Mr. BOGY. We voted upon the same thing awhile ago. Was it then as an addition to the bill?

Mr. CONKLING. That was as an addition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. THURMAN, (when Mr. BAYARD's name was called.) I am requested by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] to state that he is paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON.] If the Senator from Delaware were here he would vote "yea," and the Senator from Georgia would vote "nay."

Mr. BOREMAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY.] If he were present he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

Mr. FENTON, (when his name was called.) Upon this vote I was paired with the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. DORSEY,] but I have transferred that pair to the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. STEWART.] The Senator from Nevada would vote "yea" upon this proposition, and the Senator from Arkansas would vote "nay."

Mr. SHERMAN, (when Mr. FLANAGAN's name was called.) The Senator from Texas is paired, but I do not remember with whom.

Mr. GORDON, (when his name was called.) Upon this question I am paired with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD.] If he were here he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland, (when Mr. HITCHCOCK's name was called.) The Senator from Nebraska is paired with the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. STOCKTON.]

Mr. INGALLS, (when his name was called.) My pair with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] prevents me from voting "nay" on this amendment.

Mr. LOGAN, (when the name of Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, was called.) The Senator from Maine is paired with the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. WEST.]

Mr. RAMSEY. I ought to state that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHANDLER] is paired with the Senator from Florida, [Mr. CONOVER.]

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 18, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Boutwell, Buckingham, Conkling, Cooper, Davis, Edmunds, Fenton, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamlin, Jones, Morrill of Vermont, Sargent, Schurz, Scott, Sherman, Thurman, and Washburn—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Bogy, Carpenter, Clayton, Dennis, Ferry of Michigan, Goldthwaite, Hager, Harvey, Howe, Johnston, Logan, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morton, Oglesby, Patterson, Pratt, Ramsey, Ransom, Robertson, Spencer, Sprague, Tipton, Windom, and Wright—27.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Boreman, Brownlow, Cameron, Chandler, Conover, Cragin, Dorsey, Ferry of Connecticut, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Gordon, Hamilton of Texas, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Kelly, Lewis, McCreery, Morrill of Maine, Norwood, Pease, Saulsbury, Stevenson, Stewart, Stockton, Wadleigh, and West—28.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance as amended.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I rise to offer an amendment; I will not make a speech upon it. In section 9, line 1, I move to strike out "July, 1878," and insert "July, 1874;" so as to read:

That on and after the 1st day of July, 1874, any holder of United States notes to the amount of $1,000, &c.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I offer another amendment, to come in at the close of the ninth section:

Or if the holder of such bonds shall demand payment before the expiration of fifteen years from the date of their issue, the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay the principal of the bonds in United States notes and the accumulated interest in coin.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now recurs on the amendment of the committee as it has been amended, being a substitute for the House bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SCOTT. Before the question is taken on that, I wish to move, if it is in order, to strike out "25," in the eighth line of section 8, and insert "40;" so that the clause will read:

It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to retire any amount of United States notes equal to 40 per cent. of the circulating notes so issued.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays. It is an important amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 20, nays 24: as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Boutwell, Buckingham, Conkling, Cooper, Davis, Edmunds, Fenton, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamlin, Howe, Jones, Morrill of Vermont, Sargent, Scott, Sherman, Stewart, Thurman, and Washburn—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bogy, Carpenter, Clayton, Dennis, Ferry of Michigan, Goldthwaite, Harvey, Johnston, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morton, Oglesby, Patterson, Pratt, Ramsey, Ransom, Spencer, Sprague, Tipton, Windom, and Wright—24.

ABSENT—Messrs. Allison, Bayard, Boreman, Brownlow, Cameron, Chandler, Conover, Cragin, Dorsey, Ferry of Connecticut, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Gordon, Hamilton of Texas, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Kelly, Lewis, Morrill of Maine, Norwood, Pease, Robertson, Saulsbury, Schurz, Stevenson, Stockton, Wadleigh, and West—29.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was concurred in.

It was ordered that the amendment be engrossed and the bill read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. THURMAN. I was requested to state that on all these questions the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] was paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON.] The Senator from Delaware, had he been here, would have voted for the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOTT,] and he would vote "nay" on the passage of the bill. The Senator from Georgia would vote the other way.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. Upon this question the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. BOREMAN] is paired with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY.] The Senator from West Virginia would vote "yea" and Mr. SAULSBURY "nay."

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. On this question my colleague [Mr. CHANDLER] is paired with the Senator from Florida, [Mr. CONOVER.]

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] is absent and paired with the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS.] If he were here he would vote against this bill.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from New York has relieved me of the necessity of stating how the Senator from New Jersey would vote if he were here. I should vote in favor of the bill if relieved from the pair.

Mr. HAMLIN. If my colleague [Mr. MORRILL, of Maine] were present he would vote "nay." He is paired with the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. WEST,] who, if present, would vote "yea."

Mr. MORTON. I am paired with the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. SCHURZ.] If he were here he would vote "nay," and I should vote "yea."

Mr. HARVEY. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PEASE] is paired with the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. WADLEIGH.] Mr. PEASE, if present, would vote "yea," and Mr. WADLEIGH "nay."

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I desire to state in behalf of my colleague [Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut] that if he were here he would vote against the bill; but he is, as I understand, paired with the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BROWNLOW.]

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 25, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Bogy, Carpenter, Clayton, Dennis, Ferry of Michigan, Goldthwaite, Harvey, Howe, Johnston, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Oglesby, Patterson, Pratt, Ramsey, Ransom, Spencer, Sprague, Tipton, Windom, and Wright—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Boutwell, Buckingham, Conkling, Cooper, Davis, Edmunds, Fenton, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamlin, Jones, Morrill of Vermont, Sargent, Scott, Sherman, Stewart, Thurman, and Washburn—19.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Boreman, Brownlow, Cameron, Chandler, Conover, Dragin, Dorsey, Ferry of Connecticut, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Gordon, Hamilton of Texas, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Kelly, Lewis, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Norwood, Pease, Robertson, Saulsbury, Schurz, Stevenson, Stockton, Wadleigh, and West—29.

So the bill was passed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 733) relating to evidence in the courts of the District of Columbia was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (H. R. No. 3237) to authorize the First National Bank of Seneca to change its name was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

ALEXANDER HENDERSON.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. A few days since I made an adverse report from the Committee on Commerce upon the petition of Alexander Henderson, late consul at Londonderry, praying for remuneration for expenses incurred and special services rendered during his term of office, and the committee was discharged from its further consideration. Since then new papers have been presented which lead me to ask a reconsideration of that vote and that the papers be referred again to the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the vote will be regarded as reconsidered. The Chair hears none.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I now move that the petition with the additional papers be again referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at six o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 14, 1874.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ARMY MEDICAL MUSEUM.

Mr. LOWNDES, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3345) to provide for the purchase of a building adjacent to the Army Medical Museum, in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, for scientific purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF NAME OF NATIONAL BANK.

Mr. FARWELL, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, reported back with an amendment the bill (H. R. No. 3237) to authorize the First National Bank of Seneca to change its name.

The bill provides that the name of the "First National Bank of Seneca," in the city of Morris, in the county of Grundy, and State of Illinois, shall be changed to the "First National Bank of Morris."

Mr. FARWELL. In 1872 Congress authorized this bank to remove from Seneca to Morris, but by an oversight it neglected to give permission to change the name. The committee have directed me to report it back and ask its passage with an amendment.

The amendment of the committee was read, as follows:

Add to the first section these words:
And that all expenses incident to such change, including engraving, shall be borne and paid by said bank.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FARWELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FREEDMAN'S SAVINGS AND TRUST COMPANY.

Mr. DURHAM. I am instructed by the Committee on Banking and Currency, which is authorized to report the bill at any time, to report back with amendments the bill (H. R. No. 3265) amending the charter of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company, and for other purposes.

The bill, in its first section, amends the act of Congress approved March 3, 1865, entitled "An act to in orporate the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company," so that hereafter it shall be the duty of the trustees and officers of said company to make loans, to the extent of one-half the deposits by them received, upon bonds or notes secured by mortgages or deeds of trust upon unincumbered real estate, situate in the vicinity of the agency or branch of said company from which such deposits are received, worth, upon cash appraisement, at least double the amount of said loans exclusive of buildings. The other half they shall invest in United States bonds, or keep on deposit in some national bank such sums as may be necessary to meet current payments.

The second section provides that it shall be the duty of said trustees and officers of said company to collect, as speedily as it may be done without prejudice to the interests of the depositors, all sums of money by them loaned upon real estate outside of the States from which received; and when collected, and as the same may be collected, they shall loan said funds as directed in the first section of the act.

The third section provides that when it shall appear that the interests of the depositors may require it, it shall be lawful for the trustees of the corporation, by and with the advice and consent of the Comptroller of the Currency, at any time to close any of the agencies or branches of the corporation, paying to the depositors of such agencies or branches a pro rata amount of the principal and interest which may be due them, and also a ratable proportion of any surplus which may have accumulated under the provisions of section 8 of the act. And whenever it may be deemed advisable, or when so ordered by Congress, the general business and affairs of the corporation shall, in like manner, be closed up by the trustees of the corporation under the direction of the Comptroller of the Currency.

The fourth section provides that said trustees and officers of said company shall not loan to any person or company at any one time more than $10,000 of the funds of said trust company.

The fifth section provides that every officer, clerk, or agent of the company who shall embezzle, abstract, or willfully misapply any of the money, funds, or credits of the company, or shall without authority of the trustees or proper officers of the company issue or put forth any pass-book, certificate of deposit, or other evidence of indebtedness, draw any order, bill of exchange, make any acceptance, assign any note, bond, draft, bill of exchange, mortgage, or confess any judgment or decree whereby said company may be charged with any liability or be deprived of any of its assets, or shall make any false entry in any book, report, or statement of the company, or willfully deceive any officer of the company, or any agent appointed to examine the affairs or condition of the company, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by imprisonment for a period not exceeding five years; and the circuit court of the United States for the circuit wherein said misdemeanor shall have been committed shall have exclusive jurisdiction of said offenses.

The sixth section provides that hereafter the officers or agents of said trust company shall not pay interest on the deposits exceeding 5 per cent.

The seventh section provides that whenever it shall be deemed advisable by the trustees of said corporation to wind up its entire business, then they shall select three competent men, to be known and styled commissioners, whose duty shall be to take charge of all the property and effects of said Freedman's Savings and Trust Company, wind up the principal and subordinate branches, collect from the branches all the deposits they have on hand, and proceed to collect all sums due said company, and dispose of all the property owned by said company as speedily as the interest of the corporation requires, and to distribute the proceeds among the creditors pro rata according to their respective amounts; they shall make a pro rata dividend whenever they have funds enough to pay 20 per cent. of the claims of depositors. Said commissioners, before they proceed to act, shall execute a joint bond to the United States, with good sureties, in the penal sum of $100,000, conditioned for the faithful discharge of their duties as commissioners aforesaid, and shall take an oath to faithfully and honestly perform their duties as such, which bonds shall be executed in presence of the Secretary of the Treasury, be approved by him, and by him safely kept; and whenever said trustees shall file with the Secretary of the Treasury a certified copy of the order appointing said commissioners, and they shall have executed the bonds and taken the oath aforesaid, then said commissioners shall be invested with the legal title to all of said property of said company, and shall have full power and authority to sell the same and make deeds of conveyance to any and all of the real estate sold by them to the purchasers. Said commissioners may employ such agents as are necessary to assist them in winding up said company, and pay them a reasonable compensation for their services out of the funds of said company; and the said commissioners shall retain out of said funds a reasonable compensation for their trouble, to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Comptroller of the Currency and not exceeding $4,000 each per annum. Said commissioners shall deposit all sums collected by them in the Treasury of the United States until they make a pro rata of the same.

The amendments reported by the committee were read, as follows:

In section 1, line 9, before the word "mortgages" insert the word "first."

In section 1, line 13, strike out the words "exclusive of buildings," and insert the following words: "and the borrower shall, at his own expense, keep said property insured in some good and solvent company to the amount of one-half of its cash value, for the benefit of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company."

In section 3 strike out all in the thirteenth line after the word "corporation," and insert the words "as provided for in section 7 herein."

In section 7, line 36, strike out the word "four" and insert the word "three."

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, these amendments will be considered as agreed to.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. It occurs to me that there is possibly some objection to the amendment proposed in line 13 of the first section. I understand that the object of that amendment is to allow these loans to be made to the amount of half the cash value of the property, including the buildings.

Mr. DURHAM. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. The provision, however, being made in that case, that insurance to one-half the value of the buildings be kept up, then why strike out the words "exclusive of buildings?"

Mr. DURHAM. In the original bill it was required that the value of the ground itself should be double the amount of the money loaned. We thought that a hard provision. Under the amendment the money loaned shall not be more than half the value of the property, including the buildings, and in addition the borrower shall keep an insurance on it to the extent of one-half of its value.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Yes, sir; but the bill, as printed, provides that the officers may make loans upon unincumbered real estate, situate in the vicinity of the agency or branch of said company from which such deposits are received, worth upon cash appraisement at least double the amount of said loans, exclusive of buildings.

Now, I understand the gentleman's amendment to be to strike out the words "exclusive of buildings."

Mr. DURHAM. Yes; we leave it on the property as it stands.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. That is exactly it. Then the amendment accomplishes the purpose I supposed it did. These loans may be made to the extent of one-half of the value of the property, inclusive of buildings. And then, to make some guarantee that the bank shall have some safety for that portion of its loan that is secured by this building, there is a provision that the person owning the buildings shall keep them insured to the amount of half their value for the benefit of this loan. Now, it occurs to me that it will not be easy to compel a man to keep his buildings insured. Suppose he should not keep them insured and the buildings should be destroyed. Of course there would be no security for the amount of the loan to that extent. It might turn out that the buildings were the larger part of the value of this security, and the insurance not being kept up, as it might happen to be not kept up, the security would fail. And so it did occur to me on hearing that amendment read that it would be better to allow the bill to stand as it is, but I may be under a misapprehension.

Mr. MAYNARD. Allow me to suggest that the bank would pay the premium and keep the insurance up, charging it to the borrower.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I would like to have the Clerk read the amendment once more. There is no provision here that the bank may keep up the insurance at all.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. If the gentleman will modify the amendment, so as to say that the bank shall at the expense of the borrower keep the said property insured to the amount of half its value for its own benefit, then I shall have no objection.

Mr. DURHAM. I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. MAYNARD. It would be better phraseology to say that the property shall be kept insured at the expense of the borrower.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. By the bank.

Mr. MAYNARD. By anybody, the borrower or the bank.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. The difficulty about that is that the borrower may have the property insured to-day, and the bank not knowing the date when the insurance expires may allow the insurance to run out, and the borrower may allow it to run out, and so it may happen that between them the security will be lost.

Mr. MAYNARD. Not if the bank officers discharge their duties properly.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. It would be better to compel the bank to keep up the insurance.

Mr. PENDLETON. All the deeds of savings-banks provide that if the party does not keep the property insured the bank will do it.

Mr. MERRIAM. That is the rule, and you need nothing more.

Mr. PENDLETON. The bank itself knows when the insurance runs out.

The SPEAKER. The arrangement was that one hour should be devoted to the discussion of this bill. What time does the gentleman from Kentucky propose to occupy himself?

Mr. DURHAM. I propose to occupy ten minutes, and then give way to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BROMBERG] for his half hour, and then either to take the balance myself or give it to such gentlemen as I think proper.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Then this amendment can lie until the debate is concluded, and by that time we may be able to arrange it in a satisfactory form.

The SPEAKER. At the end of one hour the previous question will be considered as operating on the bill and amendments. The hour begins now at twenty-two minutes past eleven o'clock, and the gentleman from Kentucky is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Speaker, this Freedman's Savings and Trust Company was incorporated by an act of Congress in 1865. By a subsequent act its charter was amended in 1870. Under the original act the incorporators had a right to receive deposits from persons that had been formerly in slavery and had become freedmen, and to loan the money thus deposited, to invest it in bonds and stocks of various kinds, and to pay the depositors whenever they might call for the amount of their deposits. They were permitted also by the terms of the charter to pay as high as 7 per cent. interest on those deposits. The whole object and purpose seem to have been to encourage the freedmen in the Southern States to lay up their little savings from time to time, even if the amount was as small as one dollar. By an amendment passed in 1870 they were permitted to invest to the extent of one-half of the deposits in real estate of double the value of the amount of money loaned. Under that charter these trustees have gone on from time to time and established thirty-four different branches, scattered throughout the Southern States, with the exception of one branch in the city of New York and I believe a branch in Philadelphia.

When the last report was made to the Comptroller of the Currency, some time in April last, there was three million three hundred and thirty-odd thousand dollars' worth of property owned by these incorporators. After a pretty thorough examination of this matter, the Committee on Banking and Currency have come to the conclusion that there have been some irregularities in the management of this bank. They do not find, however, that there has been any fraud committed. The institution has been in honest hands, so far as we know and believe; but like a great many similar institutions—and I might illustrate by the case of the First National Bank of this city—the trustees of the institution have made some unprofitable investments, and according to the report of the examiner, Mr. Meigs, who has gone all over the country and made a thorough examination, the institution is not solvent to-day, according to the estimate which he has placed upon their property. I would state, in justice to the directors of this corporation and from the information I have received, together with my two colleagues on the sub-committee, Mr. FARWELL and Mr. MERRIAM, that the majority of the trustees say the company is solvent and have property enough to pay every dollar they owe, and that if protected by such legislation as is proposed in the bill now before the House they can in less than twelve months be enabled to meet all their liabilities and to pay every dollar to their depositors.

Mr. Speaker, there can be no doubt as to the good which this institution has accomplished. Whatever my political views may be, or those of the gentlemen upon the other side of this question, when I come into this Hall to legislate I want to legislate for the best interest of this class of persons as well as for those of my own race and color.

I undertake to say that he who devised these saving institutions for the colored men in the Southern States conferred a great blessing and a great good upon that race. It has taught them habits of economy; it has taught them to lay up their little pittance, as I said a moment ago, although it be but a dollar. And I am credibly informed by the managers of this institution that they have collected and distributed through these agencies over $58,000,000 since they were established. And I apprehend it is to-day in as good a condition perhaps as many national banks which are under the control of those who may be regarded as far better financiers than these agents are.

What are the facts in relation to the panic of last fall, in which the First National Bank of this city went down and national banks all over the country went down? This institution with its thirty-four branches scattered over the breadth and length of the land survived that crash, although during that time it paid out to depositors over $1,100,000.

It comes in here and asks the fostering care and protection of the Congress of the United States. What are these measures which the committee propose? They are to throw safeguards around the very points that those gentlemen have failed to guard in making their loans. I admit, and that will be the strength of the argument on the other side, that this institution has perhaps not been as skillfully managed as it might have been. The managers have made investments here outside of those authorized by law; I admit all that, and the committee admits it. I admit that in one instance they have taken what is called a chattel mortgage for $25,000, which they were not authorized to do by the charter, and which should have been upon unincumbered real estate. The object of this amendatory bill is to provide that they shall loan only upon unincumbered real estate of double the value of the amount of money loaned. Then in addition to that, according to an amendment proposed by the committee, the borrower must take out an insurance upon that property of one-half of its cash value, as an additional security for the loan.

I know it will be said upon the other side, and with some degree of truthfulness, that some of the investments made here in Washington will not now sell for enough to pay the amount of money loaned. I admit that, and I think that is the understanding and view of these trustees. Another amendment which we propose, and I think a very wise one, is this: Under the original charter the branches of this institution which were scattered throughout the Southern States sent their funds to Washington City, and the principal portion of the property upon which loans have been made is situated in Washington City. By the amendment which we propose, it is provided that wherever the money is deposited, whether in Baltimore, Louisville, Savannah, Memphis, or at any other point, the investment of that money shall be made in those respective localities. And so far as investments have been made of the deposits made in these various localities, which have been sent here, it is provided that the funds shall be collected and again invested in property in the respective localities. That seems to be wise; that has been in accordance with the bill introduced by my distinguished friend from Tennessee, [Mr. WHITTHORNE.]

Under the original charter and the amendatory acts, if it becomes necessary at any time to do so, there is no provision whereby this institution can be wound up. Under the national banking law the mode is very specific. The Comptroller of the Currency has the right to take charge of a national bank and put it in the hands of a receiver and wind it up, whenever it may be necessary. There is no such provision in either the original charter or the amendatory bills relating to the Freedman's Savings Institution. By the amendment proposed by the committee, whenever the trustees see proper, or whenever it becomes necessary for the institution and its various branches to be wound up, the mode and manner is provided, and we think a good manner. It is that the fifty trustees of this institution and its branches shall assemble here and select three competent men who shall be invested with a legal title to all its property, empowered to sell it, to dispose of it, and to distribute the proceeds among the various depositors. I think that when members of the House come to look over this entire bill they will see that it is susceptible of no unjust or unfavorable criticism.

In conclusion I desire to say that the committee were unanimous in instructing me to make this report. They are unanimous in their desire that Congress shall protect and encourage the freedmen in the Southern States to lay up and accumulate their hard earnings, rather than to squander them as they have been doing in times gone by. It may be said that there are plenty of national banks scattered all over the Southern States in which the freedmen can make their deposits. I answer that these individuals are proud of their own race; I use the word "proud" knowingly. They desire to encourage their own institutions. And I have no hesitation in saying that they will lay up and accumulate two dollars in one of these institution, conducted under the charge and control of their own men, as is now done, to where they would lay up one dollar in institutions that are conducted as the national banks are.

I have nothing further to say, unless it may become necessary to make some explanation. I will reserve to myself five minutes to close this debate, in which to respond to anything that may be said by my distinguished friend on the other side, [Mr. BROMBERG,] provided I think it necessary to say anything. I now yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BROMBERG] for half an hour.

[Mr. BROMBERG addressed the House. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. BROMBERG. I trust the House will allow me a few minutes more.

Mr. MERRIAM. We cannot yield, because we are only allowed fifteen minutes more and we need all of that time. The list of securities the gentleman has read we are assured by the officers of the bank are worth one hundred cents on the doliar and the interest on them is paid regularly.

Mr. DURHAM. I want the gentleman from Alabama to have the fullest opportunity for discussion if it be the pleasure of the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. I must object to any extension of the time allowed for debate upon this bill.

The SPEAKER. By unanimous consent the discussion on this bill was limited to one hour.

Mr. DURHAM. I know that; but I want it understood that I do not object to the gentleman from Alabama proceeding.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, [Mr. GARFIELD,] objects to any extension of time.

Mr. DURHAM. Then I yield to my colleague on the committee from New York [Mr. MERRIAM] for twelve minutes.

Mr. BROMBERG. I have a substitute for the bill which I should like to offer and to have pending.

Mr. MERRIAM. Mr. Speaker, the resolution of inquiry into the Freedman's Trust and Savings Bank, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, was presented to the House by the honorable gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. BROMBERG.] The House refused to instruct the committee to report, although the honorable gentleman would seem to imply that it did.

Your committee, having no personal interest to subserve, directed their attention, with much thought and labor, to the sole end of aiding the present trustees in protecting the small accumulated savings of more than sixty thousand colored citizens who for the first time in their history had been permitted to own what by the sweat of their brows they had earned, and through the establishment and operations of the Freedman's Saving Bank to deposit it and keep it in a place of safety and gradual interest increase.

The committee find that the Freedman's Bank has proven to have been a valuable aid in encouraging habits of thrift, industry, and economy among the new-born sons of freedom. That more than $50,000,000 have been gathered into this institution in small sums and there held in safety, until enough was accumulated to be withdrawn for investment in lands and homes, is evidence of its beneficent operations. We find that some $47,000,000 have gone out from the bank into permanent land investments, until all along the rivers and uplands of the South men and women in their own homes, bought and paid for by honest toil, are progressing in a wise freedom to a better womanhood and manhood, in an intelligent citizenship, and in the tilling of a soil now their own.

So beneficent has the institution been to the colored race that were the balance of three millions now on deposit all lost, the aggregate good accomplished would warrant our commendation of the humanity of those men who wisely organized the Freedman's Bank.

But the committee find ample justification in the condition of the affairs of the bank to warrant a belief that but a small portion, if any, of the deposits will be lost to the depositors, provided that the present trustees are permitted to exercise careful and prudent management in the future, undisturbed and unvexed by these attacks from parties interested in destroying the institution.

It is true the committee find that some unwise and injudicious investments were made under the direction of former trustees, men who were eminent in the financial circles of this District, and whose judgment was unwisely deferred to; men, I am free to say, who deserve the severest censure of us all, for there can be no sufficient apology for their action.

The committee are of opinion, however, that there will be small ultimate loss from said investments; but that they were not of a character such as should have been made for such a trust.

The examination into the affairs of the bank by order of the last Congress was made last January by a very competent bank examiner, Mr. Meigs, of New York, who reports that the assets of the institution will pay about ninety-three cents on a dollar; but your committee are of the opinion that his estimate of its securities is below their actual value, and below what may be by prudent management realized from them.

It has been painfully apparent to your committee that in the anxiety of the honorable gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BROMBERG] to throw distrust around and thus to destroy and break up the Freedman's Bank and all its branches, that he has not been actuated solely by that charity and humanity toward the poorer and humbler classes they are entitled to receive at the hands of men who have the power to influence their destiny and welfare. It is not in happy contrast with that Christian humanity which animated the founders of the institution, nor with those kind-hearted men and women who three-quarters of a century ago first inaugurated savings-banks for the welfare of the poor and industrious. The letters which I propose to have read by the Clerk will perhaps explain to the House and the country the animus of the honorable gentleman from Alabama, who has been instrumental in causing a run upon the bank and its branches, and which would have broken them up but for the wise action of Mr. Douglass in issuing a circular to depositors, telling them that their deposits were safe and that they would ultimately be paid in full.

It appears that one Woodward was appointed cashier of the Mobile branch of the Freedman's Bank in 1866, at a salary of $1,800 per annum, and so continued until he embezzled $3,375 in March last. It appears that said Woodward's bondsman is Hon. Mr. BROMBERG, who antagonizes this bill and who introduced this resolution. It also appears that said Woodward has desired that Mr. BROMBERG should be released from his bond—said Woodward threatening that if it was not done "he would make it hot for the Freedman's Bank." Said Woodward claims that he took this money from the vaults of the Mobile branch as a balance of salary he had earned. That the House may know how utterly unfounded are his claims I will state that the Freedmen's Bureau arranged with the Freedman's Bank to pay the colored soldiers their bounties and back pay, and in consideration of such services the Freedmen's Bureau was to pay the rent of the buildings occupied by the bank. The rent paid in Mobile by the Freedmen's Bureau was $3,375. The first embezzlement of Woodward was $3,000, in March last. The committee are informed that said Woodward then consulted an attorney, who advised him if he was to take any of it he had better take it all, which he did. The honorable gentleman from Alabama tells me that in one other case (in Norfolk) the cashier was paid by the Freedmen's Bureau fifty dollars per month for two years. This is true; but what were the facts? The services performed by the cashier at Norfolk in paying bounties and back pay exceeded that of Mobile, while his salary was only $1,200 per annum, while the Mobile cashier, the defaulter Woodward, received $1,800 per annum. Hence the trustees of the Freedman's Bank decided that it was right that the Norfolk cashier should receive the fifty dollars per month from the Freedmen's Bureau. No other cashier of any branch ever intimated that he expected a dollar beyond his regular salary, or received a single dollar from the Freedmen's Bureau; the rent paid was considered as a portion of the earnings of the bank. It is true that the cashiers received an official commission for performance of their duty from the Freedmen's Bureau, as it was a necessity in form of the law governing the Freedmen's Bureau.

It is well to consider also that this Woodward was cashier from 1866, and never until this embezzlement indicated that he had a claim for $1,000 or $3,000 or $3,375. Neither has any other cashier of any other branch made claim for any pay beyond salary.

I now ask the Clerk to read the letters which I send up, and first I ask him to read the letter of Mr. Stickney, the actuary of the bank.

The Clerk read as follows:

FREEDMAN'S SAVINGS AND TRUST COMPANY,
Washington, D. C., May 14, 1874.

DEAR SIR: In answer to your verbal inquiries as to the connection of Mr. BROMBERG with our cashier at Mobile, against whom we have entered suit for the embezzlement of funds, Mr. BROMBERG is on Mr. Woodward's bond, and has had notice that the suit has been commenced. Mr Woodward, when here, some four weeks after a conference with Mr. BROMBERG, I am credibly informed, stated that if we did not allow him to keep the amount, some $3,375, he would make it hot for us. After Mr. Meigs's report was published Mr. BROMBERG telegraphed Mr. Woodward that the company would be in the hands of a receiver before the last of April. Mr. Woodward has, with the help of Mr. BROMBERG, done his utmost to get the depositors to withdraw their deposits, so far without success, as we have not had to take a single sixty-day notice.

I notice in looking over the list of loans as published by the Tribune, $35,000 to J. M. Latta, trustee, and Robert M. Douglass, each. This should be $3,500 each. Among loans classed as doubtful, I find the loan of $75,000 to Union Pacific Railroad Company—is good. We received $15,000 on account of the loan since Mr. Meigs made his report, and have the assurance that the whole will be paid at once. Three thousand dollars to W. J. PURMAN. The $10,000 bonds are worth at any moment $5,000, and will sell for that. Thirty-three thousand dollars to Young Men's Christian Association is secured by mortgage on the building, corner Ninth and D streets, and is worth at the lowest estimate $100,000. Twenty-eight thousand five hundred dollars to Washington Club is secured on their building on New York avenue, and is worth at least $40,000. Arrangements are nearly perfected to pay the whole amount within the next thirty days. Seventy-five thousand dollars to Howard University is secured on real estate worth at least twice the amount of loan if sold under the hammer. One hundred and forty-one thousand one hundred and sixty-four dollars on city or District collaterals is good; at any time before the panic the collateral would have sold for enough to pay the loan.

G. W. STICKNEY,
Actuary.

Hon. C. L. MERRIAM.

During the reading of the foregoing letter,

Mr. BROMBERG said: I desire to know if the gentleman from New York sends that up as a part of his speech, or what is it? I want to state right here that every statement made there is false from beginning to end. There is not a word of truth in it, and the man who says that tells a lie.

Mr. MERRIAM. I object to the interruption of the reading of the letter.

The Clerk then concluded the reading of the letter.

Mr. MERRIAM. I now ask the Clerk to read the letter which I send up from Hon. Frederick Douglass, president of the Freedman's Bank.

The Clerk read as follows:

PRINCIPAL OFFICE OF THE
FREEDMAN'S SAVINGS AND TRUST COMPANY,
Washington, D. C., May 13, 1874.

DEAR SIR: There may be nothing more than a virtuous concern for the welfare of our poor depositors in the persistent efforts of Mr. BROMBERG to bring the Freedman's Bank into discredit.

There is, however, one fact about Mr. BROMBERG which you ought to know. He is already the subject of legal proceedings, instituted by the Freedman's Bank at Mobile. He is on the bond of our late cashier at Mobile in the sum of $10,000; and the said cashier having unlawfully appropriated to himself $3,375 of money belonging to the bank, we have instituted proceedings for the recovery of the same.

I still think, if we can be relieved from these persistent efforts in Congress and elsewhere to destroy its credit, and our depositors will exercise reasonable patience, with good management, we can pay dollar for dollar.

Very respectfully, yours,

FRED'K DOUGLASS,
President.

Hon. C. L. MERRIAM.

Mr. BROMBERG. Who wrote that first document?

Mr. MERRIAM. It is written by the actuary of the institution, whose name is attached to it.

Mr. BROMBERG. I hope the House will give me an opportunity to brand that man as he ought to be.

Mr. MERRIAM. The committee having done its duty unbiased in this matter, we feel that we have the right to claim the confidence of the House. It is a most unpleasant duty for us to bring this matter before the House and the country, but we are standing here for sixty thousand uneducated, hard laboring colored men, and on our oath of duty in the Congress of the United States, which compels us to do this, no matter how unpleasant it may be.

The former trustees have resigned; a new board has been elected, at the head of which stands one whom we may call the apostle of the colored race in this country, Hon. Frederick Douglass, in whom justly concentrates the confidence of the entire colored race. Whatever he says to these colored men they believe. He says to them that if they will have patience he believes, as the committee believe, that they will receive their deposits in full. This bill is brought in to aid the trustees in protecting these people from loss, which will be sure to follow a panic among the depositors if they were once led to believe their money was in jeopardy, for the poor man is as sensitive for the safety of his money as the millionaire; and when panicky would sell their right in their bank of deposit at any price shyster speculators might offer.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DURHAM. How much time is left?

The SPEAKER. Five minutes.

Mr. DURHAM. I will yield to the chairman of the committee [Mr. MAYNARD] two or three minutes of that time.

Mr. MAYNARD. I will not take the whole of my friend's time. My attention was called to this institution prior to the introduction of the resolution of the gentleman from Alabama. A former colleague in this House, Mr. Arnell, who had interested himself in one of the branches of this institution in my own State, was in this city, and invited my attention to it. I gave it my personal, individual examination as best I could for some two months, off and on. In the first place I examined a report made by the bank examiner in the month of February of last year. There are four paragraphs in that report which perhaps embody the spirit of the whole of it. As they are short I will read them, and invite the attention of the House to them. After speaking of the improvements made by the bank in this city the report says:

The question of the improvement of their lands in Washington City seems to be clearly a violation of their charter, and is submitted without further comment.

Again, after speaking of loans, the report says:

Many of the loans are of a character that should not appear upon the records of a savings-bank, and will finally result in some loss to the institution, but the probable amount of such ultimate loss it is very difficult to determine at this time.

These two paragraphs embody the spirit of the censure which appears in this report. It then goes on to say:

The business of the institution has risen so rapidly from the most trifling deposits of one dollar to five dollars, gathered up by the executive officers from the hands of the freedmen all over the Southern States, at personal interviews during many tours throughout the South made for the purpose of calling their attention to the question of savings, to its present proportions of $4,000,000, that errors of judgment have occurred in investments which are not likely to be repeated, with the light of past experience to guide them in the future.

The executive officers are, in my opinion, men of the most undoubted integrity of character, devoted to the best interests of the institution, working for small compensation, and have educated themselves to the practical knowledge of the business of a savings-bank to a degree that promises a prosperous future for the institution.

I will say that these extracts in my judgment embody the entire spirit in which this institution has been carried on. Errors in a financial point of view, business errors, have occurred. In the first place they paid too much interest; 6 per cent. interest on deposits was more than they could pay, but which they did pay, imitating perhaps many other savings-banks. And that was the foundation of the other error which they fell into; the investments in improvements of real estate, which although valuable do not pay a fair profit on the money invested; and also the establishment of small branches at points that did not pay expenses.

In the report of the bank examiner, made at the present session of Congress, occurs the following:

The by-laws were so amended in June, 1873, as to read that "after January 1, 1874, such interest only shall be allowed to depositors in the future as shall be warranted by the profits of the institution," and notice given to the depositors.

If the depositors will exercise reasonable forbearance for six to twelve months under this regulation, it will give the institution time to recuperate from the misfortune of the past and add largely to the safety of the depositors.

I would suggest that all of the unprofitable branches be closed up as soon as possible in order to reduce expenses, and, in fact, measures are now in progress to this end.

In conclusion I beg to repeat the recommendations contained in my last report, and to ask the fostering care and forbearance of Congress for an institution that has done and may continue to do great good to the freedmen in inducing habits of industry and frugality in the care of their earnings.

These errors have occurred, but they were errors of judgment of men who were acting honestly, in good faith, and for the benefit of these people, who I have reason to assert have derived benefit from it, and thousands of them to-day have homes bought and paid for from these savings.

Mr. DURHAM. I yield the balance of my time, one minute, to the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY.]

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I am not of course going to discuss in one minute all the facts of this case. This concern has handled nearly $60,000,000 of the money of poor men all over the country. It was unavoidable that errors should have been committed. They attempted to run too many branches. They would have been glad to lend these funds again in the localities where the depositors lived, but you know, and every man knows who has observed the condition of the South after the war, there could be no more dangerous investment for a savings-bank than to attempt to loan money upon what is called real estate there. The bank tried to accomodate those localities, but every wise financier would have told them how dangerous it was to lend money on such property. In case of a foreclosure the property would often be found insufficient; the rent would not pay interest on the loan. In accordance with what was thought to be the best policy more funds were accumulated here, and invested from the headquarters.

There were mistakes made, of course; but, mark you, the sagacious and careful bank examiner, Mr. Meigs, says of all the millions of dollars loaned and handled $106,000 of bad debts only remain on the books. The Committee on Banking and Currency, having in view the interests of sixty thousand poor people and the honor of the Government as well, have investigated through an able sub-committee the condition of this bank with the utmost care and integrity. It should not be in any manner a party question. Party prejudice should be left out of it altogether. I would be willing to leave the whole matter to the honorable Kentucky democrat, to the old lawyer and judge who presents this bill this morning, [Mr. DURHAM,] with whom were associated two experienced bankers and business men, [Messrs. FARWELL and MERRIAM.] They have investigated the affairs of the bank and recommended, with the approval of the whole Banking and Currency Committee, the passage of the bill now before us. I think it was unkind, cruel, and unjust in the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. BROMBERG,] whether it be true or not as charged that he is bondsman for a defaulting cashier, to pursue this matter in a manner calculated to bring annoyance and loss upon the bank. I hope the House will sustain the committee and the bill, wisely supervise the bank, and guard the interest of the poor who are its depositors.

Mr. MAYNARD. The total amount of deposits from beginning to end amount to $58,000,000, and out of that vast sum the loss has been the comparatively insignificant amount already stated.

Mr. BROMBERG. I hope the House will afford me some opportunity to reply to specific charges against me personally. I think it is due to me.

The SPEAKER. What time does the gentleman want?

Mr. BROMBERG. Only five minutes.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the gentleman will be allowed five minutes.

Mr. FARWELL. I object.

Mr. BROMBERG. I hope the gentleman will not object. I only want three or four minutes.

Mr. FARWELL. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. BROMBERG. In the first place, Mr. Speaker, I will state it is not true that I have been notified of any suit. It is legally impossible they should sue me here. In the next place, every statement made in the document attributed to the actuary is false. It is false, no matter who made it. It is false from beginning to end; there is not one iota of truth in it. There is not the least foundation for it.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Are you not on that bond?

Mr. BROMBERG. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. That is one of the statements you say is false.

Mr. BROMBERG. The bond of the cashier appointed in 1866 was renewed in 1867. I left home in November, when there was nothing at all about any quarrel between him and the bank. I knew he had been long claiming for services as agent appointed directly by General Howard—holding a commission from General Howard as agent of the Bureau to pay bounties to colored soldiers. That was in May, 1869, two years after the date of that bond. General Howard allowed for these services compensation to the bank. The cashier at Norfolk, it seems, was paid for that, but in every other case the bank retained the amount which properly belonged to the cashier. When I left home, as the matter stood, Mr. Woodward was writing to the bank, wanting to know whether it was going to allow his claim as agent of the Bureau. That is all I know about it. I hold a letter of the attorney of Mr. Woodward, directed to me, and lest some one may think he is a democrat, and a man who should be struck at, I will say that he was the republican candidate for district attorney at the last election and was the republican candidate for State attorney for Mobile under the last republican administration. The letter will show that no single step was taken by Mr. Woodward but under legal advice; and you may make as much of the matter as you please. As regards the statement concerning the bond, that statement contains its own refutation.

Mr. MERRIAM. Is it not a fact that it was after the cashier embezzled the $3,000 that he asked the advice of the attorney?

Mr. BROMBERG. I simply ask the attention of the House to this letter. The House will judge as to the probability that I should attempt to save myself against a responsibility of $3,000 by pulling down the whole fabric of the institution, by compelling that bank to go into the hands of an examiner. As to the statement that I am seeking to avoid any suit, I will tell the gentleman from New York [Mr. MERRIAM] that my name or the name which I bear is probably better known in Wall street, New York, than his own.

Mr. MERRIAM. I do not know what that has to do with the case.

Mr. BROMBERG. I ask the Clerk to read the letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

MOBILE, May 4, 1874.

DEAR SIR: Mr. C. A. Woodward, late cashier of the branch at Mobile of the Freedman's Bank, desires me to write to you with reference to the matter in controversy between him and the bank. You being one of his bondsmen, it seems proper that I should, as his legal adviser, do so. He earned during the time he was cashier the sum of $3,375 as disbursing agent of the Freedmen's Bureau, a service entirely disconnected with his duty as cashier of the bank. He never agreed to perform this duty for the bank, nor was he under any legal obligation to do so. The bank in Washington collected this money from General Howard and never sent it to Woodward. The last-named gentleman, not being aware of his legal rights, sought to get the benefit of his services as disbursing agent of the Bureau credited to the branch at Mobile for the use of his depositors. In this he failed. The matter stood so until some three or four months ago, when he incidentally learned that the cashier at Norfolk had been paid by the Bureau for his services as disbursing agent. Upon this information he came to me for legal advice. After some weeks' investigation of the matter and the law bearing upon it, I advised him that he was entitled to the money.

Mr. BROMBERG. There is the point; he had legal advice.

The Clerk, (continuing:)

And under my advice he has acted ever since. He proposes to defend his action. I proposed to Sperry—

Mr. BROMBERG. Sperry is the agent.

The Clerk, (continuing:)

I proposed to Sperry to submit the question, for it is purely one of law, to Judge Moulton—

Mr. BROMBERG. That is the judge of the city court, and at present republican mayor of Mobile.

The Clerk, (continuing:)

Judge Elliot—

Mr. BROMBERG. That is the republican circuit-court judge.

The Clerk, (continuing:)

or to any other disinterested lawyers, and to abide by their decision without any lawsuit. This, so far, they have failed to agree to. In my judgment Woodward's right to the money is beyond question; nor has he in any manner waived his rights in the premises.

By the way, I see that the bank is in rather a bad condition, which it seems to me must be the result of either corrupt or incompetent management. If the money had been invested in United States bonds, as the charter required, there could have been no loss. But I see that some one had an amendment proposed by Congress (see 17 United States Statutes, page 119) authorizing loans upon real-estate security. I understand on the 16th of May, 1870, just ten days after the amendment above referred to, that the bank adopted a rule authorizing loans upon collateral security. I submit that the act of May 6, 1870, does not authorize the adoption of that rule. If you have not already done so, I would suggest that you call the attention of the committee to that rule and the want of authority for its adoption. It seems to me the whole trouble comes from that rule of the bank.

You need give yourself no uneasiness about any suit that may be brought on Mr. W.'s bond, for it will be defended.

Respectfully, yours, &c.,

W. W. D. TURNER.

Hon. F. G. BROMBERG, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. BROMBERG. That is the only answer I have to make.

Mr. MERRIAM. All I have to say is that this is the testimony of a paid attorney.

The first amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

In line 9 of section 1, before the word "mortgages," insert the word "first;" so that the clause will read:

It shall be the duty of the trustees and officers of said company to make loans, to the extent of one-half the deposits by them received, upon bonds or notes secured by first mortgages or deeds of trust upon unincumbered real estate, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BROMBERG. I ask leave to offer an amendment.

Mr. DURHAM. Is not the previous question operating?

Mr. BROMBERG. Let the amendment be read.

Several members objected.

Mr. BROMBERG. Let it be printed.

Mr. MERRIAM and Mr. FARWELL objected.

The next amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

In line 13 of the first section, after the words "exclusive of buildings," insert the following:

And the borrower shall at his own expense keep said property insured in some good and solvent company to the amount of one-half its cash value for the benefit of the Freedmen's Savings and Trust Company.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I wish to offer an amendment to that amendment.

Mr. DURHAM. I will hear it.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. It is a mere modification. I propose to insert after the word "expense" the words "or the bank shall at the expense of the borrower."

Mr. DURHAM. There is no objection to that; I accept that.

The SPEAKER. It will be incorporated with the amendment.

The second amendment of the committee, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. DURHAM] yields to me to offer an amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a question of order. The previous question does not seem to be operating.

Mr. DURHAM. I thought the previous question was operating.

The SPEAKER. Of course the House would have the right to determine whether amendments should be offered or not. The Chair will put the question upon ordering the previous question.

Mr. BROMBERG. I hope my amendment will be read.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I have suggested to the gentleman having charge of this bill three or four verbal amendments, to which he makes no objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BROMBERG] should be read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL] objected to the reading. Is there objection to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. TOWNSEND?]

Mr. HOLMAN. I object to any discrimination in this matter of offering amendments. I think all members ought to have equal rights in this respect.

Mr. MERRIAM. I object to any further amendments.

The question being taken on seconding the demand for the previous question, there were—ayes 81, noes 35; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. DURHAM and Mr. BROMBERG were appointed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose that if these amendments are allowed to be read, no further objection will be made.

The SPEAKER. The objection was to reading them.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 102, noes 46.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was ordered.

The next amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

At the end of the third section strike out the words "under the direction of the Comptroller of the Currency," and insert "as provided for in section 7 herein."
